Yet a fresh crimson flush'd his cheek and lip,
And on his ample brow the light of holy thought
Shone like an angel's diadem, while with a scholar's lighted eye
He scann'd page after page, of quaint old Saxon lore.
One sentence yet was wanting,—
But now his labor'd breath came heavily,
And o'er his brow deep shadows fell. Strangely and wearily
His purple eye-lid droop'd, and hollow sank his temples.
But he had worn the sacred robe of knowledge
From his cradle onward, and now when death's last ice-drop
Quiver'd on his lip, he labor'd on with cloudless intellect
And untiring zeal, till the last word was written.
His work on earth was done,
Well done. The inspired page was closed,
And to the accustomed place of prayer they bore
For the last time, his failing form.
Thus with the last death-pang at his heart,—
And the last whiteness settling round his mouth,—
He poured high praise to Father, Son, and Spirit,
And so expired!

PROVIDENCE.

Though the doctrine of a superintending Providence is clearly revealed in the word of God, there are some even of those who profess to make that word the guide of their conduct, who do not derive from it all the consolation which it is capable of affording. In many cases this is owing to some lurking unbelief which the individual is aware that he can not justify, and which he would hesitate to avow in terms, but more frequently perhaps to the influence of some evil habit, or unrepented sin, which shuts out the favor of Heaven and prevents the personal appropriation of the promises made to the sincere Christian. Whatever it may be, the Scriptures are express in their declarations on the subject, and we allude to it now merely for the purpose of introducing to our readers the following eloquent extract from a sermon lately preached by the Rev. Edward G. Prescott, Rector of St. John's Church, Salem, New Jersey.

"Take from me this belief, and you deprive life of its chief comfort: you add an eternal, an impenetrable darkness to the gloom which hangs over the grave. Tell me, as some would persuade us, that the universe is governed only by a stern system of general laws; that without any interposition from God, similar causes will be left always to produce similar effects; that He deals only in vast and general rules, but does not stoop to individual cases, and you take from me all incitement to prayer, the strongest claim upon my gratitude, the most certain nourishment for my piety. Only fix in my mind the belief that certain general laws are established under which this world is set in motion, and then forced to roll on its appointed course without the interposition of an Almighty Being to modulate them for each particular case, and you reduce me to a piece of mechanism which unless it be broken or worn out must move on forever under the same impulse, upon the same course. The relation of God to man is then no longer parental. Instead of that Being whom I love to approach as my "Father who is in heaven," I should find there but the master spirit whose power had framed and set in motion, for his own sole enjoyment, the complicated machinery of the universe; instead of approaching him in my hour of peril with the certainty that he would either afford me protection from the danger, or else strength to endure as to his infinite love should seem best for me, I should see there but a cold and heartless sovereign, who, unmoved by my agony, was watching the inevitable certainty with which his general system would crush me in its course; instead of approaching him in my sorrows as the friend who, above all others was willing to soothe my grief, I should feel that he was one who would look on yet leave me to these cold consolations which time will administer; to the slow drying up of the fountain of my tears; to the gradual fading of that image whose memory in its freshness had caused my heart to bleed; and in the hour of death, when all human hopes lost—alone—shrinking—unsupported by the hand of God, I should know that I must pass into the region of the destroyer, with no interposing Providence to smooth my path or guide my faultering steps. Tell me not then of such a heartless system of divine government; whatever else you take from me, take not away my belief in a special protection. In my peril it is my shield; in my infirmity it is my might; in my weakness it is my support; in my erring it is my safety; and in the hour of my death, amid the horrors of the day of judgment, I look to it as to the perfect triumph of his love. My brethren, to the teaching of no such cold doctrine is this house consecrated; no such belief is held by the Church, and none such do we find in the holy word of God; for there we are taught that the hairs of our heads are all numbered, and that not even a sparrow falls without his knowledge and consent. How much more will he care for and watch over us, oh men of little faith!

ASIATIC PROVERBS.

Fear God; and beside Him fear none but that man that fears him not.

He who knows not his Maker cannot know himself.

Godliness is the greatest wisdom, and impiety the greatest of follies.

The fear of God is the greatest safeguard.

To sin once is too much; but a thousand acts of devotion towards God are not sufficient to honor Him.

If a man foresaw his end, he would abhor deceitfulness.

Life is a sort of sleep, from which many awake not, but in death.

The orphan is not the person who has lost his father; but he who has neither wisdom nor a good education.

Want of good sense is worse than all the degrees of poverty.

He who has least wisdom, has most vanity.

There is no greatness of soul in revenge.

Envy has no rest.

The desire of revenge is a constant hindrance to a happy and contented life.

When you have got an advantage over your enemy, pardon him in returning God thanks for that advantage.

There is no disease so dangerous as the want of common sense.

Hope is the greatest mainspring of virtue. It gives action to all animate existence. It is the bread which feeds ambition, the incentive to perseverance, the compass to virtue, the shield to Christianity, and the only solace in death. If it is blighted, the prilgrimage of life is like a troubled sea—we float down its dark stream like the lost mariner on the billowy deck. Aided by its cheering beams, the immortal mind looks beyond time, and anticipates the beauty of another, a happier existence. The beauty of the rainbow vanishes in the storm; the meteor's flash is but a moment; the glittering gems of heaven will one day go out; the sun himself be extinguished; but the star of Hope shines beautifully forever.

RICHES.—The good which is in riches lieth altogether in their use; like the woman's box of ointment, if it be not broken and poured out for the refreshment of Jesus Christ in his distressed members, they lose their worth. The covetous man may, therefore, truly write upon his rusting heaps, "these are good for nothing." He is not rich who lays up much, but he that lays out much: for it is all one, not to have, as not to use. I will, therefore, be the richer by a charitable laying out, while the worldling shall be the poorer by his covetous hoarding up.

FOR MOTHERS.

FEMALE PIETY.

The gem of all others, which enriches the coronet of a lady's character is unaffected piety. Nature may lavish much on her person,—the enchantment of her countenance, the grace of her mien, or the strength of her intellect; yet her loveliness is uncrowned, till piety throws around the whole, the sweetness and power of her charms. She then becomes unearthly in desires and associations. The spell which bound her affections to the things below is broken, and she mounts on the silent wings of her fancy and hope to the habitation of God, where it is her delight to hold communion with the spirits that have been ransomed from the thraldom of earth and wreathed with a garland of glory.

Her beauty may throw a magical charm over many; princes and conquerors may bow at the shrine of her love, the sons of science may embalm her memory in the page of history—yet her piety must be her ornament, her pearl. Her name must be written in the "Book of Life," that when the mountains fade away, and every memento of earthly greatness is lost in the general wreck of nature, it may remain and swell the list of that mighty throng which have been clothed with the mantle of righteousness, and their voice attuned to the melody of heaven.

With such a treasure every lofty gratification on earth may be purchased, friendship will be doubly sweet, pain and sorrow shall lose their sting, and the character will possess a price far "above riches," life will be but a pleasant visit to earth, and death the entrance upon a joyful and perpetual home. And when the notes of the last trump shall be heard, and sleeping millions awake to judgment, its possessor shall be presented "faultless before the throne of God with exceeding joy, and a crown of glory that shall never wear away."

Such is piety. Like a tender flower, planted in the fertile soil of woman's heart, it grows, expanding its foliage and imparting its fragrance to all around, till transplanted, it is set to bloom in perpetual vigor and unfading beauty, in the Paradise of God.

Follow this star; it will light you through every labyrinth in the wilderness of life—gild the gloom that will gather around you in a dying hour, and bring you safely over the tempestuous Jordan of death, into the haven of promised and settled rest.

FOR THE IMPENITENT.

WHAT DOES THE SWEARER MEAN.

Far be it from me, I would say again, to imagine that when men lightly invoke DAMNATION upon their neighbors, or upon their own souls, they really intend what they say. On the contrary, it is but too difficult to persuade most persons that such a horrid endless doom can ever be deserved, or ought to be inflicted. A notorious individual, grown gray in swindling, and whom every body thought it a virtue to brand with infamy, was not long since sentenced to the Penitentiary far a term of years, to atone for the ruin he had brought upon hundreds of indigent and helpless persons; outraging their confidence, and robbing them of their hard earnings. And yet, so fickle, and so devoid of justice is the heart of man that in a few months after, there were not a few who could almost consent to see the culprit set at liberty, because there were some, still deeper dipt in crime, who contrived to elude the power of the law. No—let a man curse me in sport or in earnest—on mighty provocation or on none at all, I will not believe him. Let him stand and gnash upon me with furious rage; and with a volley of imprecations, wish my soul in the deepest abyss of eternal misery; I will not imagine that the desire is from the bottom of his heart, or that it can long abide there. We read in Holy Writ of a man, who, after living as he listed, in due time died and was buried; and in the solemn judgment of God, was sent away to make his bed in hell. From that place he lifted up his eyes in torment; and lifting up his voice also, he cried, first of all, for a drop of water to cool his tongue. That being denied him, his next agonizing prayer was, not for the damnation of any poor souls whom he had left on earth, but that a messenger might be sent to some of them, if only for a little season, to warn them not to come into that place of wo. Strange indeed, that a kinder purpose could be conceived in hell than is often to be found on earth. But it would seem, the first trial of what it was to be damned, in his own experience, aroused him as with a maddening impulse, to undo, if it were possible, some of the mischief he had done in life, and perhaps to wipe out the testimony of a thousand careless curses.—Cure for Swearing.

FOR THE INFIDEL.

A GREENLANDER'S REMARKS ON THE BEING OF A GOD.

A missionary being in company with some baptized Greenlanders, expressed his wonder how they could formerly lead such useless lives. One of them replied as follows: "It is true we were ignorant heathen, and knew nothing of God or a Savior; and indeed who should tell us of him till you came? But you must not suppose that no Greenlander thinks of these things. A kajak or boat, with all its tackle, could not come of itself, but must be made with great labor and skill, and one that does not understand it would directly spoil it. Now the meanest bird requires more skill to form it than a kajak; and no man can make a bird. But there is still greater art in making a man—who was it that made him? I thought he proceeded from his parents, and they from their parents; but some must have been the first parents; whence did they come? Common report says they grew out of the earth. But if so, why do not men still grow out of the earth? And from whence this same earth itself, the sea, the sun, moon, and stars come? Certainly some being must have made all these; and he must be greater, wiser, and more knowing than the wisest man. He must be very good too; because every thing that he has made is good, useful and necessary for us. Ah, did I but know him! But who has seen him? Who has spoken with him? None of us poor men. Yet there may be men, too, that know something of him. O, could I but speak with such! Therefore," said he, "as soon as ever I heard you speak of this great Being, I believed it directly with all my heart, because I had so long desired to hear it."

FOR THE YOUNG MAN.

Young men! by your weighty obligations to your country, be entreated to guard against sin, for it is 'righteousness' that 'exalteth a nation.' By your solemn responsibilities to your fellow men, be induced to exemplify in your lives, the purity and excellence of the gospel. By your dearest and most important interests, be excited to walk circumspectly, not as fools, but as wise." Eph. v. 15. By the solemnities of the last day, be persuaded to make the needful preparation to meet God, through repentance for sin, and faith in Jesus Christ. By all the glories that cluster around the Redeemer's cross, be constrained to "yield yourselves to God." Rom. vi. 13. Seek, before every thing else, his friendship through the merits of his Son. This will bring you lasting peace and substantial happiness; will cheer the darkest hour of your earthly pilgrimage; strengthen you under the heaviest trial which awaits you; convert the bed of death into a scene of triumph, and link the last pang of expiring nature with the first rapture of never-ending joy. Engrave upon your hearts the advice of the dying king of Israel to his royal son, and let it be the guide of your existence: "Solomon, my son, know thou the God of thy father, and serve him with a perfect heart, and with a willing mind: for the Lord searcheth all hearts, and understandeth all the imaginations of the thoughts: if thou seek him he will be found of thee; but if thou forsake him he will cast thee off for ever."—1 Chron. xxviii. 9.

FOR THE MISSIONARY.

The following is from the Home Missionary & Pastor's Journal. We insert it with the more pleasure as the facts and arguments in favor of Domestic Missionary operations, as well as the motives to faithfulness in diffusing the blessings of the gospel, are of universal application, and specially necessary to remove that comparative indifference to this subject which has been manifested by our own denomination for some time past.—EDS. REG.

THE INSTRUMENTALITY EMPLOYED BY THE HOME MISSIONARY SOCIETY, ONE OF DIVINE APPOINTMENT.

If there be any single fact, which, more than another, encourages the hope that Providence will continue to employ this Society as a well-adapted instrument of blessing to the nation, it is, that it confines itself strictly to a kind of agency, which has the express sanction of the divine authority. Many philanthropic devices result in utter failure, or mingle with the good which they accomplish, so much attending evil, as to leave it doubtful whether they are approved of God or not. But no such uncertainty attaches to the means employed by this Society. The SACRED MINISTRY is no experiment suggested by the wisdom of man; it is a positive institution of the Lord Jesus Christ. With all the resources of his illimitable empire before him, whence to select an agency for the conversion of the world, it hath "pleased God, through the foolishness of preaching, to save them that believe." This, alone, should give it precedency before all other instruments of good. But the institution of the ministry is reasonable as well as divine. If it behooved Christ to become a man, that he might be a High Priest adapted to the wants of men, it is no less suitable that the instruments of carrying out his system of salvation, should also be human. They must themselves be specimens of what his Gospel can do. They must exemplify, in their own persons, both the greatness of the malady and the efficacy of the cure. Since Christianity is not merely a creed to be believed, but also an experience to be felt, it is necessary that the agency for diffusing it should consist of living souls, capable of a religious experience—should themselves be under the law, knowing its dread power in their own consciences, and having the problem of salvation wrought out in the changes upon their own spirit, and illustrated in the panting conflict of their own warfare against sin.—That religion might not become a matter of mere traditionary forms, it is most wisely ordained that the instruments of continuing it in the world, must receive it, each for himself, in a large measure, fresh from the fountain head.

The living minister is, moreover, himself a partaker of all the relations of humanity—a son or a parent, a brother, a neighbor. His is a mode of presenting truth, which necessarily requires men to come together in public assemblies, and organizes them into churches, and employs their social nature in promoting their mutual good. No other agency can so use the attributes of the living man—the voice, pouring out the soul into the ear—the eye, flashing intelligence and feeling to the eye—and the air and action of a being all instinct with sympathy in the themes which he presses, and the hearts to whom he appeals. And to this kind of agency, the Redeemer has expressly pledged his presence and support, "even to the end of the world"—a fact that shows that it shall never be superseded by any other form of effort.

To this divine selection and adaptation of the ministry, is to be attributed its power to do more for the glory of God and the good of man, than any other institution on earth. In whatever aspect we view it, the proofs of its value to our country and the world, multiply upon our minds. The ministry is the great conservator of knowledge, human as well as divine. When, during the dark night of the world, the thick, damp mists of error and superstition had quenched all the great lights of science, the ministers of religion still fed a secret lamp, and cherished the flame which afterward illumined the whole civilized earth.—And—but for a few doubtful examples—we might ask, where are the schools and colleges in our own land, that have not been prayed into being by the ministry—that do not owe their whole plan and prosecution, from the first conception to the finished result, to the enlightened piety and persevering zeal of the clergy? And is there, now, any part of the land, where science has no temple and nature no interpreter, but where ignorance and passion divide the sway of imbruted minds? It is because there the power of the ministry is not felt. Are there within our borders, communities which do not reverence the majesty of law, who substitute physical force for the authority of reason? Send thither the heralds of the claims of God, and it will speedily respect the rights and yield subjection to the restraints of social order. Would we attempt a general reformation of morals, or the overthrow of some single giant vice? In the fore-front of the battle we must place the SACRED MINISTRY with its weapons of celestial point and temper—the only ones that can strike through all defences, right down upon the very life of the foe. But, above all, this is the appropriate and the appointed means to rescue immortal spirits from sin and hell. To attempt seriously, and to any considerable extent, to convert sinners, to organize and sustain religious institutions, without a sanctified and intelligent ministry, were both unphilosophical and impious—unphilosophical, because it would seek the end without the necessary means; and impious, because it would discredit the judgment and reverse the appointment of Jehovah himself.

To bring this powerful, heaven-selected instrument into the most extensive operation in our own country, is the object of the American Home Missionary Society. And is it too much to ask for our country, that she have the full benefit of the best means that Infinite Wisdom has devised, to save her children from the woes of the second death? Are not those with whom our connexion is the most intimate, and upon whom our influence is the most direct, entitled to our first & most strenuous efforts to afford relief? In the beautiful arrangement which God has made, our duties correspond with our relations. While the parent may not be indifferent to the welfare of his neighbor's child, he is specially bound to provide for his own, from the fact that he bears to it a relation from which all others are exempt. On the same principle, the suffering which lies immediately under our eye, has, other things being equal, a higher claim upon our kindness than more distant and less accessable forms of misery—we can reach it; and we are the nearest sources of relief to which it can make its appeal. We labor, then, for the moral welfare of our country, not from a selfish preference of it as our own, nor merely because of its intrinsic importance as a part of the world—the promised inheritance of the Redeemer; but because it is THE part which Heaven has specially assigned us, by placing it before and around us. Christians in America hold relations to this land such as they hold to no other land on the earth. GOD made those relations, and by making them, made it also our duty, to seek the highest elevation of our country in that righteousness which exalteth a nation. Who will do this if we do not? It is unreasonable to expect other lands to furnish the instrumentality to evangelize ours. No, this work belongs to American Christians. Ours are the social and political connexions, and all the other facilities for a home influence; and ours will be the guilt and the disaster if any part of this land have not the Gospel. The very position which Providence has allotted us is a natural reason—God's own reason—why upon us, and upon no others, the labor for its salvation should devolve. And this is in perfect coincidence with Christ's philosophy of the worlds's conversion. His injunction was, that the "Gospel be preached to all nations, begining at Jerusalem"—the principle involved in which is, that every disciple commence the work at once, and on the spot where the command overtakes him.

Nor will the benefits of our efforts be limited to this country alone. It is a most animating fact, that in promoting the moral elevation of our own people, we are engaged on the largest scale of the most productive philanthrophy. The converts to Christ, under the operation of Home Missions, are at once and forever, the advocates and agents for every other good cause. In them we see the perishable gold and silver of earth transmuted into the intelligence and virtue of living souls, whose consecrated affections, and strength, and treasures, form a capital that no arithmetic can compute, for sending the Gospel, on the printed page, and by the commissioned herald, to all mankind. While, then, the immediate and most obvious effect of Home Missions is upon our country, their ultimate and largest influence will be felt, in the invigorations of all those agencies which compass the whole circle of the earth, and seek to make of every lost son of Adam, a Christian and a brother. Thus, when a stone is cast into the water, the first and highest wave is that, which it makes immediately around itself; but philosophy assures us, that the spreading undulations are not lost as they recede, but roll away to swell the wave that breaks upon the remotest strand of the globe.

While, then, to make full proof of the power of the Gospel to save this nation, is our first duty, it is by no means our last. It is a preparation for a larger work—a preparation so necessary, that to omit or to postpone it, is a fraud upon a dying world. Christ holds this generation of his followers responsible, to send the Gospel to all mankind; and how long shall our own uncultured wastes furnish a reason for delaying our share in the work? How long shall the tribes of earth then move before our eyes, in sad procession, down to the shades of eternal death, because the hearts and the treasures of this land, which should be devoted to their rescue, are themselves, for the most part, yet unredeemed from the power of Satan?

It is, therefore, with a deeper sense than ever of its intrinsic worth and its momentous bearings, that the Executive Committee commend the Home Missionary cause to the love and labors of all good men. It is not a cause of ephemoral importance. It has indeed little to amuse an idle fancy, or that appeals to a romantic piety; but it takes a deep hold of hearts that are thoughtful for the honor of God and the welfare of man. Its interest is of that stern and awful kind, which belongs only to great themes—to souls in jeopardy—to the approaching crisis of a nation's doom—to the rescue or the ruin of unnumbered myriads. We commend it to those who ponder the causes and progress of national elevation and decline—to those who are sagacious to discern the coming of the kingdom of Heaven—to those who have power with God, and compassion for man, and wisdom to appreciate and to employ the sacred ministry, as the grand organ of salvation. We ask them to way the cause of this Society in the balances of the sanctuary; to estimate the work, which, as the instrument of the Holy Spirit, it has already accomplished; to measure, if they can, the worth of the souls it would save, and the physical and moral greatness of the nation it seeks to mould; and then, also, to compute the consequences of failure, developed in the crime and anarchy and bloodshed of a people without God, and the deeper ruin of spirits for ever lost. From these considerations, let them form their decision how much effort and prayer, and treasure, they ought to devote to Missions at home. The putting forth of endeavors bearing some fair proportion to the end, will be the signal for such days as earth has never seen. Even now, the blessing is waiting for us; it is impatient of our delay. Let the American churches, then, arise in earnest to the conquest of this whole land to Christ, and verily they shall not have gone over all the cities of our Israel ere the Son of Man shall come!

RESISTING CONSCIENCE.—To go on in a course of defection, when an enlightened conscience is stirring and looking you in the face, and crying within you that you are going in an evil way, is a step to the sin against the Holy Ghost. When the truth is come to your hand, hold it fast; go not again to make a search and new inquiry for truth. It is easy to cast your light into prison, and detain God's truth in unrighteousness, but that prisoner will break ward, to your incomparable torture.—Rutherford.

"God resisteth the proud;"—singles out pride for his grand enemy and sets himself in battle array against it. "But he giveth grace,"—pours it plentifully on humble hearts. His sweet dews and showers of grace slide off the mountains of pride, and fall on the low valleys of humble hearts, and make them pleasant and fertile.—Leighton.

"There is one single fact that one may oppose to all the wit and argument of infidelity, viz: that no man ever repented of Christianity on his death-bed."—Hannah Moore.

CORRESPONDENCE.

For the Register.

MESSRS. EDITORS.—I send you the following minutes of the proceedings of the Missionary Society at its session in September last, for publication in the Register. I think they will be found nearly entire with the exception of the report of the Executive Committee, the original manuscript of which, (together with the revised minutes and ten dollars from the Treasurer of the Society,) was early handed over to John Davis, the committee of publication, and was by some means lost. This circumstance brother Davis can probably better explain than myself.

SILAS BAILEY.

The A. S. D. B. Missionary Society convened at Brookfield, Madison Co. N. Y., Sept. 10th, 1839.

Prayer by Eld. N. V. Hull.

The report of the Executive Committee was then presented and laid on the table.

T. S. Alberti reported that he had sold one string of the gold beads left in his care, and returned the other.

Resolved, That the report be received, and brother Alberti be instructed to pay the amount over to the Treasurer.

Resolved, That the remaining string of beads be returned to the donor, agreeable to request.

The Society then proceeded to the choice of officers for the ensuing year. The following were chosen:

ORSON CAMPBELL, President.
DAVID DUNN,
JOHN MAXSON,
AZOR ESTEE,
H. H. BAKER,
NATHAN V. HULL, } Vice Pres't.
HENRY C. HUBBARD, Treasurer.
LUCIUS CRANDALL, Rec. Sec'y.
JOHN WRIGHT,
SOLOMON CARPENTER, } Corres. Sec'ys.
ORSON CAMPBELL,
W. D. WILLCOX,
S. CARPENTER,
H. C. HUBBARD,
MARTIN WILLCOX, } Exec. Com.
JAMES R. IRISH,
JOHN BRIGHT,
GEO. P. MAXSON, } Auditing Com.

The Committee to prepare business for this session of the Society, presented their report which was received. Adjourned for one hour.

Met agreeable to adjournment. Prayer by J. R. Irish.

The proposed amendment to the 13th article of the Constitution was read and adopted.

The proposed amendment to the 2d article was laid on the table.

A communication contained in the minutes of the Western Association, was presented by J. R. Irish.

Resolved, That a Committee of three be appointed to investigate the manner in which the business of this Society has hitherto been conducted, as presented in said communication.

The Chair announced Stillman Coon, N. V. Hull, and Martin Willcox, a committee on fields of labor.

Resolved, That the evening of the Sabbath be spent in discussing resolutions which may come before the Society. Adjourned to the call of the President.

The Society met at the call of the President. Prayer by Eld. E. S. Bailey.

The Treasurer's report was then read and referred to a select committee consisting of H. H. Baker, John Swinney, and Barton G. Stillman.

A committee consisting of Joel Greene, Adin Burdick, Ephraim Maxson, and Isaac Titsworth, was appointed to examine and explain the causes of complaint presented by Henry Crandall, as former Treasurer in reference to the minutes of last year.

Resolved, That we require our agents to make their reports in detail, specifying the names of individuals and the sums received from each, and that the Treasurer be required to specify in his report, the names of agents and the sums received from each. Adjourned one and a half hours.

Met agreeable to adjournment. Prayer by L. D. Ayres.

H. H. Baker presented a report as Agent which was adopted.

The Committee on the Treasury reported that at the last session of the Society, there was received of S. M. Burdick, Treasurer pro. tem. $90,00, cr. as follows:

H. H. BAKER,
B. G. STILLMAN,
JOHN SWINNEY, } Com.

Resolved, That said report be received and adopted.

The committee to whom was referred the complaint of Henry Crandall, the Ex-Treasurer of the Society, respecting the auditing committee of 1838, reported that they had investigated the subject and come to the conclusion that the Committee did not mean to impugn the motives, or distrust the ability of brother Crandall in the discharge of his duty as Treasurer, but that he had not the means to make a satisfactory report, and of course, that no blame should be attached to brother Crandall or the Committee. Report Adopted.

Resolved, That the Executive Committee have power to audit the accounts of John Maxson, for services rendered in 1838.

Ira B. Crandall was appointed Agent for South Brookfield.

The Executive Committee concluded their report, which was referred to the Auditing Committee, and also the Treasurer's report.

The Committee on fields of labor, presented their report, which was referred to the Executive Committee to act as they may deem proper in the premises.

Resolved, That the scattered brethren in the western part of this State, and in Ohio, and Indiana, be recommended to support from this Society. Adjourned to the call of the President.

First day afternoon, met at the call of the President. Prayer by John Maxson.

The Auditing Committee reported as follows:—Your committee to whom was referred the account of the Missionaries, and the report of the Executive Committee, together with the Treasurer's report, beg leave to present the following:

JOHN BRIGHT,
J. R. IRISH,
G. P. MAXSON. } Auditing Com.

The report was read and adopted.

The committee appointed for the purpose reports the following:—Your Committee, to whom was referred the complaint of the Western Association relative to the mismanagement of the funds of this Society, beg leave to report, as no specific charges are prefered, and that your committee not being in possession of the necessary information to enable them to investigate the subject, do therefore request to be discharged from the further consideration of the subject.

STILLMAN COON, Ch'n. of Com.

Resolved, That the report be received and the Committee discharged according to request.

Resolved, That the Executive Committee be requested to instruct the local agents to collect the principal due on all notes, given to constitute life-membership, as far as practicable by the first day of September 1841, and make at that time a full report of the same, and also of the probable ability and intention to pay all that may at that time remain in their hands unpaid.

Resolved, That the estate of Clark Stillman be released from the payment of the notes the Society hold against it, making himself, wife, and child, life members of the Society.

Resolved, That Silas Bailey revise the minutes of the Society for publication.

Resolved, That they be printed in connection with the minutes of the General Conference, and that ten dollars be appropriated for the same.

Resolved, That John Davis superintend the printing and distribution of the Minutes.

Resolved, That Eld. John Davis be appointed to preach the introductory discourse at our next Anniversary, and that W. B. Gillet be his substitute.

The Treasurer pro. tem. reported as follows:

THE REGISTER.

De Ruyter, June 30, 1840.

Mr. GEORGE P. MAXSON is a traveling agent for this paper.

 POST MASTERS may enclose money in a letter to the publisher of a newspaper, to pay the subscription of a third person, and frank the letter if written by himself.—POST-MASTER GENERAL.

TO THE PRESS.

We owe an apology to our brethren of the Press for our neglect to send them the Register last week. We have been fortunate enough to receive an unusual number of new subscribers since the commencement of our second quarter, and on making up our mails we found ourselves unable to supply all our subscribers, and were under the necessity of neglecting our exchange list except in a few cases. We thought this the better course, believing that our humble sheet would hardly be missed on the tables of our editorial brethren. It is not probable that there will be any need of a similar apology again, as we think we have made full provision for any increase of patronage with which a liberal public may favor us.

A PREDICTION.—Patronage we ask not, for if we deserve it we shall have it. If we get out a good paper promptly, mail it with care, so that all our subscribers will get it by the earliest means regularly, they WILL stand by us.

So says the Olive Leaf, an excellent paper, by the way, devoted to Temperance, Religion, Literature, &c., and this we believe to be true. It is certain there is a redundancy of periodicals in our country, and that many of them might be dispensed with without an injury to the public; yet a temperate, well-conducted journal, in this age of reading and improvement, need not fail of a living support. The readiest way to secure patronage, is to make a paper valuable and interesting. Then the people will not need much importunity to induce them to do what inclination and interest dictate. It will be our constant aim to profit the readers of our paper; and if we succeed in accomplishing our object in this respect, we do not fear being neglected by the public.

CELEBRATION.—It will be seen by a notice in another column, that our National Independence is to be celebrated in this village on the third of July, instead of the fourth. This arrangement was made in deference to the views and feelings of a portion of our citizens, who would have been prevented by their sense of religious obligation from a participation in the celebration on the seventh day of the week; and it reflects much credit on our citizens for their liberality of feeling and sentiment.—We sincerely hope that the exercises of the day may be such as to leave a good impression on the minds of the community, and that all who engage in the celebration may cherish the feelings of gratitude for the immunities we enjoy as a nation and as a community, both civil and religious.

In consequence of having devoted so much space in this and the former No. of the Register to matters of a denominational character, we shall occupy less room in our editorial department than usual, and devote more to general intelligence.

☞ We insert the law respecting the transmission of money, etc., by Post-Masters, under our head, in the hope that subscribers, and those who wish to become so, will avail themselves of its provisions, and thereby relieve us from unnecessary expenses.

☞ Those subscribers who complain that they are not regularly served with the Register, are again assured that the paper is invariably mailed one day in advance of our publication day, with the utmost care; and that the blame (if there is any) attaches to some other person than the publishers or the Post-Master in this village.

Notice.

There will be an Anti-Slavery Convention at Cincinnatus, Cortland co., on the 10th day of July, at 10 o'clock, A. M.

J. N. T. TUCKER.

Apulia, June 20.

CORRESPONDENTS.—We have a number of communications on hand which will be disposed of as soon as convenient.

THREE QUESTIONS FOR CHILDREN.

1. Why is the prayer which you repeat, "Our Father who art in heaven," called the Lord's Prayer?

Ans. It is the prayer which Jesus Christ taught his disciples.

2. Why is the partaking of the bread and the cup, by the church, called the Lord's Supper?

Ans. It is the supper which Jesus Christ instituted to commemorate his death.

3. Why is the first day of the week called the Lord's day?

Ans. It is the day on which Christ arose from the dead, and has ever since been sacredly observed in commemoration of that event.—N. Y. Evangelist.

To these questions we beg leave to append the following for older people and divines, viz:

Where is the law to be found in the Bible which requires this "sacred observance?" And can there be in all the range of christian obligation an un-commanded duty? Echo says, "Where?"—"Can there be?"

SUBLIME POETRY.

A correspondent of Blackwood, thus paraphrases some of the predictions of Malachi:

A sound on the rampart,
A sound at the gate,
I hear the roused lioness
Howl to her mate.
In the thicket at midnight
They roar for their prey
That shall glut their red jaws
At the rising of day.
For wrath is descending
On Zion's proud tower
It shall come like a cloud,
It shall wrap like a shroud,
Till like Sodom, she sleeps
In a sulphurous shower.

For behold! the day cometh,
When all shall be flame,
When Zion! the sackcloth
Shall cover thy name
When thy bark o'er the billows
Of Death shall be driven;
When thy tree by the lightnings
From earth shall be riven;
When the oven, unkindled
By mortal, shall burn;
And chaff thou shalt glow
In that furnace of wo;
And, dust as thou wert,
Thou to dust shalt return.

'Tis the darkness of darkness,
The midnight of soul!
No noon on the depths
Of that midnight shall roll.
No starlight shall pierce
Through the life-chilling blaze;
No torch from the roof
Of the temple shall blaze.
But, when Israel is buried
In final despair,
From a height over all,
God of God, Light of Light;
Here the sun shall arise—
Her great Sovereign be there!

Then the sparkles of flame,
From the chariot-wheels hurl'd,
Shall smite the crown'd brow
Of the god of this world!
Then captive of ages!
The trumpet shall thrill
From the lips of the seraph
On Zion's sweet hill.
For, vestured in glory,
Thy monarch shall come.
And from dungeon and cave
Shall ascend the pale slave,
Lost Judah shall rise,
Like the soul from the tomb!

Who pushes from Heaven?
The angel of wrath;
The whirlwind his wing,
And the lightning his path!
His hand is uplifted,
It carries a sword;
'Tis ELIJAH! he heralds
The march of his Lord!
Sun, sink in eclipse!
Earth, earth, shalt thou stand,
When the cherubim wings
Bear the King of thy kings!
Wo, wo, to the ocean,
Wo, wo, to the land!

'Tis the day long foretold,
'Tis the judgment begun;
Gird thy sword, Thou most Mighty!
Thy triumph is won.
The idol shall burn
In his own gory shrine;
Then, daughter of anguish,
Thy day-spring shall shine!
Proud Zion, thy vale
With the olive shall bloom,
And the mask-rose distil
Its sweet dews on thy hill;
For earth is restored,
The great kingdom come!

For the Register.

OUR NATIONAL ANNIVERSARY.

This memorable day is just at hand. It will be celebrated in a great variety of mode, and the loss of limb and life will probably be among the detail of results in some places. National celebrations have a powerful influence in forming national character. When the 4th of July shall be properly observed universally, it will exert a most happy influence upon the morals and manners of the nation. Every sectional celebration of the right sort, therefore, is of great importance. Among those who sustain the national mode of noticing the day, there is a difference of opinion on the question, Shall we read the Declaration of Independence? In the minds of some the reading of this document is so intimately associated with the noisy, powder-burning, fist-fighting, and rum-drinking celebrations of former days, that they choose not to hear it. Also it is said, that the public repetition, year after year, of what king George the Third did to injure and oppress the colonies, seems too much like reviving up an old family quarrel; this being peculiarly unpleasant in view of the frequent and happy intercourse now maintained between the pious men of this country and Great Britain. These and other objections have been urged against the reading of the Declaration; but my opinion is that the document should be read. It contains great principles of fundamental truth which the ears of the people should hear every fourth of July; and they ought to hear them from that paper.

I am gratified to learn that arrangements are made for a juvenile celebration in this village, to be conducted under Temperance and Sabbath-school auspices. As we celebrate on the 3d, I hope that some of our friends from adjacent towns will unite with us in our efforts to make the day interesting.

J. R. J.

THE REV. SAMUEL R. WARD.

I think that the people of this village are grateful for the visit of this colored preacher of the gospel; I know they have abundant reason to be. At his Anti-Slavery Lecture last evening, the body of the Presbyterian church was filled, and Mr. Ward gave us practical demonstration, that this difficult and immensely important topic could be thoroughly discussed without using any terms having the appearance of angry petulence.

Mr. Ward is but 23 years of age. May the Lord continue his life, and make him a great blessing to the world. J. R. J.

INTELLIGENCE.

FOREIGN.

From the N. Y. Commercial Advertiser.

ARRIVAL OF THE GREAT WESTERN.

NINETEEN DAYS LATER FROM EUROPE.

At an early hour this morning we received our papers by the Great Western, Capt. Hoskin. Capt. H. arrived a little before we expected him, but we will not find fault. The Western left her anchorage at King's Road, at fifteen minutes after one o'clock on the afternoon of the 4th of June, and took her New York pilot at 12 o'clock yesterday, a long distance from Sandy Hook. The Western has had but a few hours of Easterly wind during her passage, but being favored generally with light breezes, although Westerly, her passage has been very short. The Western it will be recollected, left New York on the 9th of May, and arrived out on the morning of the 23d.

Our London papers are to the evening of the 2d of June, Liverpool the 3d, and Bristol the 4th, all inclusive.

Correspondence of the Commercial Advertiser, dated Paris, June 1, 1840

The ministry of M. Thiers seems to have taken deep root, and what is still more, his radical Excellency declares that nothing shall disturb him in his possesion. In fact,

> "He doth bestride the world
> Like a Collossus."

A few days since M. Berryer, the celebrated legitimist supporter of the fallen dynasty, having occasion to transact business with the foreign office, remarked that he had not entered that cabinet since the time of the Prince de Polignac, the ill-stared minister of Charles X. "Ah!" replied M. Thiers, "there is this difference between Polignac and me. He was obliged to turn out, but all the powers on earth shall not remove me." It is not unlikely that Thiers may have formed a correct estimate of his own power, inasmuch as the King seems to have no alternative than to retain him; for on the one hand, a ministry taken from the extreme conservatives would be hissed down by the people and defeated in the chamber, so as to render all government impossible—and on the other, a ministry formed only of the radical party would level the throne to the ground. The minister possesses one admirable quality—that of cajoling all parties without being obliged to submit to the exigencies of either; so that he is considered by his bitterest enemies as in some measure indispensable at the present hour.

He has an other excellent quality in a minister, that of accomodating his logic to every event. When he obtained of the Chambers the customary vote of secret service money, it was under an express engagement on his part, no longer to subsidize the public journals. Since that time one hundred and twenty thousand francs of the secret funds have been given for the purchase of the principle evening journal, the Messenger. On being reproved for this dereliction of common principle, he replied—"True it is that I promised, not to subsidize, but I never denied myself the right to purchase." Admirable logician!

The revolutionary propositon to convert the 160 functionaries of the Chamber of Deputies into honest voters, after having "dragged its slow length along" the committees during the last month, has at length nearly emerged in that form in which it is to be presented to the Chamber for discussion. The reporter, M. Maurat Ballange, has proposed to the committee to declare all the following functions to be incompattible with that of a Deputy of the Chamber; prefects, sub-prefects, counsellors of prefecture, receivers, paymasters, lieut. generals commanding territorial divisions, camp marshals commanding departments, the govenor of Algiers, ambassadors and plenipotentiary ministers, persons employed in the offices of embassy, colonels in command of a corps, all stipendiaries of the civil list, procurators general of the royal courts, king's procurators, and all the members of the parquet, or chambers of the king's procurators or advocates, presidents of the tribunals of first instance, justices of peace, engineers of the navy and of the public roads and bridges, and all the clerks of ministerial offices. This proposal will, it is expected, be discussed to-morrow.

The points already agreed to by the committee are the following;—

By a majority of five against four, the committee proposes that persons, who are not functionaries before election, shall not receive salaried appointments after election, not only during their legislature but during the subsequent one. It admits, however, exceptions in favor of ministers, under secretaries of state, secretaries general, directors general, prefect of police, prefect of the Seine, procurator general of the royal court at Paris, grand chancellor of the legion of honor, president of the council of state, commander-in-chief of the national guard at Paris, governor general of Algiers, ambassadors and plenipotentiary ministers, and the governor of the Bank.

But functionaries appointed previous to their elections as deputies may receive promotion in the regular hierarchical order of succession, as for instance in offices by death or resignation of superiors. What will be the result of the discusion before the Chamber I will not venture to predict. Thiers advocated the measure out of office, but as the votes of the functionaries will be very useful to him in office, and as he has a very accommodating ductility of conscience, it is not unlikely he will find some means of plausibly belying his former principles.

The translation of the relics of Napoleon from St. Helena occupies a large space of public attention.

The Chamber has allowed a million for the ceremony of translation, but the Government demand two. The people threaten to fill up the deficiency, and the subscription for the purpose has reached 20-000 francs, but the Chamber begins to regret of its parsimony, and will probably grant a supplementary credit in case of need.

The Chamber of Peers have thrown out the bill for reducing the five pr. cents, which the Deputies had passed.

The French have given another splendid lesson to the Arabs in Algiers, by a sanguinary defeat in one of their strongest holds, the defiles of Teniak. As these defiles were on the direct road to Medeah, the chief city of Abdel Kader, he had taken care to fortify them by the assistance of the deserters from the French army. An expedition of 8000 men sent against Medeah, attacked Abdel Kader in his entrenchments, and after a murderous conflict with a loss of 1200 French, the redoubts were all captured. The French army then proceeded to Medeah, which they captured without a shot fired upon them; for the Arab force, camped upon the heights which commanded the town, retreated when the cannon began to roar, and the whole population accompanied it. The French princes distinguished themselves in this expedition, and were the first among the storming parties.

Accounts of another victory, though on a smaller scale, have just arrived from Oran, dated the 18th of May. The Khalef Bouhameide, who had, on a former occasion, by superior numerical force, gained the advantage over the French, was emboldened to try his luck a second time and carry off a tribe of the allied Douaires. He has been severely beaten with a loss of 100 men. The French having, by means of their artillery, kept the enemy at a distance, lost only two.

After remaining three days at Medeah, the marshal returned with the Princess, and at the foot of the mountains of Mouzaia he found the whole of the Arab force in waiting for him. Another sanguinary conflict took place, in which the Arabs were beaten, as usual, with immense loss. The French lost two hundred killed and wounded.

The captured town of Cherchell has been again the object of a vigorous attack on the part of the Arabs, and the French have sustained a severe loss, though the enemy was beaten off and doubtless with still greater loss. The French have been indebted to the diminution of the garrison of Cherchell, for the repeated conflicts they have had to endure in that quarter.

In my last I mentioned the loss of 500 hundred cattle, just sustained by the French in Algiers, through the abominable carelessness of their martial administrators in that province. This formed an admirable pendant to the three hundred heads of the colonists carried away by the Arabs as a trophy of their dexterity. But the French, if they cannot avert mischief, know how to avenge it. Accordingly, the Governor very coolly marched four thousand men into the territory of the Aractars, and brought away forty thousand head of cattle, of various sorts. I allow a little draw back on French bulletins, but I must give them as they arrive to me.

Within a few days another camp, that of Arbas at the foot of the Atlas, has been abandoned, on account of the dreadful mortality that raged within. This is the 4th camp which has been broken up, after immense expense and labor had been bestowed upon their construction. The Princes have now returned in good health.

The general London money market has not materially varied. Exchanges, however are against England—and silver continues to be exported.

American securities are very much depressed. Last sales of Pennsylvania, 76 1-2; Indiana, 68. Shares, £15 16s. a £16.

The King of Prussia died on the 26th ult.

The affairs of Naples and England are considered settled.

M. Thiers has obtained a vote of the Chamber of Deputies for the construction of steam vessels to ply between Havre and New York and other ports of this continent.

The loan (Rothschilds') of the Bank of the U. S. is steady in Paris at 98. New York state at the same price. City of New York 92. Ohio 6 per cents 103 1-2.

There is no other news of importance.

SUMMARY.

An English paper, (the Liverpool Standard,) says the United States will receive this year from that port alone an accession to their population of between twenty and thirty thousand souls, embracing emigrants from England, Ireland, Wales, Scotland and Germany.

Crops of all kinds are said to be in a most flourishing condition in New Jersey.

Another Fire in New Orleans.—Fifteen buildings were destroyed by fire in New Orleans on the 9th inst. The fire commenced in the Cotton Pickery of Mr. Leper, on Picaneer's street, and destroyed five houses on that side of the street; then crossed over and consumed six on the opposite side of the street; then it crossed over to Annunciation street, burned four buildings, and was arrested by a vacant lot. Loss estimated at $30,000. A boy, about ten years old, had several of his limbs broken by the falling of a wall.

Fire at York, Eng.—The Cathedral at York, (usually called Yorkminster, and justly termed the pride of England,) was partially destroyed by fire on the 20th ult. The belfry was reduced to a shell, and the fine peal of ten bells feel to the ground.—The screen and organ escaped injury.—It was the work of an incediary. Several persons observed a light in the south-west tower of the building a little before 9 in the evening; but as the works connected with the clock had been undergoing repairs, nothing was thought of it at the time.—Soon, however, the tower was discovered to be in flames—the alarm was given, and soon the engines were on the spot, but for want of a proper supply of water the fire was not brought under till near two in the morning. The incendiary, Martin, made an unsuccessful attempt to fire the same tower of the Cathedral in Feb. 1829.

Natches.—This doomed city has been visited by another severe storm which caused considerable damage to the neighboring plantations in the destruction of Negro quarters, &c. &c. A Mr. Maidis was badly wounded, having his shoulder dislocated and a hip contused in consequence of the falling of the building he was in at the time.

Ex-Governor Isaac Hill, of New Hampshire has been appointed President of the Mechanics' Bank at Concord.

A Carnival, of three days, has been held at Raleigh, N. C. on the occasion of the opening of the Gaston & Raleigh Rail Road.

Rev. Mr. Badger, a Presbyterian clergyman, offered prayer at the political convention at Fort Meigs. He was a soldier in the Revolution, and a chaplain in the army at Fort Meigs, during the seige. Twenty five thousand persons are said to have been present at the covention. Why will not people evince as much interest in reference to their eternal welfare as in political and other subjects?

Novel Freak of Nature.—Enoch A. Camp, in a letter to the Editor of the Journal of Commerce, says he has a horse which has a living snake, eel, or non-descript animal above four inches long by one-eigth in circumference, constantly swimming inside of the left eye-ball, within the aqueous humor of the eye.

The Messrs. Harpers of New York, have published the 100th volume of the Family Library. The volume is entitled "Outlines of disordered mental action," and is by Professor Upham of Bowdoin College.

The Legislature of Pennsylvania adjourned at midnight on Thursday.

Unostentatious Generosity.—Monroe Edwards of the parish of Iberville, Louisiana, has manumitted one hundred and sixty slaves. He is now in this city, and has the deed of manumission prepared at Wright & Walkers office, from whom we derived this information.—Cin. Gazette.

Dead Bodies.—The New Orleans Bee, of the 23d ult. states that the steamboat Hinds, which was wrecked during the tornado at Natchez, had been picked up at Baton Rogue, having 51 dead bodies on board, 48 of whom were males, 2 females and one child.—Olive Branch.

Congress still continues in session. At last accounts, the Senate was debating the bankrupt bill, and the House the Sub-Treasury bill under consideration.

The President of the United States has officially recognized Wm. Peter, as consul of Great Britain for the State of Pennsylvania, to reside at Philadelphia.—Post.

A vein of Iron Ore, about three feet in thickness, has recently been discovered at Mauch Chunk, and 500 tons have been sent to the Lehigh Crane Iron Works for trial. It is supposed that it will yield 50 per cent.

There was ice of the thickness of a dollar at Hallowell, Me. June 2d.

Naval.—U. S. frigate Columbia, Com. Read, last from Rio Janeiro, arrived below this port on Saturday afternoon, and anchored outside the Light, awaiting a favorable wind to pass the Narrows. The Columbia has been absent from home upwards of twenty-five months, having left Norfolk, May 6, 1838, on a cruise to the Pacific Ocean, China sea, &c. during which, in company with the sloop of war John Adams, she visited the coast of Sumatra, Singapore, Bombay, Hong Kong, the Sandwich Islands, and many other places. She left Callao, March 9, and Rio Janeiro, May 6. The John Adams sailed for the latter port in company for New York, and was expected to touch at Martinique. Both ships have circumnavigated the Globe. The Columbia has lost seventy of her crew during the cruise, chiefly from dysentery, which made its appearance at the time she visited Hong Kong Bay.—Boston Advertiser.

The new Bank Law of Pennsylvania requires the Banks of that State, in proportion to their capital, to loan the State $3,000,000, if demanded within one year from the date of the law, receiving in exchange for said loan, State certificates bearing 5 per cent. interest and payable in not exceeding 24 years. If after the resumption of specie payments on the 15th of January next, any of the banks again suspend, ther charters are to be forfeited.—N. Y. Jour. of Com.

A Shocking Suicide.—A farmer named Aaron Morton, a resident of Delaware co., Pa., committed suicide on Saturday by cutting his throat. He recently attached himself to a society of Socialists, one of whose tenets permits a violation of the marriage rites. A short time ago, after visiting Philadelphia, he returned home, accompanied by several members of the society, male and female, and by his conduct soon induced his wife, a very respectable woman, to abandon his dwelling and take shelter in the house of a relative. Some time after, he told one of the inmates of his family that he had taken arsenic, and while a messenger was in search of a physician, he cut his throat, and thus terminated his life.

Fatal Duel in Texas.—We learn verbally that Colonel Lysander Wells of the Texan army, a native of Middletown where his widowed mother and sister reside, recently fell in a duel, mortally wounded, having instantly killed his antagonist Capt. Read, who, it is said, spent some time last year in this city. This event is too painful for remark; and it is unnecessary, as nothing can preach a louder sermon against the sin of duelling, which has thus overwhelmed an amiable family with inexpressible sorrow, and hurried two of our fellow men so awfully into the world of spirits.

The pirates who lately captured the English brig Vernon, off Cape Antonio, Cuba, murdering the captain, Cunningham, and two men, are in prison at Havanna. And at their preliminary examination, a spectator says, "the cold blooded recitals of these demons made his heart shrink within him." They resided at Regia, and were well known at Havanna.

The new bridge across the Allegany, connecting Pittsburgh with Allegany town, just completed at an expense of $70,000, is 1057 feet long and 42 wide. On the top is a delightful walk, 12 feet wide, safely protected on each side by hand railings and lattice work. It is the fourth bridge across this river within a distance of a mile.

Opium.—In a communication from Joseph Sturge, which we find in a late number of the London Times, it is stated that the East India Company have ordered the continuance of the cultivation of opium for the supply of China in 1841.—Jour. of Com.

Affray at St. Louis.—Mr. Andrew J. Davis, proprietor (but not editor) of the St Louis Argus, was attacked in one of the streets of that city, June 1st, by Wm P. Darnes, who struck him several times on the head with an iron cane, fracturing his skull in several places, and rendering his recovery doubtful. Davis was unarmed.—Darnes was arrested and committed to prison, bail being refused. The cause of the attack was something that had been printed in said paper.

Anniversary of Independence.

JUVENILE CELEBRATION.

De Ruyter, July 3d.

The Committee of Arrangements respectfully invite the inhabitants in the vicinity, whether of this town, or towns adjacent, to unite with the citizens of this village in celebrating the 64th Anniversary of American Independence.

The occasion will be celebrated on Friday the 3d of July, so that all the inhabitants may unite.

The celebration is especially designed for youth, but the Committee will, as far as possible, make arrangements for the entertainment of all.

The following will be the order of the day:—

Place of rendezvous, Institution grounds, at 10 o'clock A. M., where the citizens and youth will be formed into procession, and march to the Presbyterian Meeting-House.

1. Music.
2. President, Vice President, Clergy. Orator and Reader.
3. Youths marshalled under their respective committees of Ladies and Gentlemen.
4. Citizens and Strangers.

ORDER OF EXERCISES IN THE CHURCH.

1. Music.
2. Prayer.
3. Music.
4. Declaration of Independence.
5. Music.
6. Address.
7. Music.
8. Benediction.
9. Music.

The Procession will form in the same order and return to the Institution grounds, where refreshments will be provided in a bower erected for the occasion.

Committee of Arrangements.

Wm. D. Cochran,
Z. T. Bentley,
George Sears,
S. D. Dellay,
Noah Worth,
Jason L. Burdick,
James Whitford.

A CARD.

The inhabitants in the vicinity are invited to subscribe for the entertainment on July 3d. Those who may wish to send materials for cookery, will have the goodness to do so by the morning of the 2d. Money received at any time previous to the exercises. Any of the Committee of Arrangements will receive donations and subscriptions.

De Ruyter, June 29th, 1840.

Notice.

The South-Western S. D. Baptist Association will hold its second annual session with the church in New Salem, Harrison Co., Va., commencing on the fifth day of the week before the fourth Sabbath in August next. A full delegation, and punctual attendance is requested.

J. BAILEY, Sec'y.

MARRIED,

From the Episcopal Recorder.

THE DEATH OF ADDISON.

Calmly the dying man
Turn'd on his bed;
Friends around sorrowing
Not a word said—
Raising his voice, tho'
Dim was his eye,
"See how serenely
"A Christian can die.

Soon in the realms above
"I shall be free—
"Will not the friends I love
"Come join with me?
"Leaving this load of clay
"Upwards I fly,
"O! with what calmness
"A Christian can die.

"Hark! 'tis my Savior calls—
"Lord! I obey—
"Thou art the truth, the life
"Thou art the way—
"Death has no terrors now,
Far off they fly,
"See with what triumph
"A Christian can die!"

CONNECTICUT VALLEY.

The following picture of the valley of the Connecticut, is from the pen of the Rev. Charles Daubney, Professor at Oxford, England, who visited this country in 1837.

"Sandstone rock appears to form the substratum throughout the whole of this delightful valley of Connecticut, not more celebrated for the pleasing features of its scenery, than for the general comfort, thriftiness, and respectability of its rural population. In its general style of cultivation, in the absence of those extensive forests so common elsewhere in the United States, and in the appearance which the trees present, from being dotted about in groups and patches instead of collected into large masses, the valley reminded me of some of the better parts of England; while the profusion of glistening white paint bestowed on the exterior of the wooden dwellings, and, in general, the studious neatness and almost quakerlike primness displayed in their domestic arrangement, more resembled what we may see in Holland.

"But in what other part of the world shall we have occasion to witness, not merely that absence of squalid poverty, but in such perfection that aurea medocritas, which it needs no republican predilections to contemplate with satisfaction!

"It is indeed a condition of society which no system of government could create, but which is the happy and spontaneous result of a combination of circumstances rarely found to occur, the union of frugality and moral habits, with an universal diffusion of education,—few opportunities of amassing wealth, and yet sufficient inducements existing for steady industry,—a spirit of independence manifesting itself indeed too often in a repulsive coldness of manner, but not unaccompanied with a due respect for public opinion,—all these elements of prosperity secured to the inhabitants for a long period of time, by the ready outlet afforded to any redundant population, and what is of more importance still, by the tendency in the body politic to throw off instanter its pecant humors, owing to the temptations held out for its more turbulent and restless members to emigrate into other lands.

"These are amongst the circumstances which render the condition of the inhabitants of this favored valley so enviable, and which place them at an equal distance from the exuberant wealth and lavish display of a commercial metropolis, as they are from the rudeness and the destitution which are the inevitable concomitants of every newly formed community."—Chronicle of the Church.

THE JEWS LOVE OF JUDEA.—The most interesting circumstance which presents itself to my mind in recalling what I saw of the Hebrew nation in the East, is the universal diffusion of the love, the undying love of the Jews, for their own Judea, the Canaan of their fathers. Who could see without emotion thousands of poor Israelites, who from the remotest parts of Europe have made their way—by long and weary pilgrimage—through privations incalculable, and suffering without end—often shoeless and almost clotheless—friendless, and pennyless, that they might see the city of David, and lay their bones in the bosom of Jerusalem! What multitudes are there among them who have sold their last possession—having gathered together their little, their insufficient all—and have started, marching towards the rising sun, from the Vistula, the Dnieper and the Danube, on a journey as long as perilous! How many have perished exhausted, on their way!—How many that have landed at Joppa, or crossing the Taurus at Antioch, have been unable, from over exhaustion, to reach their longed for goal! How many have sunk in sight of the Mount of Olives! and how many have closed their eyes in peace and blessedness, when the privilege has been vouchsafed to them of treading within the walls of Salem.—Dr. Bowring.

THINGS LOST FOREVER.—Lost wealth may be regained by a course of industry—the wreck of health repaired by temperance—forgotten knowledge restored by study—alienated friendship soothed into forgiveness—even forfeited reputation won back by penitence and virtue. But who ever again looked upon his vanished honor—recalled his slighted years, and stamped them with wisdom—or effaced from Heaven's record the fearful blot of a wasted life?—Mrs. Sigourney.

COCHINEAL.—This article which is the most important of all dyeing materials, except indigo, was first discovered in Mexico in 1518. The insect from which it is derived is gathered from a plant called by the Mexicans, nopal. When the crop has reached maturity, much care is necessary in the tedious operation of gathering the cochineals from the nopals, which is performed by the Indian women. The insects, when gathered, are killed, either by throwing them into boiling water, or smothering them in an oven.

Humbolt says that 32,000 arrobas of this elegant scarlet dye, was the quantity annually exported from South America, their worth £500,000 sterling—a vast amount, and well calculated to show us the absurdity of despising any animals on account of their minuteness.

A STRONG REBUKE.—The New York Signal says that one of the crew of the Arabian ship Sultanee, now in New York, a Mussulman, of course, being on shore, was inveigled by some sailors into a barroom, where he was persuaded to drink a glass of wine, in direct violation of the precepts of the Koran. The effect was instantaneous. He returned to the deck of the Sultanee, dancing about and capering like a madman. His companions soon suspected the cause of his unwonted conduct, and a grave old Mussulman, with a beard long and grisly as King Lear's, seizing the delinquent by his turban, exclaimed in Arabic—as translated by the Captain—"Wretch! if you go on at this rate you will soon be as low and degraded as a Christian."

Whatever indisposes the mind for the duty of any particular season, though it assume ever so innocent a form, cannot be perfectly right. It is the perfidious property of certain pleasures, that, though they seem not to have the smallest harm in themselves, they imperceptibly indispose the mind to every thing that is good.—Hannah Moore.

A gentleman observed upon an indifferent pleader at the bar, that he was the most affecting orator he ever heard—for he never attempted to speak but he excited general sympathy.

Kings never hear the voice of truth until they are dethroned, nor beauties until they have abdicated their charms.

The most foolish thing in the world is to bow to the rich till you are unable to stand before an honest man.

Aristotle says—That to become an able man in any profession whatever, three things are necessary, which are nature, study and practice.

FOR THE LADIES.

From the Olive Leaf.

THE ROMAN MOTHER.

BY MRS. W. H. COX.

Cornelia said of her children "these are my jewels."

'These are my jewels,' and dearer they are,
Than chrystal drops which but mimic a star—
And where on this earth is the diamond's light,
Though brightly it gilds the darkness of night,
Which can soothe the heart when sorrow's waves rise,
Like the love which glances from those dark eyes.

'These are my jewels,' and the mind's first ray
Like the rose-bud bursting to meet the day,
In freshness, and beauty and life is mine,
With the constant fire of affection shine—
While they who have treasured the pearl or gem,
Can win no kind smile or fond word from them!

'These are my jewels,' and at twilight's hour
They warble sweet songs with a minstrel's power,
While the world's gay music comes not to me
Clear as their sportive and wild reckless glee,
And the crown of a king where rubies shine
Will not dry tears like these jewels of mine.

'Nature has jewels,' the roseate gem
With leafy coronal and fragile stem
Is a type of love, and brighter it shines,
Than the tear-dimmed gold of the deep dark mines—
But what is a flower to those who have known
A heart frank and pure as angels might own?

Quincy, 1840.

MARRIAGE.

Marriage is to woman at once the happiest and saddest event of her life; it is the promise of future bliss, raised on the death of all present enjoyment. She quits her home, her parents, her companions, her amusements, every thing on which she has hitherto depended for comfort, for affection, for kindness, for pleasure. The parents by whose counsel she has been guided, the sister to whom she has dared to impart every embryo thought and feeling, the brother who has played with her—alternately the counsellor and the counselled—all are to be resigned at one fell stroke; and yet she flies with joy into the untrodden path before her. Buoyed up by the confidence of requited love, she bids a fond grateful adieu to the life that is past, and returns with excited hopes and joyous anticipation of the happiness to come. Then woe to the man who can blight such a fair prospect, who can treacherously lure a heart like that from its peaceful enjoyment, and the watchful protection at home—who can, cowardly, break the illusions that have won her, and destroy the confidence which love had inspired. Woe to the man!

WOMAN'S INFLUENCE.—In the ordinary affairs of life, a woman has a greater influence over those near her than a man.—While our feelings are, for the most part, as retired as anchorites, hers are in constant play before us. We hear them in her varying voice; we see them in the beautiful and harmonious undulations of her movements, in the quick shifting hues of her face, in her eye, glad and bright, then fond and suffused. Her whole frame is alive and active with what is at her heart, and all the outward form speaks. She seems of a finer mould than we, and cast in a form of beauty, which, like all beauty, acts with a moral influence upon our hearts; and, as she moves about us, we feel a movement within, which rises and spreads gently over us, harmonizing us with her own. And can any man listen to this? Can his eye rest upon this, day after day; and he not be touched and made better?

FOR THE CHILDREN.

TRUTH THE BRIGHEST GEM.

The clock struck five, the joyful hour for sister Emma's return from school.

"There she is," cried little George, who was weary with long watching at the window. "Do let me run to the brook, dear mother, and meet her."

The permission was given, and away he ran to throw his arms around his kind sister Emma.

"But, what is the matter, sister?" inquired the little boy, as he held up his lips for the kiss.

"Oh, not much," was the answer, for just then Emma's heart was too full to permit her to say much. They soon reached the parlor, but Emma's sorrowful looks did not escape her mother's notice. She did not, however, ask any questions, for Emma always felt that her mother was the best friend in the world, and was accustomed to go to her with all her perplexities.

At tea, Emma was silent, and little George was much puzzled to find his sister so indifferent to his stories about his kitten, and Rosa, the little dog; nor did she smile as usual, when she heard that he had been an industrious boy at his lessons." No, Emma could not smile; her heart was heavy; and yet perhaps some of my readers will wonder at it, when they hear how very small a thing could so much disturb the happy girl. Emma had that day sinned against her conscience. She was usually in the habit of listening to the voice of this friend in her bosom, and obeying it, and so her days passed happily. There was in her face the sunshine of the soul, so that one felt happy in looking at her. The time appeared very long before George went to bed, but at last all was still, and Emma found her mother alone in the parlor, ready, as she always was, to hear her troubles, & pour into her spirit the balm of consolation.

"Dear mother, I have sinned against my conscience to-day, and I have been so miserable." Poor Emma could say no more.

"Tell me, Emma," said her mother, calmly, "what has been the difficulty."

"Why mother, it was only a sum which I had to do in division. When I was trying to prove it, I could not possibly make it compare with the answer, and so I put down the right figures, and carried them to my teacher. She looked at it a moment and then said, "Emma did you add up this sum?" "Yes," I replied. "How then does it appear that every figure is wrong?" I told her the truth, then, but she looked at me with a good deal of compassion, and told me that she "had supposed I was a girl of integrity, but I had now tried to deceive her, and had displeased God!" O mother, I never was so unhappy in my life, what shall I do? I do not know how I could do such a thing. I have grieved the Savior, and Miss Carlton thinks I am a deceitful girl."

"I am grieved for you, my child, for in this instance you have stepped from God's path of truth, that pleasant path which has to you, Emma, been a path of peace. But I do not think you a deceitful girl. A sudden and powerful temptation presented, and in a moment you swerved into that dark and forbidden way whose sharp thorns and briars have already pierced and wounded you."

"O, mother, how true it is, that the way of transgressors is hard! I have been unable to study or play, or do anything but think of my wicked heart."

"Emma, there is a balm for your wounded spirit. If you feel that you have sinned against God, and are really penitent,—which always implies a determination, with His assistance to do so no more, to be a child of truth, to delight in it just as He does, then he will receive and love you as before. You know the way to the Savior, Emma."

Such bitterness of soul, Emma never experienced again. She was forgiven by her Savior—by her teacher, and by her affectionate mother. Truth had long sparkled like a beautiful diamond on her fair brow, and although its lustre was obscured for a moment, it shone out in new beauty. It became a shield and a breast-plate, by which she was enabled to ward off the attacks of temptation. That sorrowful day was never forgotten. The way of sin was so dark and fearful, "leading down to the chambers of death," that Emma blessed God for leading her back so quickly into the sweet paths of Truth.—Mother's Magazine.

FOR THE FARMER.

GOOD SENTIMENTS.

Agriculture is the nursery of patriotism.

Agriculture aided by science, will make a little nation a great one.

Science must combine with practice to make a good farmer.

A wise government will not be slow in fostering the agricultural interest.

Let every farmer who has a son to educate, believe and remember that science lays the foundation of every thing valuable in agriculture.

The opposition against book farming, rests on the shoulders of two monsters, ignorance and prejudice.

If you separate science from agriculture, you rob a nation of its principal jewel.

All the energy of the hero, and all the science of the philosopher, may find scope in the cultivation of one farm.

Honest industry is, after all, man's only sure dependence for the double blessing of a contented mind and a comfortable livelihood.

An humble man is like a good tree, the more full of fruit the branches are, the lower they bend themselves.

PRESERVING HAMS FOR SUMMER USE.—Take a dry cask or box, say an old flour barrel, put a good layer of coarse salt in the bottom, and then put down a ham; cover that with coarse salt, and put down another ham, and so on till the cask is full or all the hams are deposited. Set the cask in a cool dry place, and whenever a ham is wanted take it out, and it will be every way as clean, free from vermin and all other impurities, as when put down. This is attended with very little trouble or expense, as the salt is not at all injured for any purpose in the fall. The cellar must be dry, and the cask put in a cool place in it; a damp cellar would be apt to dissolve the salt. The hams should be well dried before being put down.—Cultivator.

Great National Work!

LADIES COMPANION, (established in 1834,) a popular and highly esteemed MAGAZINE OF GENERAL LITERATURE AND THE FINE ARTS: embellished with Gorgeous and Costly Engravings on Steel, Copper and Wood, the Quarterly Fashions, and also with Fashionable and Popular Music, arranged for the Piano-Forte, Harp and Guitar.

TERMS—$3 a year. Single copies 25 cents.—Office 109 Fulton street, New York.

Mrs. L. H. Sigourney: The editors are happy to communicate the information to their readers, that arrangements have been effected with this talented lady by which she will still continue to be a regular and constant contributor to the 'Ladies Companion.' Her engagements in other quarters will not interfere with that connection with the 'Companion,' which secures to its readers the enjoyment of her beautiful productions.

Dr Oliver Wendell Holmes of Boston; Professor Longfellow of Cambridge College, and Mrs. Anna Maria Wells of Boston, will hereafter contribute to the 'Ladies Companion.'

SPLENDID NEW STEEL ENGRAVINGS by our best artists, accompany each number; illustrated by tales and spirited sketches, which will as heretofore, continue to be magnificent and far superior to those published in any cotemporary work in America.

QUARTERLY FASHIONS.

Plates of the prevailing Fashions appear once every three months, viz: December, March, June and September.

The Ladies Companion contains a larger quantity of reading than any other magazine issued in this country, and its subscription price is only three dollars a year. The great combination of talent secured for the coming year will render it unequalled by any other periodical.

THE MUSICAL DEPARTMENT.

This department of the Ladies Companion has ever commanded a large share of attention, and has been looked upon with no little interest by its readers, and more especially the Ladies, whom the publisher is in the highest degree anxious to please.—It will continue to be a subject of more than usual care to him, and to the Professor under whose supervision it is placed, to make that portion of the magazine allotted to Music, more than ever deserving of the countenance of every lover of music.—It has ever been and will continue to be the desire to have all pieces of Music printed correctly and free from errors.

Over every department an equally careful supervision will be strictly exercised by the Editors, and all appropriate expenditures will be liberally bestowed, as it is the design of the publisher, with the aid of his contributors and the advice of his friends to make the Ladies Companion distinguished for beauty and accuracy of its typography—the variety and high tone of its literary articles—and the unequalled splendor of its pictoral Embellishments, which are entirely new and engraved by A. Dick, expressly for the work.

It is the determination of the publisher to use every means to maintain the superiority which the Ladies Companion has obtained. For four years he has steadily pursued a course of improvement, and he flatters himself that his present facilities are such as to give the Ladies Companion eminent advantages over all other publications of its character.

From the foregoing it will be perceived that the Ladies Companion embraces every department within the range of Belles Letters and the Fine Arts: and no exertion or expense will be deemed too great to render the work equal to any other extant. The flattering and general testimonials of nearly every contemporary journal in the United States, and in fact many on the other side of the Atlantic, have strongly asserted the undeniable claims of the Ladies Companion to the support of the public generally. There is no work that gives its readers such a great return for their subscriptions.

TERMS.—$3 a year in advance, or $4 during the year. No subscription received for less than one year.

Complete sets of the volume from May, 1839, can be furnished at the subscription price by applying at the office. All letters must be addressed, post paid, to WM. W. SNOWDEN, 109 Fulton street, N. Y.

FOR SALE,

LARGE MAPS of Mississippi and Alabama, shewing the public and Indian Lands, Indian Reservations, Land Districts, Townships, Streams, &c., engraved from the Government surveys and plans in the General Land Office, Washington City; by E. Gilham, Draughtsman in the General Land Office.

F. Taylor, Bookseller, Washington city, has just published (and secured the copy right according to law) the above Maps, which will be infinitely more complete and accurate than any heretofore published. They are published on separate sheets, each containing six square feet, and will be found especially useful and valuable to those interested in the lands of either state as they show every item of information which is in the possession of the Land Offices relative to water courses, township lines, Indian Lands and Reservations, land districts. &c., and will be found perfectly accurate and precise in those points.—They can be sent by mail to any of the United States, subject to single letter postage Price two dollars, or three copies of either will be sent by mail for five dollars. A liberal discount will be made to traveing agents, or to any who will buy to sell again.

Editors of newspapers any where who will give the above advertisement (including this notice) one or two insertions, shall receive by return mail a copy of each map, if they will send a copy of the paper containing it, to the advertiser.

Ladies Department.

Mrs. L. M. CARPENTER, Preceptress.
Miss CAROLINE E. WILCOX, Teacher.

This Institution is located in the pleasant and healthful village of De Ruyter. Its buildings are both spacious and commodious. Study rooms of which there are a large number, are furnished with chairs, tables, bedsteads, and stoves; and rented to gentlemen at one shilling per week; or one shilling for each student, the rooms being large enough to accommodate two. Good board is afforded at one dollar and twenty five cents per week, including washing or lodging. One shilling extra, is charged to those who require both.

The institution is furnished with a good Philosophical and chemical apparatus. It is also furnished with a valuable Library. A scientific society connected with the Institute, is furnished with a choice collection of Minerals and Curiosities.

About twenty-one thousand dollars has already been expended on the De Ruyter Institute for the purpose of facilitating the student in his pursuit of scientific knowledge.

It is the object of those to whom the management of the Institute is entrusted, to make the expenses of acquiring a knowledge of the sciences, as light as possible.

And the public may be assured that a strict attention will be paid to the moral cultivation of the student; and the trustees and teachers will spare no reasonable pains to render the time spent at the De Ruyter Institute, as agreeable and profitable to the student as circumstances will admit.

Young gentlemen and ladies wishing to engage in the pursuit of science, are respectfully invited to spend a term or two, at the De Ruyter Institute and satisfy themselves in regard to its merit.

The year is divided into three terms, of fourteen weeks each. The first term commenced on the twelth day of September; The second term on the second day of January; and the third term on the eighth day of May.

RELIGIOUS.

COME AND WELCOME TO THE SAVIOR.

BY DR. JOHN M. MASON.

Let all classes of the unhappy repair to the Christian truth, and draw water with joy out of the wells of salvation! Assume your own characters, O ye children of men. Present your grievances, and accept the consolation which the gospel tenders.

Come now, ye tribes of pleasure, who have exhausted your strength in pursuing phantoms which retire at your approach! The voice of the Son of God in the gospel is, "Wherefore spend ye your money for that which is not bread, and your labor for that which satisfieth not; hearken diligently unto me, and eat that which is good, and let your soul delight itself in fatness!"

Come, ye tribes of ambition, who burn for the applause of your fellow-worms.—The voice of the Son of God to you is, "the friendship of this world is enmity with God; but if any serve me, him will my Father honor."

Come ye avaricious, who pant after the dust of the earth on the head of the poor. The voice of the Son of God is, "Wisdom is more precious than rubies; and all the things thou canst desire are not to be compared unto her—but what shall it profit a man if he shall gain the whole world, and lose his own soul?"

Come, ye profane! The voice of the Son of God is, "Hearken unto me, ye stout-hearted, that are far from righteousness; behold, I bring near my righteousness."

Come, ye formal and self-sufficient, who say that ye are rich, and increased with goods, and have need of nothing; and know not that ye are wretched, and miserable, and poor, and blind, and naked. The voice of the Son of God is, "I counsel you to buy of me gold tried in the fire that ye may be rich! and white raiment that ye may be clothed; and that the shame of your nakedness do not appear; and anoint your eyes with eye-salve, that ye may see."

Come ye, who, convinced of sin, fear lest the fierce anger of the Lord fall upon you. The voice of the Son of God is, "Him that cometh unto me I will in no wise cast out. I, even I am he that blotteth out the transgression for mine own sake, and will not remember thy sins."

Come, ye disconsolate, whose souls are sad, because the Comforter is away. The voice of the Son of God is, "The Lord hath sent me to appoint unto them that mourn in Zion, beauty for ashes, the oil of joy for mourning, and the garment of praise for the spirit of heaviness."

Come, ye tempted, who are borne down with the violence of law in your members, and of assaults from the evil one. The voice of the Son of God is, "I will be merciful to your unrighteousness; and the God of peace will bruise Satan under your feet shortly."

Come, ye children of domestic woe, upon whom the Lord has made a breach by taking away your counsellors and support. The voice of the Son of God is, "Leave thy fatherless children with me; I will preserve them alive; and let thy widows trust in me."

Come, ye from whom mysterious Providence has swept away the acquisitions of long and reputable industry. The voice of the Son of God is, "My son, if thou wilt receive my words, thou shalt have a treasure in the heavens that faileth not, and mayest take joyfully the spoiling of thy goods, knowing that thou hast in heaven a better and an enduring substance."

Come, ye poor, who, without property to lose, are grappling with distress, and exposed to want. The Son of God, though the heir of all things, had not where to lay his head, and his voice to his poor is, "Be content with such things as ye have, for I will never leave thee nor forsake thee, thy bread shall be given thee, and thy water be sure.'

Come, ye reproached, who find cruel mockings a most bitter persecution. The voice of the Son of God is, "If ye be reproached for the name of Christ, happy are ye, for the Spirit of God and of glory resteth upon you."

Come, in fine, ye dejected, whom the fear of death holds in bondage. The voice of the Son of God is, "I will ransom them from the power of the grave: I will redeem them from death. O death, I will be thy plagues! O grave, I will be thy destruction! repentance shall be hid from mine eyes."

Blessed Jesus! thy loving kindness shall be my joy in the house of my pilgrimage! and I will praise thee while I have any being, for that gospel which thou hast preached to the poor!

"AND LET THE WHOLE EARTH BE FILLED WITH HIS GLORY."

Consider the universal extent of this request. Little minds confine their zeal within a contracted circle, which excludes all but the adherents of their own class. For a party they labor, and in the success of a party they rejoice. If they pray for rain, it is only to refresh and fructify their own gardens. They are strangers to the sublime and diffusive spirit of the Gospel.—Wretched bigotry—allow me a figure of speech, allow me to suppose, for a moment, that Being in existence whose death we have attended, and whose epitaph we have sung—wretched bigotry, what is thy language?—Let the Established Church prosper—Let the Dissenting interest prevail—Let the Independents multiply—Let the Baptists swell their annual lists with numbers—Let the Methodists spread on every side—Let Tottenham Court Chapel be "filled with his glory."—But give me the language of the text, "and let the whole earth be filled with his glory. Amen and amen." I love to see an expansion of soul, which, free from shackles of party rage, includes all, like the goodness of God.

I pass from religious denominations, to countries. It does not satisfy us to say, let England be "filled with his glory." It has frequently been charged upon the Srcipture as a defect, that it does not sufficiently inculcate patriotism, or a love to a particular country; a virtue celebrated among all nations of the globe; a virtue which so long secured Greece, and so highly exalted Rome; a virtue practiced in former times, and professed in our own; a virtue of which we have nothing left, but "loaves and fishes." The charge is partly false and partly true, and as far as it is true it will be found not a reproach, but an honor to the Gospel. If we look into the Old Testament, we shall find this sacred injunction: "Pray for the peace of Jerusalem, they shall prosper that love thee." Never was love more sincere and ardent, than that which the Jews exercised towards their native land. Jerusalem was the centre of their happiness, the seat of all the endearments of life.—To adorn it they esteemed nothing too costly; to defend it, they cheerfully shed their blood. Its prosperity satisfied them; its welfare made them forget their sorrows. When they saw it destroyed by the hands of the Babylonians, they abandoned themselves to grief, and found life a burthen; they "hung their harps upon the willows," the voice of mirth was heard no more, and all the daughters of music were brought low." But even in its reduced state they retained the same affection, prizing its ruins above the superb palaces of Babylon: they "took pleasure in her stones, and favored the dust thereof," each saying, "If I forget thee, O Jerusalem, let my right hand forget her cunning, if I do not remember thee let my tongue cleave to the roof of my mouth, if I prefer not Jerusalem above my chief joy." And where does the New Testament enforce the wild idea that the whole world is to be our country, and mankind our fellow citizens? Jesus Christ was a patriot; he loved his country, notwithstanding the ingratitude and cruelty of his countrymen. He first went "to the lost sheep of the house of Israel." As he drew near the devoted metropolis, "he wept over it." He commanded his Apostles "to preach repentance and remission of sins to all nations, beginning at Jerusalem." The Gospel does not destroy the useful feelins of nature, but corrects and sanctifies them; it inspires us with sentiments becoming our condition, and never forgets that we are creatures of limited faculties. But, after all, what is patriotism? Is it such a partial attachment to a particular country, as leads us to disregard the liberty and happiness of every other nation? Is it such an exclusive attachment as would lead us to oppress every other country for the sake of our own, and destroy thousands who would not acquiesce in our opinion, avarice and ambition?—What was a Roman? A proud, unfeeling tyrant, who placed right in power, who triumphed remorselessly over undefended weakness, who gloried in proportion to the number of cities and provinces he had taken or destroyed. What was the patriotism of a Roman? A false virtue, the destruction of all justice and benevolence—and this false virtue has always been admired, because it conceals self-interest, under the mask of public spirit, and gives license to inflict injuries, not only with impunity, but with applause. It is the glory of the Gospel to say nothing of such patriotism. It is the glory of the Gospel to set us above the prejudices which have so long and so unhappily kept men at variance—and to teach us that God has made of one blood all the nations of the earth, that men are not our enemies because they live at the other side of a channel, or a mountain—that they are not to be bought and sold as slaves because the sun has jetted their complexious—that we are "debtors to Jews and Greeks"—and that "as we have opportunity," without any exceptions, "we are to do good unto all men." Chrstianity commands us to love all the human race, and to regard as our neighbors the inhabitants of the remotest regions.—Rev. William Jay.

ANECDOTES OF DR. PAYSON.

The following anecdotes are extracted from the Religious Magazine.

One day he went to visit a mother, who was disconsolate from the loss of a child. He said to her as follows:—

"Suppose, now, some one was making a beautiful crown for you to wear; and you knew it was for you, and that you were to receive it and wear it as soon as it should be done. Now, if the maker of it were to come, and, in order to make the crown more beautiful and splendid, were to take some of your jewels, to put into it,—should you be sorrowful and unhappy, because they were taken away for a little while, when you knew they were gone to make up your crown?"

The mother said that no one could conceive of the relief, the soothing, quieting influence which this comparison had on her mind.

On an other occasion he went to see a sick person, who was very much troubled, because she could not keep her mind all the time fixed upon Christ, on account of the distracting influences of her sufferings, and the various objects and occurrences of the sick room, which constantly called off her attention. She was afraid she did not love her Savior, as she found it so difficult to fix her mind upon him. Dr. Payson said,—

"Suppose you were to see a little sick child, lying in its mother's lap, with its faculties impaired by its sufferings, so that it was generally, in a troubled sleep; but now and then it just opens its eyes a little, and gets a glimpse of its mother's face, so as to be recalled to the recollection that it is in its mother's arms; and suppose that always, at such a time, it should smile faintly with evident pleasure to find where it was,—should you doubt whether that child loved its mother or not?"

The poor sufferer's doubts and despondency were gone in a moment.

A gentleman, who saw and conversed with Dr. Payson in Boston, when he visited this city, towards the latter part of his life, was led, by his preaching and conversation, to a considerable degree of serious concern for his own soul. His wife was still in a great measure indifferent to the subject. One day, meeting her in company, he said to her,—

"Madam, I think your husband is looking upwards—making some efforts to rise above the world, towards God and heaven. You must not let him try alone. Whenever I see the husband struggling alone in such efforts, it makes me think of a dove, endeavoring to fly upwards, while it has but one broken wing. It leaps and flutters, and perhaps raises itself a little way, and then it becomes wearied, and drops back again to the ground. If both wings co-operate, then it mounts easily."

THE BLIND CHILD.

Mother! they say the stars are bright,
And the broad heavens are blue;
I dream of them by day and night,
And think them all like you.
I cannot touch the distant skies,
The stars ne'er speak to me,
But their sweet images arise,
And blend with thoughts of thee.

I know not why, but oft I dream
Of the far-off land of bliss;
And when I hear thy voice, I deem
That heaven is like to this.
When my sad heart to thine is pressed,
My follies are forgiven.
Sweet pleasure warms my beating breast,
And this, I say, is heaven.

O mother! will the God above
Forgive my faults like thee?
Will he bestow such care and love
On a blind child like me?
Dear mother! leave me not alone—
Go with me when I die;
Lead thy blind daughter to the throne,
And stay in yonder sky.

HEAVEN ATTRACTING ALL THAT IS CONGENIAL TO ITSELF.—To that state all the pious on earth are tending; and if there is a law from whose operation none are exempt, which irresistibly conveys their body to darkness and to dust, there is another, not less certain or less powerful, which conducts their spirits to the abodes of bliss, to the bosom of their Father and their God. The wheels of nature are not made to roll bacward; from the birth of time an impetuous current has set in which bears all the sons of men towards that interminable ocean. Meanwhile, heaven is attracting to itself whatever is congenial to its nature, it enriching itself by the spoils of earth, and collecting within its capacious bosom whatever is pure, permanent, and divine; leaving nothing for the last fire to consume but the objects, and the slaves of concupiscence; while every thing which grace has prepared and beautified shall be gathered and selected from the ruins of the world, to adorn the eternal city, "which has no need of the sun, neither of the moon, to shine in it; for the glory of God doth enlighten it, and the Lamb is the light thereof." Let us obey the voice that calls us thither; let us seek the things that are above, and no longer cleave to a world which must shortly perish, and which we must shortly quit, while we neglect to prepare for that in which we are invited to dwell for ever. —Robert Hall.

RELIGION.—Hold fast therefore by this sheet anchor of happiness—religion. You will often want it in the times of most danger, the storms and tempests of life. Cherish true religion as precisely as you will fly with abhorrence and contempt from superstition and enthusiasm. The first is the perfection and glory of human nature; the two last the deprivation and disgrace of it. Remember the essence of religion is a heart void of offense towards God and man; not subtle, speculative opinions, but an active vital principle of faith.—Earl of Chatham.

CONTENTMENT.—Contentment is the gift of Heaven, and not the certain effect of any thing upon earth; and it is as easy for Providence to convey it without wealth as with it; being the undeniable prerogative of the First Cause, that whatsoever it does by the meditation of second causes, it can do immediately by itself, without them. The heavens can and do every day derive water and refreshment upon the earth, without either pipes or conduits, though the weakness of human industry is forced to fly to these little assistances to compass the same effects. Happiness and comfort stream immediately from God himself, as light issues from the sun, and sometimes looks and darts itself into the meanest corners, while it forbears to visit the largest and the noblest rooms. Every man is happy or miserable, as the temple of his mind places him, either directly under, or beside the influences of the divine nature, which enlighten and enliven the well-disposed mind with secret, ineffable joys, and such as the vicious or unprepared mind is wholly unacquainted with.—South.

MEANING OF CRUCIFIED.—Said Elias Cornelius, "I am learning more what is meant by being crucified to the world. It is a lingering process, like the gradual extinguishing of life, and is attended with frequent and dreadful struggles." On the memorable Sabbath evening, previous to the departure of our missionaries, he said to Mr. Malcolm of Boston, 'We talk about being crucified to the world, and the world being crucified to us. But we do not intend any such thing. Many of us do not even know what it means. We do not wish the world to look upon us as a dead body, a rotten carcass, fastened to a cross, we do not wish any such thing, neither do we wish to look upon the world in that light, as a dead body, a rotten carcass, fastened to a cross. By the world, I do not mean God's beautiful world, the mountains, the vales, the rivers, the trees; but I mean the selfishness, the spirit, the sinful customs, and fashions of its inhabitants.'

Christian reader, how is it, are you thus crucified to the world, and the world crucified to you?—Morning Star.

FOR THE CHILDREN.

From the Mother's Magazine.

DIVINE INFLUENCE ON CHILDREN.

"I will pour my spirit upon thy seed, and my blessing upon thine offspring." Isaiah 44. 3—"In the last days, saith God, I will pour out my Spirit upon all flesh; and your sons and your daughters shall prophecy" Acts. 2. 17.

'Dear Mother, I wish to talk with you," said my little daughter, as she took my hand, and led me into her father's study—"And what do you wish to talk about, Mary?—"Will you tell me one thing," "How shall I stand before God? or appear before him? I have often thought that I had given my heart, and hoped I was his dear child, but I fear I am not ready to go and stand before him!" A momentous question truly, and one which has often agitated the bosom of this little girl. As I have frequently contemplated with admiration and gratitude, the effects of the Divine influence on her heart and character I have been led to inquire, "Do we sufficiently appreciate the inestimable blessing?—and after all, do we take the natural steps to secure it for our children?—"I will send the comforter, and he shall take up his abode with you," said the ascending Savior—The Comforter—celestial, infinite, and omnipotent Helper—kind and tender companion of our way, to soothe our sorrows and sustain us under the pressure of earthly care and toil—daily with us in the closet to bear up the unuttered petition to the throne,—nearer than the nearest friend—faithful till the dying hour!—What a promise! What a friend amid the dangers and temptations and trials of life, ever at hand to "hide us in the secret of his pavilion." Fainting and weary in the laborious ascent of life, what could we do, unsustained by this Great "Helper."—And then to think of the rich clusters of heavenly fruit where He resides; the "love" which never faileth; the "joy" which lights the countenance, the "peace" which passeth understanding, seated upon the brow; the "gentleness" which dwelt in the Lamb—the "goodness" unwearied in diffusing happiness, the "faith" which fastens on invisible things, giving to the follies of this vain world their just insignificancy.—I ask, do we appreciate such a friend, and not ardently desire his intimate friendship and constant presence, in our hearts and in our houses?—Does He receive that affectionate gratitude and confidence which He has a right to expect? And do we take to Him our little ones, with the assurance that He loves to dwell in the heart of a child? Do we endeavor to impress upon their young minds the most agreeable and attractive conceptions of his character,—teaching them to pray for his aid and guidance along the path of childhood, as the greatest blessing God can give? Do we watch the emotions of their spirits, ready to welcome the first approach of this benignant Friend? And are we exceedingly anxious, lest, in their childish folly, they grieve his tenderness and weary his patience? If the writer has been led, of late years, to lament the wounds and neglects she has inflicted on such an exalted Intercessor, and if she esteems it her highest honor to teach her her children to admire, and love, and seek his favor, "more than the finest gold," to Him be the glory,—to Him be praise for every kind suggestion! But the results are most happy. In the infant soul his voice has been heard. Along the gay steps of childhood, He has been a welcome Friend; and in the more sober years of youth, his visits are esteemed the golden periods of existence. Yes, sooner than we expect, He comes, as if his favorite spot was the heart of a little child. What a Friend for our children, when "father and mother forsake them!"

"Mother, I can't tell you how happy I felt in prayer this morning! When I gave myself to God, it seemed as if there was a sun in my soul," said a little child, a few days since. Truly,

"He is a Sun to guide our way;
And turn our darkness into day."

Let us think more of the Comforter, the dying gift of our Lord,—seek for Him, not as a visitor, but companion,—open our hearts as a home for His dwelling-place. Let us instruct our infant children to love the name of the Holy Comforter, and seek His help in their first petitions. Let us beware of slighting Him—of living without Him! Let us take heed lest we presume to train our children in the right way, without His daily assistance. And in our meetings for prayer and consultation, let there be united and fervent supplication for this best of God's gifts for our beloved children. What a discovery will it be, should we find, as we enter the eternal world, that a thousand blessings were ready for ourselves and children, which could not be given, because in our earthly pilgrimage we thought so slightly of the Holy Spirit,—so faintly desired his abode, and were so willing to have Him depart from our houses. We "receive not, because we ask not."

FOR THE MINISTER.

THE MANNER IN WHICH MINISTERS MAY BRING THEIR OFFICE INTO DISREPUTE.

In the Quarterly Register for May, we observe an able article on this subject, by Rev. Edwin Holt. Four things are mentioned which are liable to lead to this result, viz: mental indolence, deficiency of piety, insufficient zeal, and want of sound discretion. We quote the remarks under the first head.—Ch. Watchman.

1. We may bring the ministry into disrepute by mental indolence.

We may preach often, we may write many sermons, and if the character of our ministry is to be tested by the number of our services, it may be highly respectable, and yet we may be the slaves of mental indolence. Amid all the profusion of our labors, the range of subjects to which we invite the attention of our hearers may be narrow, and the mode of discussion unvarying and dull. Our discourses may be the result of no careful study. They may be confined chiefly to topics with which we happen to be familiar. And these subjects may be discussed with but little variation of plan, of illustration, or of language. Our text may be derived from all the books of the Bible, but our discussion may easily slide into the deep ruts of the old familiar track. A stereotype mode of discussion may be used on every occasion, and thus a tiresome sameness may be imprinted on all our performances. The style of our discourses, whether written or unwritten, we may make plain and simple to a fault in our convenient care to avoid "the enticing words of man's wisdom." Instead of clothing our thoughts in language of delightful freshness, of graceful propriety, and of great power, we may be so indolent as to seize upon the most ordinary expressions, and may thus degrade the doctrines of the Bible by a dress, not only simple, as it ought to be, but also slovenly and mean.—Meretricious ornaments of style we know to be discountenanced by rhetorical taste as well as by christian propriety, and our indolence may make this the plea for the want of such imagery as would give life and power to our sermons. We may feel, ourselves, the force of the rich and varied forms of illustration with which the Great Teacher and apostles won the attention of listening thousands, and still we may persist in using a style of leaden dullness and sodorific monotony. We may thus discourage from attendance, at our churches, hearers who are not sufficiently hungry for the bread of life to receive it gladly—howsoever it may be served up. We may find their places in the sanctuary unoccupied. If they do not shun entirely the house of prayer, they prefer to our tiresome administrations, either the glow of excitement which characterizes the worship of some more illiterate sect—or the refinement and thought and zeal of those who teach delusive errors with skill and power. We may console ourselves with the belief that our faithfulness in the pulpit, our reiteration of the unpalatable doctrines of the cross, has placed them beyond the pale of our ministerial influence—when in reality it is our indolence that has driven them to seek elsewhere instructions more skillfully imparted and more fitted to gain attention.

Mental sloth, while it thus narrows the range of our subjects and restricts us to a dry and unimpressive mode of discussion, may claim the merit of devout reliance upon the inherent power of divine truth. We may entertain no doubt that the doctrines of the Bible will accomplish all their results. The question whether those doctrines have been exhibited with sufficient clearness and skill, by 'a workman—rightly dividing the word of truth,' may seem to us a question that savors more of carnal than of spiritual wisdom. One firm conviction is that the word of God "shall not return unto him void," 'the truth is great and it shall prevail.' And while we rest upon this hope with wonderful composure, our drowsy indolence may prevent those intellectual efforts, without which our sermons may gain no hold upon the attention of our hearers—without which the truth and the mind are never brought into contact.

Perhaps it is mental indolence that leads to the frequent discussion of controverted topics. It is sometimes easier to assail doctrines which none of our people entertain, than to inculcate truths which they ought to learn—to lash, with a whip of scorpions, the errors and follies of men whom we never saw, than to show our people their own sins—to denounce the principles of others, than to preach the gospel with ability and success.

Mental indolence may reconcile us to a sentiment, somewhat prevalent, that a few books can supply the intellectual wants of a minister.

We have heard so much about the 'man of one book,' that some ministers are strangely satisfied with the most limited range of reading. Perhaps some are reconciled to the neglect of books by the same syllogism which relieved the conscience of the Saracen invader of Egypt, when he destroyed the library of Alexandria, the most magnificent collection of literary wealth then in existence. The 'books either contain what is to be found in the Koran, or they do not. If they do not contain what is included in the Koran, they ought not to be spared, and if they do, they are superfluous.' Do none by a similar process of reasoning persuade themselves that all books beside the Bible are somewhat superfluous, and thus arrive at a conclusion which must be any thing but unwelcome to an indolent mind? We must thus persuade ourselves, if not to destroy, at least to dispense with treasures of theological knowledge, which for centuries past, men of God have stored away for the benefit of their posterity. Possibly our indolence may reconcile us to the neglect of books for another reason. We may make the marvelous discovery that it will be a sort of fraud to avail ourselves of the 'light of others' wisdom in exploring the depths of inspired truth. Honesty and independence, it is alleged, requires us to commence the search with our own unaided resources, dispensing with the thoughts and researches of others, because we can think and make researches for ourselves. And if we should give ourselves up to the guidance of this sentiment, we should imitate the sagacity of the builder, who discards the improvement of modern mechanism, and begins to build a house with the primitive implements of the savage. Such a builder may construct a rude hut, but he must not complain if other men prefer the well framed and finished house, with all the conveniences and ornaments which modern skill supplies, to his clumsy fabric. And we must not wonder if our discourses, made up, with honest and independent indolence, from our own meagre reflections upon the Bible, are not preferred to the discourses of those who avail themselves of all the light of sacred literature, and commune studiously with the affluent minds that have in other ages been the ornament of the Christian Church.

Perhaps also mental indolence may make us more industrious than we should otherwise be in attending public religious meetings. We may leave important duties unperformed, to be present at every clerical convocation—every religious anniversary—every convention of the friends of any good institution. It is easier to spend our time in bustling efforts to repair to every public meeting within accessible distances, than to perform at home the duties of the pastoral office.

The same evil habit may make us loiterers at home. In compliance with the kind but unwise desires of our people, we may expand our energies in making social visits at their houses, when neither their spiritual state, nor the pressure of affliction renders such frequent visits necessary. We may thus ramble from house to house, devoting to ordinary conversation the precious hours that should be consecrated to study. We may waste in a sort of religious gossipping the time that should be industriously spent in the elaboration of instinctive discourses—in the preparation of such appeals as would pierce the hearts of our hearers.

Perhaps also, we may trace to mental indolence, in part, the frequent removal of ministers from place to place. Make as liberal allowance as we may for the capricious humors of the people; their gross violation of contract in withholding, in many instances, a part of the promised support—their readiness to leave the pastor who has worn himself out in their service to make what provision he can for his own subsistence, when he can no longer serve them acceptably—still must we not trace at least some of the removals of ministers to mental inactivity? While the spur of exciting novelty is felt, and while the scanty stock of resources gleaned in a shortened preparatory course holds out, the duties of the sacred office are performed by some with credit. But they do not remember that the excitement of novelty will at length cease to stimulate, and that the reservoir of early study is not inexhaustible. They are not careful to supply the weekly drain by a fresh stock. The expenditure goes on rapidly, while the work of reproduction is neglected. At last the inevitable result follows. Mental bankruptcy succeeds mental indolence. The preacher loses his influence by the reiteration of old thoughts, and by the unprofitable character of discourses which are produced without thought. The people lament that the instructions of the pulpit have become vapid and tiresome. They may be so undiscerning as not to perceive why it is—but they know the fact that the services of their pastor have become uninteresting. They begin to suspect that the connection between themselves and their minister is not to be a happy one. The pastor, on his part, apprehends that his usefulness in his present station is at an end. It is the will of Providence, he imagiues, that he should commence a series of removals woful to his own ministry and to all the parishes among which he may make a temporary sojourn. Would he learn the will of Providence by more careful inquiry, he might discover it to be his duty to become an industrious student—and by the usefulness of his ministrations, to recover the alienated affections of his parish, to make full proof of his ministry in a field which he has scarcely begun to cultivate.

Mental inactivity in various ways tends to bring our office into disrepute. The complaint is sometimes made by intelligent laymen, and by those, too, who respect and love religion, that there is a deplorable waste of mind in our profession as well as in others. Is there not some ground for this complaint? Ought we not to attempt more than merely to satisfy the desires of our most illiterate hearers—by a plain inculcation of doctrines which their piety will ever make welcome in any dress? Is it not right that we should expend whatever intellectual powers the Lord has given us, in the exposition of divine truth? Shall unsanctified genius bestow upon its favorite studies the most intense application and elaborate sketches of touching pathos and of thrilling power? Shall the appeals made thus to the passions and interests of men move and electrify the public mind?—And shall the intellect that has been consecrated to the noblest of all earthly pursuits, that of saving the souls of men by the gospel ministry, never be urged beyond mere common-place exertions? Shall we be thus outstripped in the race of intellectual exertion, when the themes to which our studies are given, if they were not belittled and shorn of their glory by our unskilful presentation, would be sufficient to eclipse the most splendid themes of unsanctified literature, would command the notice and admiration even of a depraved world? If the thousands of discourses that are addressed to our congregations on each returning Sabbath were the results of sufficiently industrious and consecrated study—if they were the glowing, powerful and attractive exhibitions of divine truth which sanctified intellect can produce, the pulpit would make its voice heard and felt in the remotest corners of the land—its appeals would make an impression which all the cares and vanities of worldly life could not efface, and its power would be acknowledged by all the admirers of intellectual greatness; and the conversion of multitudes who are not moved by our feeble exertions, would show that the ministry is not to be despised—that the sacred office is not a mere stupifying treadmill for the human intellect.

It is true that divine sovereignty often blesses the humblest instrumentality, and sometimes brings down into submission a boasting Goliath by the simple sling of the youthful preacher; but it is also true that God has pre-eminently honored the agency of those who have brought to the work of the ministry minds of great vigor and cultivation, and habits of skill and industry. Paul, though abundant in other labors, studied and wrote with indefatigable diligence. Upon Timothy he urged the same close application to study. Calvin was, in this respect, not unlike the Apostles to the Gentiles. This great man, than whom no one was ever more laborious in the lecture room and the pulpit—whom Scaliger pronounced the most learned man of Europe—ever felt that a minister of the gospel must be an industrious student. When urged by Farel to stop at Geneva, instead of proceeding as he proposed, to Basle, his reply was, 'I must study.' And when on his death-bed, some would have dissuaded him from mental application, he replied, "Vultisne me otiosum a Domino apprehendi?" Have not the most successful ministers usually been men of great mental activity? Baxter, whom no one will accuse of exalting mental improvement at the expense of other qualities necessary in a minister, exclaims, "O what abundance of things are there that a minister, should understand; and what a great defect it is to be ignorant of them; and how much shall we miss such knowledge in our work! Many ministers study only to compose their sermons and very little more, when there are so many books to be read and so many matters that we should not be unacquainted with. Nay, in the study of our sermons we are too negligent, gathering only a few naked heads, and not considering of the most forcible expressions by which we should set them home to men's hearts. We must study how to convince and get within men, and how to bring each truth to the quick."

If we would obey the exhortation "Let no man despise thee," we must beware of mental indolence.

HOW TO COMFORT A PASTOR.

1. Be conscientiously an attendant on all his ministrations. Especially be present in unpleasent weather. Let not the few drops, nor the many, extinguish your zeal, nor the stiff breeze, damp, or cold even, make shipwreck of your resolution. Let him see that adversity must pipe all hands, and become nothing short of a hurricane to make yours a vacant seat.

2. Let there be such a constancy of Christian character, so blameless and harmless a deportment, that your pastor shall have his heart gladdened at every remembrance of you. A faithful disciple is his joy and his crown.

3. Let him depend upon you for any emergency of Christian duty, feeling that he shall never appeal for your co-operation in vain. Paul had such comforters. One such disciple is worth more than a whole synagogue of your slippery disciples that are sure to be missing when they are wanted.

4. When he calls upon you for some active service, do not allow him to waste his strength arguing with you. Do not wake up and stir up this objection, and that. Let them all sleep on, while you promptly reply, "I go, Sir," and are off directly.

5. Have a very large heart in matters of charity. He that "hath a bountiful eye" is a great comfort to a pastor. The bountiful Phillippians were such to Paul. Selfdenial for Zion's welfare is sunshine and shower to all the Christian graces. And the rejoicing pastor cannot but believe that those watering others shall be watered themselves. All the generous and warm-hearted in the cause of benevolence in his parish awaken the interest and confidence of the pastor. They form a contrast with the multitude, and shine the brighter by the contrast, as those stars seem to do which the clouds have not covered.

6. Be a specimen of conscientious regard for all the minor and less prominent duties of religion. Some think if they can manage the weightier matters decently, if they attend to the more obvious and striking duties, the "small fry," the least commandments, may safely endure some neglect. They will take care of the pounds—the pence they are not so careful of. Hence here is a sour word, there a fretful exclamation, here a slander, and there an unheeded promise, &c. &c. Hence, though the ship has not been torn to pieces by cannon balls, she has many an ugly scar from small shot. Let your piety fill every crack and crevice as does the tide, flowing every where, shining every where. Your pastor will be comforted in you on that account. His joy is that men should be "blameless and harmless, the sons of God without rebuke.'

Comfort then the pastor in all these ways. These are among his richest consolations. He needs their sustaining influence. These are ardent spots in the desert he traverses. They cheer him in his ardons labors. And such methods of comforting the pastor's heart will cause spiritual blessings to fill the cup of such comforters. They shall be watered themselves. The pastor shall give up his account concerning them with joy and not with grief, and abundant entrance shall be administered unto them in the everlasting kingdom of our Lord.—Boston Recorder.

ISRAEL.

Oh people beloved,
  Wide scattered of old,
Come back to the vineyard,
  Come back to the fold.
Build up the waste places,
  The altars of prayer,
In the land of your fathers,
  For thy Bethel is there.

From the south, oh ye chosen,
  From the east and the west,
From the north lands and frozen,
  Let Israel make haste;
For the set time to favor
  His Sion is nigh,
When thy God that redeemeth,
  Shall place thee on high

On the tall ships of Tarshish,
  Now spreading their sails,
Come hasten in triumph,
  On the wings of the gale.
Make ready the rider,
  Prepare the swift steed,
Since the Lion of Juda's
  The Shilo indeed;
The Infant of Bethle'm,
  The babe of the stall,
Jehova et Jesu,
  God blessed over all.

Then hasten, oh hasten,
  Why tarry so long?
Ye daughters of Juda,
  Redemption's the song!
Take the harp from the willow,
  The lute from the stream,
And sing hallelujah
  To Him that redeems.
The Shepherd of Israel
  Alone can restore
The captives of David,
  To languish no more.

Are the waters of Jordan,
  Not sweet in their flow,
And the hills 'bout Jerusalem,
  Whose pathways ye know—
The mountains of Lebanon,
  And Olivet's shade,
And the tomb where the Lord
  Of thy Glory was laid—
Gethsemane's garden,
  Though shadow'd in gloom,
Enough to entice thee
  Once more to thy home?

Return, ay, return,
  For the promise is near,
When the days of thy triumph
  In light shall appear.
Build up the lost city,
  Her grandeur restore,
And enter believing,
  Now scattered no more.
Ay, haste that the fullness
  Of the Gentiles may come;
The earth be the Lord's
  And thy temples his home.

A RUSSIAN HAWKER.—A minister at St. Petersburgh writes—In the spring of 1829, Timothy, the hawker, called at my house with his wares. My servants who recommended the Scriptures whenever they have an opportunity, talked with this man on the value of the New Testament, and advised him to buy a copy. "Of what use can it be to me," said he, "when I am not able to read?" "Yes, it may be of great service to you; you can carry it to your lodgings, and have it read to you; or you can send it to your family, some of whom can read it. It will do you good: buy one." The man attended to this advice, and carried the book to his lodgings.

We saw nothing more of this man until autumn; when he returned, and earnestly entreated a copy of every kind of book we could give him. "You can form no idea," said he, "of the good that book has done, which I bought here in the spring. There are more than thirty of us who mess together at the same lodgins; and at the time when I first took home the New Testament, these men spent almost every evening at the public house and returned intoxicated; but now the scene is quite altered; scarcely a man leaves the lodgings in the evening. There are three among us who can read; and they take it by turns, and the others sit around and listen to them. There is no drunkenness in our party now."

Oh! what an interesting scene would this group have presented to the eye of an apostle! thirty poor vilagers, collected together from various parts of the country, listening to one of the number reading the words of eternal life: and from this circumstance, breaking off from their vices, saving their hard earnings for their families, and acting like rational creatures! How true it is, that "godliness is profitable unto all things!"

 POST MASTERS may enclose money in a letter to the publisher of a newspaper, to pay the subscription of a third person, and frank the letter if written by himself.—POST-MASTER GENERAL.

Let another praise thee, and not thine own mouth; a stranger, and not thyself.—PROVERBS.

That we should be engaged in the performance of such works as are worthy of commendation, and that our whole conduct should be such as to elicit the favorable notice of the wise and good, is not only laudable, but our imperative duty. But to perform praise-worthy deeds for the sake of the praise of having done well, would be acting from motives of mere selfishness, without a proper inclination or desire to do good. Such motives to do good, annihilates all proper notions of duty, and deserves not the favorable consideration of men; much less can it be expected that such performances will meet the approbation of God. Notwithstanding we are to let our light shine before men that others seeing our good works may be led to glorify our Father who art in heaven, they should not be done with a pharisaical disposition, only to be seen of men. We can readily perceive the difference between publicly doing good from a sense of duty, and for the sake of example, and doing the same works from motives of pride and selfishness—to be seen of men. The former our Lord commands; the latter he most unreservedly condemns. It is said, "out of the abundance of the heart, the mouth speaketh." So when we hear men speaking in praise of their own good qualities or works, we naturally infer that they are seeking the applause of men, and that this has been the governing principle of their actions.

To hear a man speaking in his own praise, is such a palpable manifestation of pride, folly, and self-love, that it serves greatly to lessen his reputation in the estimation of discerning, wise, and good men.

Mr. Henry says: "Every one will be forward to run him down that cries himself up." Thus we see that the course taken by many to obtain the confidence and applause of their fellows, operates directly to the reverse of their intentions.

But of professed christians better things are expected. It is supposed that they, like their Divine Master, act only from a sense of duty, and under the influence of a spirit of benevolence, and not of selfishness.

Every expression, therefore, that would seem to imply self praise, should by them be strenuously guarded against. The habit of some professors of religion, and of some ministers when speaking of the success of some religious or benevolent work of making themselves appear prominent by frequent reference to themselves, is a great evil, and calculated to do themselves and the cause of religion much harm. To such the words of Solomon need to be often repeated, "Let another man praise thee, and not thine own mouth."

There may be a just occasion to vindicate ourselves, but in no case does it become us to applaud ourselves.

THE CELEBRATION.—The sixty-fourth Anniversary of American Independence was celebrated in this village on the third inst., according to previous notice. The day was very fine, and before the hour arrived for the commencement of the exercises, the people, old and young, were flocking to the place of rendezvous.—When the hour of appointment arrived the procession moved in excellent order, and presenting a very imposing appearance, passed through the principal streets of our village to the Presbyterian Church, which, though a very large building, was filled to overflowing. It has been estimated that not less than one thousand people were present on the occasion.

After a few appropriate remarks from the President of the day, Hon. Mr. Enos, in which he expressed his satisfaction in meeting so many children, youth, and other citizens in a celebration of this day, he refered in a very happy manner to the spirit of union which pervaded this community. His remarks were listened to with marked attention by all present; and we trust they will have an abiding influence upon all who heard them.

After the reading of the Declaration of Independence, by Ira Gage Barnes, Esq., the audience were addressed by Z. T. Bentley, Esq., in his usual easy and impressive manner. After the exercises were concluded at the church, the procession was again formed and marched to the Bower erected in the Institute Square, where refreshments had been prepared by the respective Committees appointed for the occasion. The repast having been finished, the audience were favored with a few very complimentary and appropriate remarks from the Rev. J. R. Johnson. And, in short, the whole proceedings were characterized with a degree of unanimity and interest which reflects much honor upon our citizens & the surrounding community.

THE QUESTION SETTLED CONDITIONALLY.

The Rev. Dr. Morrison of London, (Eng.) in a letter to Rev. Dr. Cox, of New York city, (in which he speaks in terms of high commendation of the American Biblical Repository,) in noticing two articles on Baptism from the pen of President Beecher of Illinois College, observes:—"Dr. Beecher's two articles on Baptism, in the last two numbers, are well worthy the attention of the theologians of our age. If they shall ultimately appear to be based on sound principles, it will go far with candid minds to settle the Baptismal controversy." Now it is well known that the great objection to Pedo-baptism is, that the principles on which it is based are unsound. We have been looking on for years, while our brethren have been be-laboring each other respecting this important ordinance; and though we have been led to commend the industry, the ingenuity, and the address of the disputants, we have rarely seen a new idea advanced. We consider the subject capable of no new argument; and when a champion takes the field to settle the controversy, we may look for a remodeling of familiar arguments, or a resurrection of some old work. And when the work appears, and the question is said to be settled, the soundness of the premises is denied—other pens are called out, and thus the controversy is protracted, and frequently much to the embarrassment of the cause of religion.

We are not disposed to speak disparagingly of the production of President Beecher. We believe the subject to have been treated with much ability and ingenuity; but it is objectionable on account of its making baptism a perpetuation, in another form, of a rite which the scripture declares to have been abolished, instead of an ordinance of Christ, and peculiar to believers in New Testament times.

We do sincerely believe the baptismal controversy is carried farther than the interests of religion require—farther than is contemplated in the injunction to "contend earnestly for the faith once delivered to the saints"—and farther than is requisite for the prosperity of the different denominations. When the time arrives when christians shall labor with less reference to the advancement of their own particular sentiments and denominations, and more with a view of extending the truth and cause of Christ on general principles—when every man shall look on 'the things of others,' as well as 'on his own,' then shall God command the increase of Zion—then "truth shall spring up from the earth, and righteousness shall look down from heaven."

TEMPERANCE.—It is worthy of remark, that at the late celebration of Independence in this village, nothing that could intoxicate was used; and though the crowd of people from the adjacent towns was very great, we have not heard of one instance of excessive drinking on that day at any of the public houses, or groceries. We have attended many celebrations on the fourth of July, but have never seen the laws of decency and decorum so universally respected on any former occasion.—Verily, a community whose conduct evinces so much self-respect, cannot fail of being respected.

INTELLIGENCE.

TWENTY-SIXTH CONGRESS.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES—SUB-TREASURY BILL PASSED.

Tuesday, June 30.—The Washington correspondent of the Journal of Commerce gives the following sketch of the proceedings on the final passage of this bill.

At the hour of 11 o'clock, the Speaker announced that the special order was the Sub-Treasury bill, and the question was on ordering it to a third reading. Some members disputed this, and asked how it could be, inasmuch as it was left in committee last night. The Speaker explained that the resolution directing that the bill should be taken up in the House at 11 o'clock today, as the special order, must be enforced, and that all rules were suspended by it.

There was, of course, a rush for the floor—many being still desirous of speaking, but Mr. Vanderpool luckily obtained it, and moved the previous question, which was seconded.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; yeas 123, nays 105. It was read a third time; and Mr. Graham, of North Carolina, succeeded in getting the floor, and spoke some time against it. About half past four, in the evening session, Mr. G. finished, and a dozen more rose to speak, but the gentleman who got the floor moved the previous question, which was seconded almost by acclamation.

After a call of the House, which brought all the members now in the city to their places, the bill was passed; yeas 124, nays 107. The majority was thus 17.

Messrs. Wick of Indiana, Carey of Illinois, and Campbell of South Carolina, voted against the bill. Mr. Fisher, of North Carolina, another doubtful vote was absent.

The title of the bill having been read, Mr. Cooper of Pennsylvania, moved to amend the title of the bill so as to read as follows: "A bill to reduce the value of property, the products of the farmer, and the wages of labor; to destroy the indebted portion of the community, and to place the money of the nation in the hands of the President."

Mr. Cushing moved further to amend the title by calling it

"An act to enable the public money to be drawn from the Treasury, without appropriations by law."

Mr. Cushing said his object was not a trivial one; he wished to draw the attention of the country to the character of the bill in this respect.

Here tremendous noise—loud cries of order, &c. arose.

Mr. Cushing raised his voice above the clamor and demanded to be heard, speaking, as he did, in order. We are at the last scene of this drama, he said, but the end is not yet. The bill is entitled an act to provide for keeping, transfer, &c. of the public moneys. Those objects are already provided for by law, but this bill provides for other things. He refered to the sections providing for the keeping of the money, and contended that they gave the Treasurer the power to make transfers of the public money at pleasure. He argued too that no one particular spot could be constituted the Treasury of the U. S. The Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means had said that there was no constitutional objection to this bill. He now made this motion to show that, in his opinion, the bill was unconstitutional. He said that he had witnessed the laying of the cockatrice egg; he had seen it hatched; and he trusted that he should live to see it crushed. It was forced upon the House in an arbitrary manner, &c.

Mr. Pickens started up from his chair and commenced a reply to the gentleman from Massachusetts. Great confusion was the consequence. Some of the friends of the bill, apprehensive of a debate on this incidental point called Mr. P. to order. The Whigs cried let him go on—we will answer!" There was a general uproar. Order being restored, Mr. Pickens said, the gentleman from Massachusetts had no right to say this bill was forced on the House, &c. He had wrongly characterized the bill. It was an act to redeem the country from the hands of those who had been swindling labor of its proceeds for the last forty years! It would drive back those wolves from the sheepfold. The gentleman had said that this was the last act of the drama. It was a mistake. This was the first act. There were yet great fiscal questions lying behind this, which were deeply and intimately connected with it.—This act was to draw a line between incorporated credit and the great landed and laboring interest. He protested against the construction put on the bill by Mr. Cushing, as false and exaggerated. Should the Government officers make transfers and drafts without authority, they would soon be brought to account for it.

But so near were we to the consummation of this great work, that he would not detain the House by a full expression of his sentiments.

A dozen members here started for the floor to reply. "I have not done," continued Mr. Pickens,—"I move the previous question." "That is South Carolina chivalry," exclaimed Mr. Stanley—or something to that effect. Mr. Pickens retorted, but in words which were drowned in the general confusion.

The Speaker exerted himself to keep order.

At length, the amendments to the bill were rejected, and the house adjourned at about 8 o'clock.

SUMMARY.

Information has been received from the Cape of Good Hope which confirms a former account of an engagement between the Dutch commander and the Dingaan Caffres. The latter are said to have lost 30,000 men. The loss of the former was very small. Panda, the relative of Dingaan, was in quiet possession of the throne. It was believed that an effort would be made to expel the usurper by exciting the neighboring chiefs to invade his kingdom.

Fire in Penn Yan.—Nearly the whole business part of the village of Penn Yan was destroyed by fire on the night of the 22d ultimo. Damage was done to the amount of $80,000.

Rev. Nathaniel Taylor lately arrived at Rochester in apparent good health, and was a corpse in four hours. His death was caused by an affection of the heart.

Asiatic Cholera.—A man by the name of Crusa died near Princeton, N. J., a few days since of Cholera.

Violent Storm.—On the 6th June, at 2 o'clock A. M., a violent and frightful storm passed over Little Rock, (Ark.) which did considerable damage. The printing office of the Star was blown down, the press broken, and the types and other materials scattered about and much injured. A number of buildings were demolished, and several Steamboats seriously injured.—Capt. Mc Crea of the U. S. Army had his leg broken in attempting to secure the fastnings of the steamer De Kalb, on board of which Capt. Mc C's family were at the time. No lives we believe, were lost.

The General Bankrupt Bill has passed the Senate of the United States by a vote of 21 to 19. Several Senators being absent.

The Steam Ship Great Western sailed from New-York on the first inst. with 150 passengers; the largest number ever taken out for a foreign port by a Steam vessel.

Sunday School Union.—The receipts into the Treasury of the Sunday School Union from the first of March 1839 to March 1st 1840, amounted to $13,634,63. This sum they have exceeded in expenditures by nearly $1,000. Nine Missionaries have been employed the past year: six in the Valley of the Mississippi, one in Western New York, and two at the South.—The whole number of copies of the various works of the Society, printed since the last report, is 775,802.

Hon. William Russell, formerly a Judge of the Supreme Court of the State of New Jersey, and since a Judge of the District Court of the U. S. died at his residence in Mount Holly, N. Jersey, one week ago last Sabbath, aged 80 years.

The N. Y. Journal of Commerce says that Twenty-nine Locomotives, and twelve hundred cars are now running on the Baltimore and Ohio Rail Road.

A ship destroyed by Fire.—The ship Arab, Capt. Chase, having on board about 2,000 bags of Cotton, was destroyed by fire in the Bay of Mobile, on the 17th of June. The cotton is said to have been insured in Europe; vessel and other freight in New York.

Poisoned.—More than sixty persons were poisoned by eating corn bread on board the steam-boat New York, above Cincinnati. The poison was infused into the bread or meal, and all who ate of it were taken with violent vomiting. The whole matter is a mystery. No death had occurred.

War.—The Peruvian Government has declared war against Bolivia. The rebellion in the province of Pasto (one of the southern provinces of New Grenada) has broke out afresh. The Small Pox also rages there and in the Isthmus to an alarming extent.

It is stated in a Panama paper that the Pasto rebellion was occasioned by a decree of June 5, 1839, suppressing the convents.

Fire.—The Paper Mill owned by Bennett & Co., at Mount Holly, N. J. was consumed by fire on the evening of Thursday week. Loss $10,000. Insurance $8,500.

Murder near Savannah, Geo.—The Savannah Daily Telegraph states that Alexander Atkinson, Esq. of Camden county, was lately murdered by his negroes, in a field, for reproving them for idleness. Eight of the negroes have been arrested. Mr. A. was formerly a member of the Legislature.—New Yorker.

The girls of the Saccarappa Mills, N. H., have struck, because their wages were reduced.

The annual expenses of New Hampshire are only $15,000 and no debt upon which to pay interest.

Latest from New Orleans.—The River.—The river is still rising, in some parts of the Levee it is overflowing. We expect in a day or two to see the persons living in the front streets, seeking shelter in the back part of the city.

Libral.—Mrs. Martha Johonnot, who died recently at Salem, has left twenty-five thousand dollars to the Massachusetts Lunatic Hospital, in trust, for the benefit of poor patients belonging to the county of Essex.

Court Martial Case.—We have not heard that a decision has been received yet in the case of Commodore Elliot, but we are informed that Commodore Jones on Monday directed his sword to be returned to him.—This we take as evidence that the decision in his case will not be unfavorable to the Commodore. It is believed that nine-tenths of those who have read the defence of Commodore Elliot, acquit him of the charges brought against him.—Phila. Ledger.

Important from Jamaica.—Intelligence from Jamaica has been received at New Orleans up to the 5th of June. On the 26th of May serious riots occurred at Falmouth between a party of Negroes, aided, it is said, by a Baptist preacher named Ward, and a detachment of police. Claiming that the negroes were indented apprentices, the officers attempted to take them from the plantation of Mr. Ward, who harbored them under the impression that they had recently been captured from a slaver, and were entitled to liberty. The civil posse failing to capture the Africans, a company of troops was sent against them, a fight ensued, the troops were repulsed, and the commander and 19 of his men were wounded. After this an overwhelming force was sent from Kingston; another engagement took place, and the Africans and their friends were overcome, about 100 of them being killed and wounded, and the leaders taken prisoners. Many of the Baptist preachers had been arrested, and ordered to leave the island, at the date of the latest accounts.—New Yorker.

Suicide.—A Spanish Indian, by the name of Thompson, who was imprisoned in the county jail in this city, about a week since, for abusing his wife, was found suspended by the neck in his cell, on Tuesday morning—life extinct. He attached his bed cord to a grate, then tied the other end around his neck, and contrived to hang himself, notwithstanding his feet dragged upon the floor.—Hartford Times.

Important Seizure.—The British steam ship Argyle, which arrived on Friday, with $418,000 in specie, from Vera Cruz, was seized on Saturday at the instance of the Collector of the port, for a violation of the treaty stipulation between Great Britain and the United States, in regard to the carrying trade. The specie, which is all owned in New Orleans, we understand, is placed in a safe deposite, to await the decision in the case of the proper authorities.—N. O. Bulletin.

Interesting Incident.—In consequence of the late difficulty among the Irish laborers on the W. R. Road, near Pitsfield, the contractor discharged a large number of them, and went to New York to employ others to supply their places. The Salem Gazette states, that he arrived in the city just in season to engage a supply of fresh emigrants from Ireland, every one of whom had Father Matthew's Temperance Medal hung to his neck as a pledge of total abstinence from intoxicating liquor.

A Good Business.—A little boy in Boston has been induced to try the experiment of selling iced water at one cent a glass! The first day he sold 89 glasses, the second 184, and the third 201, making 474 glasses in three days. The ice having cost 25 cents, he cleared about one dollar and fifty cents a day.

Mormons.—The Mormons are again collecting and building up a town at a place they call Nauvoo, in Illinois. It is said that since last October 300 houses have gone up in town. The persecution of these people by Missouri has led to this, and will finally result in rendering them not only objects of charity but of fair example.—Logansport, (In.) Herald.

Surgical.—We understand an operation was performed upon Mr. John Beitzel, of Kensington, on the 15th of May last, which promises entire success.

The disease was in the right side, a great portion of the lungs being occupied by an abscess which communicated with the cavity of the chest—the diagnosis being based upon physical exploration.

The operation was performed by Dr. J. P. Bethell, in presence of Drs. J. E. Taylor, J. K. Knorr, C. Baker, G. W. Patterson and T. A. Reilly.

An incision was made about three inches long between the sixth and seventh ribs; a gum elastic tube was introduced into the cavity of the abscess, and the pus drawn off by means of a pump. The orifice was kept open and the tube applied until the pus (which amounted to 24 ounces) was entirely removed.

The patient immediately after the operation became entirely relieved; his cough subsided, and his respiration became easy.

He is now convalescent, having had no bad symptoms since the operation, and remains under the care of Drs. Bethel and Taylor.—Phila. Enq.

A Skeleton.—We understand that in digging the foundation for the Water Witch Engine House, a few days since, several human bones were found, in what had apparently been a grave of an adult individual. Laying with them were also found a small hand clever, and two half cents, dated 1807 and 1809. A short distance above the bones, and apparently a part of the filling of the grave was a thick coat of mortar. Although an event occurring within thirty years, as is indicated by the date of the coins, yet no knowledge appears to be possessed by any person of the circumstances of such an interment; and although shrouded in mystery, it may be the only evidence that will ever be presented that some homicide has been committed.—Del. (Wilmington) Gaz.

Quick Trip.—The steamboat Erie arrived at Buffalo on Saturday last, from Chicago, making a trip a distance of 1200 miles, in 4 days, touching at ten intermediate ports to take in wood and passengers.—Olive Branch.

A Scotchman, named Geo. McNeal, at Pottsville, Pa., in a drunken fit poured a tea kettle of boiling water on his wife, scalding out one of her eyes and shockingly mutilating her face.—Ib.

The Journal of Commerce says—"The two Deacons of a Congregational Church recently formed in New York are both converted infidels, and belonged to the Tammany Hall Club."—Ib.

Wreck on Lake Erie.—The Buffalo Commercial, of Wednesday evening, says, "The schooner Commercial, of Connecticut, with 250 barrels of salt on board, was run into and sunk by the Great Western on Monday night last, and time only afforded to take the crew before she went down."—Ib.

United States Commerce.—From the annual statement, presented to Congress, it appears that the imports into this country for the year ending September 30, 1839, were $162,092,132; and the exports for the period were $121,023,410. Of these exports $17,494,525 were foreign articles reshipped. Of the imports, $143,874,252 were brought in American, and the rest in foreign vessels. During the year, the amount of American tonnage entered was 1,491,279 tons, and the amount of tonnage cleared was 1,577,923. The tonnage of shipping built in the United States during the year was 120,986. The whole tonnage registered, enrolled and licensed, of the United States, would appear from the report to be 2,228,323; of which about 200,000 is in the fishing and whaling business.—Olive Branch.

NORTH EASTERN BOUNDARY.

The following message was this day received from the President of the United States, by Mr. A. Van Buren, his secretary:

To the Senate:

The importance of the subject to the tranquility of our country makes it proper that I should communicate to the Senate, in addition to the information heretofore transmitted in reply to their resolution of the 17th of January last, the copy of a letter just received from Mr. Fox, announcing the determination of the British Government to consent to the principles of our last proposition for the settlement of the question of the North Eastern Boundary, with a copy of the answer made to it by the Secretary of State. I cannot doubt that, with the sincere disposition which actuates both Governments to prevent any other than an amicable termination of the controversy, it will be found practicable so to arrange the details of a conventional agreement on the principles alluded to as to effect that object.

The British Commissioners, in their report communicated by Mr. Fox, express an opinion that the true line of the treaty of 1783 is materially different from that so long contended for by Great Britain. The report is altogether ex parte in its character, and has not yet, as far as we are informed, been adopted by the British Government. It has, however, assumed a form sufficiently authentic and important, to justify the belief that it is to be used hereafter by the British Government in the discussion of the question of boundary; and as it differs essentially from the line claimed by the United States, an immediate preparatory exploration and survey on our part, by commissioners appointed for that purpose, of the portions of the territory therein more particularly brought into view, would, in my opinion, be proper. If Congress concur with me in this view of the subject, a provision by them to enable the Executive to carry it into effect will be necessary.

GERRIT SMITH AND ABOLITION ORGANIZATIONS.

The views which we expressed in our "Moral Machinery Simplified" are finding favor with the most decided abolitionists.—Gerrit Smith, who has been regarded as ultra by abolitionists themselves, has, with his accustomed frankness, expressed his change of views. The resolutions referred to in the letter given below, were passed by Mr. Barstow's church, and were such as most of the Northern churches would cheerfully pass, if the subject should come before them without prejudice from anti-slavery agencies and organizations. The letter of Mr. S. was originally published in the New Hampshire Sentinel.

Peterboro', May 25th, 1840.

MY OLD AND DEAR FRIEND:—I have just read in the New-York Evangelist, of 23d inst., your letter to the editor of the Panoply. I cannot refrain from taking up my pen to tell you how much I am pleased with it—because I had got the impression, the painful impression, that you were taking but little interest in the question of slavery.

I would that every church in the Free States would adopt your second resolution. Such a universal adoption of a resolution, which expresses fully, though in mild terms, the great abolition doctrine, would exert a mighty and blessed influence on the whole South. Will you not make a great effort to induce the New England people to adopt it? I should expect more good from such a stand on the part of the Northern churches, than from any of the measures of our anti-slavery organizations. The day of their usefulness has, I apprehend, gone by. My reliance, under God, for the future, is on church and individual action.

With great regard, your friend and brother.

GERRIT SMITH.

Rev. Z. Smith Barstow.

Method of Restoring Life to the apparently drowned.—Recommended by the "Royal Humane Society of England," instituted in the year 1774. Avoid all rough usage. Do not hold up the body by the feet, or roll it on casks or barrels, or rub it with salt or spirits, or apply tobacco. Lose not a moment in carrying the body to the nearest house, with the head and shoulders raised. Place it in a warm room if the weather is cold. Preserve silence, and positively admit no more than three intelligent persons. Let the body be instantly stripped, dried, and wrapped in hot blankets, which are to be frequently renewed. Keep the mouth, nostrils and throat free and clean. Apply warm substances to the back, spine, pit of the stomach, arm-pits and soles of the feet.—Rub the body with heated flannel, or cotton, or warm hands. Attempt to restore breathing by gently blowing with a bellows into one nostril, closing the mouth and the other nostril. Press down the breast carefully, with both hands and then let it rise again, and thus imitate natural breathing. Keep up the application of heat—continue the rubbing—increase it when life appears, and then give a tea spoonful of warm water, or very weak brandy and water, or wine and water. Persevere for six hours. Send quickly for medical assistance.

From the N. O Bulletin, June 22.

Campeachy.—As we stated a few days since, on an authority of verbal information, this city has not been given up to the Federalists. The actual state of affairs at our last advices, was about as follows:—The forces investing the town by land, 3000 men, every one of whom, it is said, will peril his life for the cause; by sea, five vessels, well manned and well armed. Two forts, St. Michael and St. Joseph, commanding the harbor, which the Republicans have captured from the Centralists. The Mexican Centralists, to the number of 3 or 400, occupy the fort within the walls of the town, and this is the only foothold they have in the province of Yucatan. In this fort they are closely invested.—They can neither get out, nor obtain supplies of any sort. Consequently, if not foolishly let loose by the Federalists they must soon surrender at discretion. And more, the worthy Governor of the State has gone in person to superintend and press the siege, and the next arrival will undoubtedly bring tidings of the fall of Campeachy, and the entire expulsion of the Central despots and hirelings from the free soil of Yucatan.

From documents published in the Bulletin it appears that on the 20th of May a proposition for an armistice was negociated, through the French consul and the commander of the French squadron. The terms proposed were, that hostilities should be suspended until the 5th of June, the garrison to surrender on that day unless 500 men should previously be landed for its relief. During the suspension of the siege the besiegers to admit 30 loads of corn and 2 head of cattle daily, for the subsistence of the garrison. The troops on either side not to very their position or erect any new defences, and the vessels of the blockading squadron not to approach within reach of the guns of the fort.

The proposal was rejected by the Governor of Yucatan—Federalist—to whom it was submitted for ratification.—N. Y. Spectator.

PIRACY AND MURDER.

The following information, furnished by a resident of Havana, contains full particulars of the loss of the Br. Brig Vernon, and her capture by pirates, 1st May 1840—together with a list of the crew saved, and those murdered:

The Br. Brig Vernon left Jamaica, 26th April, for Halifax, with a cargo of 85 puncheons rum, and a crew consisting of James Cunningham, Master, and John McCloud, mate, residents of Halifax; George McCoy, Benj. Peach, Edw. Norton and James Tyler, (colored man) cook. On the 1st of May, at 10 A. M. Cape Antonio bearing South of West three leagues distant, a boat was seen coming from the shore and making for the brig—at first sight the captain supposing it to be filled with some shipwrecked seamen, bore down for it, but the wind being light but little progress made. On the proximity of the brig to the boat, the latter was discovered to contain seven men armed with muskets and knives. When within reach of their shots they poured volley after volley at the brig's crew, who were obliged to retreat below, with the exception of the mate and one seaman, who took refuge behind the masts. Here they remained without any hopes of life except by quiet submission, for there were no arms on board, until the pirates came along, when by a motion to go below, made by the waving of the hand of one of the pirates, they, too, reluctantly went below, and thus left the deck clear for the pirates, who immediately boarded and ordered the Captain to come on deck.

On the Captain obeying their command, one of them stated that a Spanish man-of-war was lying in the river, and had sent for their papers. They next ordered the flag to be hoisted and the vessel steered for the land, which was done and at night the brig was anchored in shore close to a fisherman's hut. The sails were clued up and the crew ordered aloft to furl them. After this was done they conducted each one as he came from aloft and confined them all together in the forecastle and closed it tight. In about one hour and a half they opened the scuttle and ordered them on deck. On reaching the deck they found an addition to the pirates' gang of four fishermen, who, with the first, were eating and drinking.—The crew were then allowed something to eat. During the whole night a strict watch was kept by the pirates, and no one was allowed to approach them.

The next morning they ordered the crew to get the brig under way, and after all the sails were set, they steered the vessel about ten miles along the coast where a river discharged itself into the sea. Up this river they conducted the brig about six miles inland—the name of the river is Panio del Rio; here they ran the brig ashore and ordered the crew to discharge the cargo.—They obliged Capt. Cunningham to assist in discharging, although he was feeble from age. When the cargo was out they ordered the Captain and three of the crew into their boat, which already had five pirates in it—the pirates told them all that they were not going to kill them but going to get ballast for the brig. They made the sailors row the boat, and when about four gun shots from the brig the work of death began, by one of the Pirates in the bow of the boat, stabbing the Cook in the heart. This was about 4 o'clock, and the signal they had to commence the massacre was the order to cease rowing. After killing the Cook, they threw his body overboard, and then again stabbed him while in the water. At this moment young Peach sprang overboard and made for the shore, among the mangrove bushes, in which he secreted himself.—Once he looked back, and saw the captain's head over the gunwale of the boat, and saw the Pirates cutting his throat. The body of another sailor, Edward Norton, of Eastport, Me., was hanging lifeless athwart the boat.

Young Peach, after thus escaping from their hands, travelled ten miles through mangrove bushes part of the time, and swimming the remainder. He was stripped as they all were by the Pirates, of every thing but their pantaloons. Hence, his feet were continually bleeding from the cuts he received on the coral rocks. During this long period he had nothing to subsist on but a wild pigeon he killed with a stick on the second morning, in the mangrove bushes. Still he wandered on sucking the blood and eating the flesh of this bird. At last he saw a small schooner sailing along the coast, but it growing dark he soon lost sight of her. Here he slept all night, and on the morrow saw with mistrust the schooner had reached in shore, and fearing he was about to fall in the hands of the same gang, he hesitated a moment, but such was his miserable condition from starvation and thirst, and the heat of the sun on his bare body, that he had rather die than continue such a miserable existence—he therefore swam off to the schooner and threw himself upon his knees and begged for life and water. The Captain not understanding him, but supposing he was a cast away sailor, took care of him, and by signs made him understaud he was safe.

After seeing the unfortunate man attended to, Capt. Antonio Peloso, the worthy commander of the Schooner, coasted along the shore in search of the vessel supposed to be wrecked.

When within six miles of Cape Antonio, he landed at the spot which the English sailor pointed out, thinking that the vessel was there, and having no suspicion of Pirates. On Capt. Peloso's landing he was met by the seven pirates and four fishermen, who threatened his life, but by artifice he deceived them and gained their confidence. From them he gained the intelligence of an English brig having been taken, and part of their crew murdered,—that two were still alive, but would soon be put to death. It was now that the brave Spanish Captain Don Antonio Peloso determined to save these unfortunates or die in the attempt. He gave the pirates three muskets and invited them to breakfast with him on the morrow, but before leaving them he sought an opportunity of seeing the two sailors who were in their power and still alive.

The Pirate Capt. said, that after murdering the Captain and part of the crew, he reserved the rest to paint their boat and mend their sails—that now the work was done, and to-morrow they must die. In order to gain greater confidence with the pirates. Capt. Antonio Peloso informed them that he had picked up on the coast an English sailor, who probably had escaped from this vessel, and to-morrow when they came off to breakfast they should have him. Thus they parted for the night. On the morrow, the Pirates, faithful to their engagement, came on board Capt. Peloso's schooner to breakfast, and at a signal given he and his crew rushed upon them and secured the whole that came off in the boat. After confining them, Capt. P. manned his boat and went ashore, and took the two pirates who were guarding the two sailors, prisoners. There then was a scene beyond the power of pen to describe—the liberator and liberated rushing into each others' arms. The Pirates and four fishermen are now safe in the Punta prison, and next week will suffer death.

CLEAR THE WAY!
I am here Myself among the Rest.

THE subscriber still keeps 'digging' away at Bureaus, Tables, Stands, and Bedsteads, and sometimes makes other work that folks want; but he don't think it best to go into a bill of particulars. Suffice it to say, that there will be kept on hand, or made to order, all kinds of Cabinet Ware in his line of business. Having been to some expense in obtaining experienced workmen, (that folks do say can't be beat in getting up things nice,) he would invite those wishing to purchase articles cheap, durable and handsome, to "just drop in" the Ware Room ☞one door east of the Stone Store, and directly opposite the Post Office.

☞Most kinds of Lumber and Produce received in exchange for Furniture, and CASH not refused.

TOO TRUE TO DOUBT:
he Way all Clear.

THE subscriber wishes to have it understood by his friends and former customers, that he has commenced business in the new three story building directly opposite De Ruyter Institute, where he is prepared to furnish all his old customers, and many new ones, all kinds of work in his line, such as Bureaus, Secretaries, Lockers, and even Sofas; Bedsteads, Book-cases, Tables, Stands, and every other article in his line, on the shortest notice. He will sell work as low as any shop in De Ruyter or in Madison county. He will receive in exchange for furniture all kinds of Lumber and Produce at the highest market prices. He is determined to give satisfaction to those who may favor him with their custom.

N. B. Those who may wish to pay cash will do well to remember that he does not intend to be outdone in his work nor undersold neither. ☞Coffins of every description made on the shortest notice, in the neatest style, and on the most accommodating terms. He has also made arrangements to do all kinds of Carriage, House and Sign PAINTING, Glazing, Bronzing, &c., by the best of workmen, and on the shortest notice. All orders from a distance thankfully received and punctually attended to.

POETRY.

From the New-Yorker.

SUNSET ON THE PRAIRIES.

BY ELIZABETH J. EAMES.

The sun goes down o'er wood and hill and plain
Of this great Western World. Gorgeously bright,
O'er aisle and altar of the forest fame
Its rich rays fall in floods of golden light,
And brooks and streams flash clear, and flowers have caught
A hue to wake the Poet's glorious thought.

And strangely, brightly beautiful art thou,
O Mount ! rising in antique mould
From thy green throne of prairie. On thy brow
Yon diadem of clouds, wrought in the gold
Of the last sun, is beautiful—a Genii's haunt
In Eastern story should be like thee, Mount.

Beautiful art thou in thy summer sheen
Of leaf, and flower, and purple-fruited vines,
Climbing up o'er thy sides of mossy green
In wild luxuriance. The forest-myrtle twines
Its leafy tendrils thy fair borders round,
And ivy-tufted flowers thy brow have crowned.

Many-voiced birds, on rainbow-colored wing,
Rest 'mid the boughs of yon low blossoming tree ;
And many a lay of the wild woods they sing,
Filling the air with fairy melody ;
While the glad bee and radiant butterfly
On golden wings go gaily humming by.

And here alone (a wandering, musing child
Of other climes) at eve I often stray,
And set me down, in this far Western wild,
To dream the sunset's glorious hour away ;
And many a far-off idea thou hast brought,
Strange Mount ! to fill my spirit's busy thought.

All the oft-changing feelings of my heart
Are known to thee. Trouble, and Grief, and Fear,
And Joy, and Hope, have borne a mingled part
In the outpourings thou hast witnessed here ;
And Health and Peace my slender frame hath wooed
In this calm school of lovely solitude !

And now, loved Mount ! I leave thee, once again
Amid the busy scenes of Life to rove
—Yet thoughts of thee will link in Memory's chain
Holy and fond—for here thy precious love,
O cherished one ! was offered at my shrine,
And here I gave to thee this worthless heart of mine !

Utica, June 11, 1840.

MISCELLANEOUS.

From the Olive Leaf.

THE PICTURE.

TRANSLATED FROM THE GERMAN.

During the administration of the government of the city of Rome, by Piccolomini, an honest man, whose advanced age and feeble health, allowed him no longer to be occupied in the humble art, by which he and his wife had sustained themselves, found himself constrained to sell, one by one, the few articles of their household furniture which still remained, in order to procure bread. Among them was a small, but precious painting, by the illustrious Raphael, which had been transmitted from the wealthy ancestors of the old man ; but of the history and value of which he was entirely ignorant. Obscured with smoke and dust, he regarded it as unworthy the trouble of an attempt to sell it. At last, pinched by necessity, and meeting an accidental opportunity, he offered it to an artist, who, though possessing no ability with the pencil, had an exact judgment of them & devoted his time to the purchase and sale of them, a traffic in which he had become distinguished among amateurs and the nobility. No sooner had the artist beheld the picture than he recognized the hand of Raphael, and was convinced of its great value. But wishing villainously to take advantage of the good old man's ignorance and urgent necessities, he immediately began to deprecate it as a daubed production of some inexperienced and obscure hand, and offered for it a few coppers, which he failed not to represent as alms given out of compassion, rather than a compensation for the painting, exulting, meanwhile, in his heart, at the rich acquisition, and smiling at the readiness of the poor man, who thankfully accepted the deceitful offer.

There arrived not many days after, at the house of the suffering pair, an old friend, who, seeing no more the picture which he had been accustomed to behold on the wall, inquired what had become of it. They informed him to whom, and for what they had sold it. The visitor was filled with indignation, at the chicanery of the artist, and assuring the old man that it was the work of some great master, and was infinitely more valuable than he had supposed, insisted upon an immediate appeal to the Governor, whither he offered to accompany him. This judicious officer heard the facts attentively, and after noting the measure of the picture and other statements, dismissed them both with the assurance that he would fully repair the loss.

The Governor himself was a lover of the arts, and possessed a valuable collection. In his gallery there were fortunately, two pictures which corresponded in size with the one which he was anxious to rescue from the dishonest painter. Commanding one of these to be removed, he sent for the artist.

"Can you," said he, "by any means discover a painting which will fit that frame, and be suitable to accompany the adjacent works?"

"I possess the very article," replied the painter, transported with joy, "and a splendid production of the renowned Raphael. A better in fact, cannot be found in the city to fill that vacancy."

"Bring it for my examination," said the Governor; and the artist hastened away for it, delighted with the success of his management.

The subject was the Holy Family, delineated with masterly touches. Cleared of the smoke and dust, the colors appeared to perfection, and the delighted eye saw revealed at once all the exactness of cantour, the delicacy of complexion, beauty of drapery, elegance of figure, and truth of expression, which characterize Raphael.

Placed in the frame, the Governor, after admiring it some time, inquired the price.

"I have already been offered a thousand dollars," replied the painter. "A friend yesterday made the offer, in behalf of an English nobleman who is impatient to obtain the gem." I replied firmly, demanding twelve hundred, which the work fully deserves, but since it pleases so well your Excellency, you shall have it at whatever addition to the first offer, you may choose to make."

The Governor was astonished and indignant at the cool dishonesty of the painter, but dissimulating his feelings, tranquilly said that he wished not to deprecate the genuine merit of the production, which was obviously of a high character, but he could hardly persuade himself, however, that so great an offer had been made for it. The painter broke forth in protestations the most serious and solemn, averring that he had scarcely told the whole truth, that even more was indirectly offered, and that if it was necessary, he would immediately produce his friend, the agent of the Englishman, to confirm his statements.

"Have you certainly then," replied the Governor, "had the offer of a thousand dollars ?"

"I have," answered the painter, "and can hope for much more if I demand it."

"Very well," rejoined the Governor, "we will say no more." Open that door he cried with a loud voice, turning suddenly towards an adjacent room. The door flew open, and they beheld before them the poor old man, from whom the picture had been purchased, and whom the Governor had concealed during his interview with the artist. It is easy to conceive the horror of the painter at this unexpected sight ; he turned pale, was bewildered, and trembled from head to foot. The Governor allowed him to stand some time in confusion, when assuming an air of severe authority, "Behold," said he, "villain, how thou hast taken advantage of the ignorance and sufferings of an unhappy old man. How couldst thou so treat him without remorse ? Thou hast taken from helpless age and poverty their bread. Execrable wretch, what penalty would be too severe for thee ? Be assured that if this crime is ever repeated, the present instance shall be remembered, and a double retribution be inflicted. The thousand dollars, which, by thine own confession the picture merits, and which thou hast asserted to have been already offered, give immediately to this man, and be grateful that I permit thee to escape with thy life."

Confounded, shame-faced, and forbidden a word of reply, the painter retired. With tears of tenderness and gratitude, the good old man blessed his sagacious benefactor, and the governor tasted in its fullness the incomparable pleasure of having delivered from injustice and want, a suffering family, and of having made the face of villainy to blush.

Education of Females.—There is a season when the youthful must cease to be young and the beautiful to excite admiration ; to learn how to grow old gracefully is perhaps one of the rarest and most valuable arts that can be taught to woman. And, it must be confessed, it is a most severe trial for those women to lay down beauty who have nothing else to take up. It is for this sober reason of life that education should lay up its rich resources. However disregarded they may have been, they will be wanted now.

When admirers fall away, and flatterers become mute, the mind will be driven to retire into itself, and if it find no entertainment at home, will be driven back again upon the world with increased force. Yet forgetting this, do we not seem to educate our daughters exclusively for the transient period of youth ? Do we not educate them for a crowd, and not for themselves ?—for show, and not for use ?—for time, and not for eternity ?

Good Nature.—Dame Grundy was the most good natured woman alive. Come what would, every thing was right, nothing wrong. One day farmer Grundy told a neighbor that he believed his wife was one of the most even tempered women in the world, for he never saw her cross in his life ; and that for once he should like to see her so. 'Well,' said a neighbor, 'go into the woods and bring her a load of the crookedest wood you can find, and if it does'nt make her cross, nothing will." Accordingly, to try the experiment, he teamed home a load of wood every way calculated to make a woman fret. For a week or more she used the wood copiously, but not a word of complaint escaped her lips. So one day the husband ventured to inquire of her, how she liked the wood. 'O it is beautiful says she, 'I wish you'd get another load of it, for it lays around the pot so completely !'

An Apt Reply.—In one of the latest days of Fox, the conversation turned on the comparative wisdom of the French and English character. "The Frenchman," it was observed, "delights himself with the present ; the Englishman makes himself anxious about the future ; is not the Frenchman the wiser ?" "He may be the merrier," said Fox "but did you ever hear of a savage who did not buy a mirror in preference to a telescope.

Modesty.—A beautiful flower that flourishes only in secret places.

"A great portion of the wretchedness which has often embittered married life, I am persuaded, has originated in the neglect of trifles. Connubial happiness is a thing of too fine a texture to be handled roughly. It is a plant which will not even bear the touch of unkindness ; a delicate flower, which indifference will kill, and suspicion blast. It must be watered with a shower of tender affection—expanded with the glow of attention, and guarded with the impregnable barrier of unshaken confidence. Thus nurtured, it will bloom with fragrance in every season of life, and sweeten even the loneliness of declining years."—Mrs. N. Sproat.

Walking is the best possible exercise. Habituate yourself to walk very far. The Europeans value themselves on having subdued the horse to the use of man ; but I doubt whether we have not lost more than we have gained by the use of this animal. No one thing has occasioned so much degeneracy of the human body. An Indian goes on foot nearly as far in a day, for a long journey, as an enfeebled white does on his horse, and he will tire the best horses. A little walk of half an hour, in the morning, when you first rise, is advisable. It shakes off sleep, and produces other good effects in the animal economy.—Jefferson's Memoirs.

FOR THE FARMER.

From the Yankee Farmer.

IMPROVE THE SOIL.

The article which follows, points out several methods of improving the soil. Every farmer knows very well the superior profit of a fertile soil in the production of crops that liberally repay him for his labor ; but every one is not equally sensible of the various ways of enriching his lands, nor does he eagerly embrace every opportunity within his knowledge.

Farmers should awaken and look to the importance of this subject, embrace every chance within the reach of their means and information, to render their soil more fertile ; and they will soon find a permanent improvement, and it will give better crops with less labor, for a mellow fertile soil is the most easy to work. Many means of improving the soil are neglected for want of information, and when new plans are recommended, they are adopted slowly, as many cannot confide in any practices that were not sanctioned by the usages of their forefathers.

"The golden rule of agriculture is to apply such manures and tillage, as will make heavy lands lighter, and light lands heavier, cold land hotter, and hot land colder." He only is a farmer who knows and follows this rule.

Lands are seldom so rich but it may be a matter of gain to increase their fertility ; and few tracts are so poor but that with proper tillage and manuring, they made the residence of plenty.

Manures are composed of all those substances which either directly, or indirectly, supply plants with their requisite food, by means of which they are enabled to expand and come to maturity.

In the first place, the different earths will serve to manure each other. Thus, clay is a fertilizer of a light sandy soil, and sand is equally a fertilizer of clay. Where clay is applied to a sandy soil it should be carted on in the fall, and spread evenly on the ground, that the frost may pulverize it before it is mixed with the soil in the spring.

The better these earths are mixed in the respective soils, the more sensible and immediate will be their effect: but their principle excellence is that they are calculated permanently to improve the soils to which they are applied. Stiff loams are also in the same way assisted by sand, and sand again by these ; but neither in so great a degree as in the former case. Generally it may be observed that all light, dry soils, are improved by being mixed with heavy earths, and vice versa.

Sand and fine gravel will greatly fertilize the soil of bog meadows, and this earth again is very good manure for all upland soils. It is peculiarly excellent for Indian corn when applied to the hills, and is very good for flax, hemp, and most other summer crops. Like gypsum, it is friendly to the growth of white clover. When applied to upland grasses, it should be laid on as a top dressing. Every kind of black mud from ponds and swamps, answers a somewhat similar purpose ; though if the mud be stiff and clayed, it should only be applied to a light dry soil.

The different sorts of marl found in bog swamps are also excellent manures for all upland soils. The earths are usually found at the depth of from one to three feet from the surface, and are either of a white, gray or brownish color. The former is the most efficacious, and the latter the least so, their strength being in proportion to the quantity of carbonate of lime they contain. It is best to mix these earths with the mass of black earth or bog dirt, that forms the upper stratum, in order to reduce their strength, and when thus mixed, a load of even the weakest kind is more efficacious than two of common barn dung.

Their operation as manures is similar to that of the Nova Scotia gypsum, have little or no effect when first applied to wheat and rye ; but by its afterwards covering the ground with a thick growth of white clover, it is rendered fit for producing largely of these crops. The same may be observed of the bog dirt. Like these, these marls are peculiarly excellent for Indian corn, and all summer grain, and a less quantity is sufficient. They may be used as a top-dressing or otherwise.

Ashes as a manure are found to be more efficacious in some parts of the country, than in others, generally most so, when applied to lands near the ocean. In some parts where the soil is extremely light and the bottom sand, the farmer can afford to pay twelve and a half cents a bushel, while in other parts, they are suffered to lie untouched about the pot-asheries.

Ashes generally answer the most valuable purposes when applied to Indian corn, particularly where the soil is not suitable to this plant. Where the soil is wet, cold, loamy or clayey, the plants are apt to get stunted with the cold rains which usually fall after planting ; and then the ashes serve to supply the natural deficiencies of the soil till it becomes fertilized by the sun.—But where the soil is natural to the growth of this plant, and there is no danger of its being stunted at its outset, perhaps it may be better to apply the ashes later, so that the plants may derive the greatest assistance from this manure, while the ears are setting and forming.

Ashes should generally be used for top-dressing: their salts lose nothing by exposure to the air, and soon find their way into the soil.

Soot is much more efficacious than ashes : besides salts, it contains oil. The soot of coal is esteemed equally as good as that of wood. It is used for top-dressings, and requires about forty bushels for an acre.—When applied to winter grain it should be sown in the spring ; and the same may be observed of ashes. Cold soot is particularly very good for meadow lands which have become sour and mossy. This manure, can however, only be had in considerable quantities in large towns.

Of salts, which serve as manures, the principal are the common sea salt, urine, stale of cattle, sea water, saltpetre and alkaline salts. To the latter, the virtue of ashes as a manure, is principally owing. Soap-suds is in part valuable on account of its akaline salts, and perhaps the neutralized oil it contains adds much to its value. It is usual to throw this manure away ; but this is a needless waste. It may be taken in the watering pot and strewed over the garden, where it will be of great service as a manure, and in expelling insects.

Great National Work !

Ladies Companion, (established in 1834,) a popular and highly esteemed MAGAZINE OF GENERAL LITERATURE AND THE FINE ARTS: embellished with Gorgeous and Costly Engravings on Steel, Copper and Wood, the Quarterly Fashions, and also with Fashionable and Popular Music, arranged for the Piano-Forte, Harp and Guitar.

TERMS—$3 a year. Single copies 25 cents.—Office 109 Fulton street, New York.

Mrs. L. H. Sigourney : The editors are happy to communicate the information to their readers, that arrangements have been effected with this talented lady by which she will still continue to be a regular and constant contributor to the 'Ladies Companion.' Her engagements in other quarters will not interfere with that connection with the 'Companion,' which secures to its readers the enjoyment of her beautiful productions.

Dr. Oliver Wendell Holmes of Boston ; Professor Longfellow of Cambridge College, and Mrs. Anna Maria Wells of Boston, will hereafter contribute to the 'Ladies Companion.'

SPLENDID NEW STEEL ENGRAVINGS by our best artists, accompany each number ; illustrated by tales and spirited sketches, which will as heretofore, continue to be magnificent and far superior to those published in any cotemporary work in America.

QUARTERLY FASHIONS.

Plates of the prevailing Fashions appear once every three months, viz : December, March, June and September.

The Ladies Companion contains a larger quantity of reading than any other magazine issued in this country, and its subscription price is only three dollars a year. The great combination of talent secured for the coming year will render it unequalled by any other periodical.

THE MUSICAL DEPARTMENT.

This department of the Ladies Companion has ever commanded a large share of attention, and has been looked upon with no little interest by its readers, and more especially the Ladies, whom the publisher is in the highest degree anxious to please.—It will continue to be a subject of more than usual care to him, and to the Professor under whose supervision it is placed, to make that portion of the magazine allotted to Music, more than ever deserving of the countenance of every lover of music.—It has ever been and will continue to be the desire to have all pieces of Music printed correctly and free from errors.

Over every department an equally careful supervision will be strictly exercised by the Editors, and all appropriate expenditures will be liberally bestowed, as it is the design of the publisher, with the aid of his contributors and the advice of his friends to make the Ladies Companion distinguished for beauty and accuracy of its typography—the variety and high tone of its literary articles—and the unequalled splendor of its pictoral Embellishments, which are entirely new and engraved by A. Dick, expressly for the work.

It is the determination of the publisher to use every means to maintain the superiority which the Ladies Companion has obtained. For four years he has steadily pursued a course of improvement, and he flatters himself that his present facilities are such as to give the Ladies Companion eminent advantages over all other publications of its character.

From the foregoing it will be perceived that the Ladies Companion embraces every department within the range of Belles Letters and the Fine Arts : and no exertion or expense will be deemed too great to render the work equal to any other extant. The flattering and general testimonials of nearly every contemporary journal in the United States, and in fact many on the other side of the Atlantic, have strongly asserted the undeniable claims of the Ladies Companion to the support of the public generally. There is no work that gives its readers such a great return for their subscriptions.

TERMS.—$3 a year in advance, or $4 during the year. No subscription received for less than one year.

Complete sets of the volume from May, 1839, can be furnished at the subscription price by applying at the office. All letters must be addressed, post paid, to WM. W. SNOWDEN, 109 Fulton street, N. Y.

Z. T. BENTLEY,

Attorney & Counsellor at Law,

GILES M. LANGWORTHY, Teacher of Math.
AUGUSTUS L. SAUNDERS, M. D., Lecturer on Chemistry.

Ladies Department.

Mrs. L. M. CARPENTER, Preceptress.
Miss CAROLINE E. WILCOX, Teacher

This Institution is located in the pleasant and healthful village of De Ruyter. Its buildings are both spacious and commodious. Study rooms of which there are a large number, are furnished with chairs, tables, bedsteads, and stoves ; and rented to gentlemen at one shilling per week ; or one shilling for each student, the rooms being large enough to accommodate two. Good board is afforded at one dollar and twenty five cents per week, including washing or lodging. One shilling extra, is charged to those who require both.

The institution is furnished with a good Philosophical and chemical apparatus. It is also furnished with a valuable Library. A scientific society connected with the Institute, is furnished with a choice collection of Minerals and Curiosities.

About twenty-one thousand dollars has already been expended on the De Ruyter Institute for the purpose of facilitating the student in his pursuit of scientific knowledge.

It is the object of those to whom the management of the Institute is entrusted, to make the expenses of acquiring a knowledge of the sciences, as light as possible.

And the public may be assured that a strict attention will be paid to the moral cultivation of the student; and the trustees and teachers will spare no reasonable pains to render the time spent at the De Ruyter Institute, as agreeable and profitable to the student as circumstances will admit.

Young gentlemen and ladies wishing to engage in the pursuit of science, are respectfully invited to spend a term or two, at the De Ruyter Institute and satisfy themselves in regard to its merit.

The year is divided into three terms, of fourteen weeks each. The first term commenced on the twelth day of September ; The second term on the second day of January ; and the third term on the eighth day of May.

REFLECTIONS WHILE STANDING BESIDE MY SISTER'S GRAVE.

* * * It was autumn.—Vegetation was assuming its sombre hue, yet seemed still lingering on the verge of decay. A few faded flowers yet remained which had lost their fragrance to remind unthinking mortals that we were like fragile flowers. Although we may flourish awhile in perennial bloom; yet time, that steals along so silently, will soil the fairest countenance, and age imprint its wrinkles there. While indulging these gloomy reflections, I found myself standing beside my Sister's grave, whither I had intentionally directed my steps; and while lingering there, I mused on days that were past, when she on whose bosom now the clods of the valley rested, dwelt amid the children of men, and on whose cheek the rose of health played, and whose spirit no withering blight had crushed, and over whose head seventeen summers had just passed, and to whom life in anticipation presented nought but happiness.

> " But ah! while yet indulging dreams of bliss,
> The fell destroyer came, and withered all her joys."

Although almost daily the passing bell told her that she was mortal, yet the fearful truth was not brought home to her mind until the withering hand of disease fell upon her, and told her in language that could not be misunderstood, that she must ere long put on the habiliments of the tomb. How could she leave the dear friends she loved, and those bright scenes upon which she had just entered, and all her earthly projects unfinished, and be hurried away to the cold dark grave! How could she launch away into that undiscovered country, from which no traveler returns, and appear in the presence of Him whom she had not made her friend! But when her hope in earthly happiness had forever fled, her sad despairing eye she turned to Him who hears the sinner's prayer, and who will condescend to be " a last refuge."—He heard her prayer. Oh! how He brightened her path-way to the tomb—stripped Death of his terrors, and shed light and consolation around her dying bed; and when that hour came, at the thought of which sometimes the stout-hearted tremble and turn pale, yet she could look away by faith beyond the shadowy vale, where bliss reigns forever without alloy, and where the redeemed ones shall unite in ascribing glory and honor unto the Lamb forever. I remembered the hour when we stood in agonizing suspense around her death-bed, and strove to hear her last admonitions as they were breathed in low faint whispers from her dying lips—a few more struggles, and then her eyes were forever closed on all sublunary things.—Ah! what a change! The features settled into composure, and a smile rested on her countenance, but it was so unearthly, so death-like, that we wept as we gazed upon it. We brought her to this lonely spot, and she was consigned to her lowly resting place.

> " And parted thus are they who played
> Beneath the same green tree;
> Whose voices mingled as they prayed
> Around one parent knee."

Although I had reason to believe that she, whose untimely exit I deplored, was made partaker of that bliss which is beyond my ken, still I could not help but weep when I thought her eye would no more beam on me; and I almost wished that I were laid beside her; but this thought was only the impulse of the moment, for when I considered, I knew that there was no interchange of thoughts, no kindling of affection in the tomb, but one long silence reigns in that dread charnel-house, which will only be broken by the sound of the arch-angel's trump, which will arouse the sleeping millions, " some to everlasting life, and some to shame and contempt." Oh how mysterious is this love of kindred! Time nor distance cannot efface it from our memory. Death cannot conquer it, though he may consign friend after friend to his dark domain; yet we will delight to linger around the spot where their dust reposes, and fain would gather from the tomb some faint memento of departed worth, and cherish it in our bosoms, and faith will enable us to look away to the resurrection morn, when we hope to be united in strictest bonds of friendship with those we have loved. Well, thought I, it will matter not though she for whom I mourned was called early in life to her rest. She is of that number that shall awake unto everlasting life. Sleep on, loved Sister, and I will mingle with the busy throng again, and a friendly recollection, or a stony urn will be the only relic of thy past life; but I trust thy record is on high. The rude storms that beat above thee cannot invade thy peaceful abode. Thou art far away where care, nor sorrow, cannot reach thee; and when my sun of life has forever set, I hope to be brought to this lonely spot, and then " I will rest like thee, and be with thee forgot."

* * * All around seems hushed in peace. The tumultuous passions which agitate the mind are left behind when we come among the habitations of the dead, and we feel that we must tread lightly above their slumbering ashes. The tranquility which reigns here is broken only when some mourning souls come near to deposit the remains of a dear friend beneath the " green-turfed mound." As I gazed around upon the monuments of the departed ones, I was forcibly reminded of the words of the prophet: " The voice said cry. And he said, what shall I cry? All flesh is grass, and all the goodliness thereof is as the flower of the field. The grass withereth, the flower fadeth, but the word of the Lord endureth forever." These last words reminded me also of that home where flowers fade and wither not, but bloom fresh around the throne of the Eternal One. I thought also upon the transitory nature of all terrestrial things. My imagination flitted away to the graves of heroes renowned in history; even to that lonely Isle where were deposited the mortal remains of one of the proudest monarchs that ever swayed the sceptre, and whose rocky and projecting cliffs prevents the mariner from paying the tribute of a tear over his remains to his memory.—Who would wish to receive the adulations of the thoughtless crowd, for a few fleeting years wear the most costly diadem that ever decked the brow of kings, and then, perhaps, be turned away into exile, and live a solitary and lonely life, and when dead be denied the privilege of being buried in their native soil? Who would not rather lead a peaceful life far from the bustling din, and, when they come to die, feel that they had made their peace with God, and have their friends stand near, and smoothe their dying pillows, and at last have their bodies moulder back to dust in some village church-yard, and have some simple epitaph engraven on their tombstone to tell the wanderer of after years the time of their departure, and that they had left conclusive evidence of having gone to eternal rest. RELIGION.

Religion is the friend of God, the restorer of the moral universe, the life of the soul, and the preserver of angels. It is a bright halo, resplendent with the love of God and man. It is a moral ocean, from which arise the exhalations that are condensed into the dew of heaven. It has restored the image of God to the soul, placed a crown of glory on its head, and planted on earth the rose of immortality. It has healed the effluvia of the moral atmosphere, stayed the angel of death, erected the altar of peace, and planted the tree of immortality in the abodes of man, resuscitated the bones in the valley of vision, and raised them to the paradise of God.—It has enshrouded the coffin with a vail, lest the splendor of heaven should become departed through the visage of saints.—It has hallowed the joys of connubial felicity, united by one eternal union the nuptial hand, and sweetened the waters of Marah. It has cemented the bonds of union in society, and proclaimed peace to mankind.

The writer does not wish to be understood only in a limited extent, viz: To the righteous, the doctrine of future punishment is too plain to need illustration or proof. It has tuned the human tongue with the law of kindness, hushed the spirit of jealousy, and expanded the heart with good will, and written humility on the brow of creation. It has given energy to intellect, removed the films from mental vision, and regenerated the spring of moral action. It has clothed evil in the garb of innocence, and encircled her head with the diadem of righteousness. It has established the laws of honor and justice. It has revered sanctity and confered honor upon truth and love. It has filled the soul with benevolence, and succored the widow and the orphan. It has delivered the poor, and raised humanity to the heavens. It has hurled the tyrant from his throne, made the despot to tremble, kindled the fire of freedom upon the altars of liberty, made void the merchandise of souls, and proclaimed the jubilee of liberty to the captive. It has rejected with disdain a bribe to pervert justice, instilled wisdom into legislators, quenched the fires of ambition, sheathed the assassin's dagger, established the faith of nations, chimed the bells of peace, converted the sword into a ploughshare, arrayed embattled hosts in conflict against the powers of darkness, and reanimated the slain with the breath of immortality. It has established kingdoms, extracted the pang of sorrow, spoken peace to the conscience, anchored hope within the haven of eternal felicity, lighted the lamp of immortality, conquered death, and transformed the grisly monarch into a welcome messenger. It has illuminated the grave, and rescued an innumerable company out of every nation, and kindred, and tongue from the grasp of the devil, and the torments of hell, to be companions of angels, and raised to the glories of heaven.

Oh blessed religion! thou art the personification of all good in earth and heaven. And should man ever discard thee from his heart? Never—no; Never.

GAMMA.

RELIGIOUS.

From the N. Y. Observer.

UNSPOTTED FROM THE WORLD.—An easy matter it would be to have pure and undefiled religion before God and the Father, if it implied no more than to visit the fatherless and widows in their affliction. But these deeds of mercy must be performed by one who keeps himself unspotted from the world, or they are not evidence of genuine piety in the heart. What is it to be unspotted? In the sight of God, the heavens are unclean, and the angels themselves are charged with folly! How vile must sinful man appear in the eye of holiness! The whiteness of an angel's robe would be sullied by the slightest contact with the sinful world in which man lives, and moves, and has his being. How then shall man escape untouched?

Not by flying from the world. History would teach us, if reason would not, that the cave or the cloister is not to be desired for the cultivation of holiness of heart.—The man who buries himself that he may avoid the world, carries his worst enemy with him.

Not by refusing to mingle in the common pursuits of life. It is the duty of man to be " diligent in business," as well as " fervent in spirit, serving the Lord." The cares of the world must have their place, and receive their appropriate share of attention. Slothfulness is sinfulness. But it is the duty of every man, and every Christian may find grace, to mingle with the world in the daily and hourly affairs of life without staining his character by indulgence in those things which bring reproach on religion, and are justly so offensive to God. There are a thousand artifices which are common among men in the pursuit of trade, so common that they have ceased to be regarded as censurable, which God cannot approve, and which no man can practice and be unspotted. It was so in old times, when the buyer said, " It is nought," " it is nought," but went away and " boasted" of his bargain. The Christian who scrupulously refrains from making any compromise with his conscience for the sake of gain; who in buying and selling demonstrates to those with whom he deals that his principles are fixed and governed by unchangeable truth; who never promises what he does not mean to perform, and never turns to the right hand or to the left for the sake of advancing his interests; he stands on high ground, and a time serving world will acknowledge that he is an upright man, who fears God. The man who carries into business the principles of the gospel, and follows the golden law of Christ in his most trivial dealings with his fellow men, who goes from his closet to the counter, or shop, or market, and there feels the power of religion constraining him to do what is right, and restraining him from that which is wrong, may keep himself unspotted from the world. He must be watchful. He must be prayerful. But there are no insurmountable difficulties in his way. Where sin abounds grace may much more abound. The obstacles may be great, and the temptations strong, but the motives to resistance and the strength for the conflict are all sufficient. " My grace is sufficient for thee."

How the character of the church would be exalted in the eyes of God and angels and of wicked men, if its members lived above the world while they are living in it; if they set their affections on things above, not on things on the earth; if they used the world as not abusing it, and showed by their walk and conversation that this was not their home! Spotless purity, absolute perfection we do not expect to see, till we awake in the likeness of God. But that the followers of Christ should aim at a higher standard of piety, more holiness of heart, and less conformity to the maxims and practices of an ungodly world, none will deny. The church demands it of her members. The Savior demands it of those he died to redeem. The great God demands it when he makes his own holiness the ground of the precept, and saith, " Be ye holy, for I am holy."

SELECT SENTENCES.

A master should be sometimes blind; and a servant sometimes deaf.

When we leave this life, nothing of what we possessed here follows us into eternity; but the spirit, temper and views with which we sought, enjoyed, used and parted with it.

As they who for every slight infirmity take physic to repair their health, do rather impair it; so they who for every trifle are eager to vindicate their character, rather weaken it.

Prosperity procures friends; but adversity tries them.

It is better to be preserved in the brine of adversity, than to rot in the honey of prosperity.

Be not too venturesome in exposing thyself to needless dangers; for he that courts perils, shall die the devil's martyr.

The Dutch proverb saith, " Stealing never makes a man rich; alms never make a man poor; and prayer never hinders a man's business."

An ungrateful mind is the devil's lodging house, supported with five pillars, namely, ignorance, pride, discontent, covetousness and envy.

God loves the poorest saint on earth incomparably better than any angel in heaven loves God.

In conversation, aim more at God's honor than at thy own; the one is the character of a devil; the other, of a saint.

Turn a deaf ear to the backbiter: if thou receivest not his words, they fly back and wound the reporter; if thou dost receive them, they fly forward and wound the receiver.

There is a time when we may say nothing; and a time when we may say something: but there never will be a time when we should say all things.

Particularly avoid three sorts of persons, namely, apostates, angry men, and those who are given to change.

Men lose many excellent things, not because they want power to obtain them, but spirit and resolution to undertake them.

He that will not bear Christ's reproach, shall bear his own: which will be infinitely worse.

Sin received its sentence of death in the death of Christ; but it doth not receive its execution till the death of a Christian.

Four things we can never take the full dimensions of; namely, the evil of sin, the deceitfulness of the heart, the love of Christ, and the perfections of God.

When a Christian considers the goodness of God's ways, he wonders that all the world doth not walk in them: but when he considers the blindness, depravity, and prejudices of the heart in its present lapsed state, he wonders that any should enter upon them.

Saints desire so to meet with God, as to part no more; and so to part with sin, as to meet no more.

The Jewish proverb saith, " If the world knew the worth of good men, they would edge them about with pearls."

It was the saying of a great divine, built on long observation, that he had found more good in bad people, and more bad in good people than he ever expected.

It is impossible for Christ to dwell by his Spirit in a heart that is under the habitual dominion of sin.

The covering of sin is like the keeping a serpent warm, which will sting the more fiercely.

THE SAVIOR'S BENEVOLENCE.

From the 'Mount Zion above,' the Savior beheld our race, guilty, lost, ruined. The sad prospect moved his sympathetic soul, and called forth his compassion. On us the Father frowned, and against us, the law in tones of wrath, uttered its dreadful denunciations. The Savior saw that frown; he heard our wretched doom. The tender cord was touched. Father, (he says) calm thy frowning face. Thy demands shall be fully satisfied; thy wrath shall be appeased. I'll take the offender's place, and give myself a ransom. To yonder world I'll go, and redeem man from the 'curse of the law'—from the power of sin—from final death and ruin. From Heaven's high throne thus spake the Savior, and swift the tidings flew through all the blissful regions. The Father smiled, approved; while angels wondered—recorded—adored—and hastened down to earth, to tell to man the thrilling story. The auspicious moment of his advent arrived, and again he speaks, while in profoundest silence all heaven listens. My throne I descend—my robes of effulgent glory lay aside!—my Deity I conceal in human form!—my heavenly home I leave!—I descend to earth and dwell with sinful men; but not finally. I exchange the song of angels, for the sighs and groans of wretched mortals!—I go to seek the ruined—to save the lost!! I go to be familiar with scenes of suffering and woe; myself the greatest sufferer of all. I go—and I shall be despised—persecuted—opposed—rejected!—I go to toil—I go to suffer—I go to bleed—I go to die; that man may live, and live forever!! Farewell, ye scenes of Paradise, so rich, so enchanting—so pleasant to the eye!—Farewell, ye pure—high spirits; who have so long, and so devoutly worshiped me! Farewell, Eternal Father!! All Heaven! I bid farewell, till I my work shall finish, and then return to reign in glory! Thus spake the Son of God, and hastened on his mission. Angels attend him down to earth, and announce to shepherds his advent. They sing glory to God—peace to earth—good will to man—and fly again to Heaven. "Our eyes behold our King and Savior—but can it be! A helpless—tender infant! His bed is straw and his cradle a manger—his head where! No where!—In this wide world he has none—'not where to lay his head!!' O the mystery of redemption! The unborn—benevolence of Christ!! But he rose above the fragile state of infancy, and entered on his work. 'He went about doing good.' He healed the sick—he raised the dead—he soothed the sorrowing heart, and dried the mourner's tear. Nor is this all. 'He took our nature and carried our sorrows.' 'He was acquainted with grief; for our sins pressed heavily upon him. He watered Jerusalem with his tears, Gethsemane with his blood. More; he groaned—he bled—he died on the Cross!! He died a sacrifice for us—for us; his enemies—his foes! He died for each—for every one—for all!!

Christian! Behold the scene, and let your love be strong—ardent—intense. Love with all your soul!—serve with all your powers!

Sinner! Behold the scene, and let thy heart melt in deep contrition. Shed the penitential tear, and in earnest plead for pardon. Seek—love—believe—be saved!

P. S. A.

PENITENCE.

Lord didst thou die but not for me!
Am I forbid to trust thy blood!
Hast thou not pardons rich and free,
And grace an overwhelming flood!

My sins and errors, I confess,
Can men, or devils, make them more!
Of crimes already numberless,
Vain the attempt to swell the score.

Were the black list before my sight,
While I remember thou hast died;
'Twould only urge my speedier flight,
To seek salvation at thy side.

Low at thy feet I'll cast me down,
To thee reveal my guilt and fear;
And if thou spurn'st me from thy throne,
I'll be the first who perish'd there.

ASIATIC PROVERBS.

When you are in prosperity, you need seek no other revenge over him that envies you, than the mortification he has from it.

As soon as a person takes pleasure in hearing slander, he is to be ranked among slanderers.

That which a man suffers for this world, fills his heart with darkness, but that which he sufferers for the other fills his heart with light.

The greatest repose which a man can enjoy, is that which he feels in desiring nothing.

He that pushes a jest further than good breeding requires, shall never fail to be hated or despised.

He who is worthy of being called a man, is unshaken in adversity, humble in prosperity, active and bold in danger; and, if he be not learned, has at least a love for learning.

He is a free man who desires nothing; and he is a slave who expects that which he wishes.

Live not on credit, and you shall live in liberty.

A wise man observes these three things—he abandons the world before it abandons him,—he builds his sepulchre before the time of entering it,—and he does all with a design to please God, before entering into His presence.

He who takes not counsel beforehand, will be likely to fail in the accomplishment of his projects.

He who relates the faults of others to you, designs to relate yours to others.

Watch your friends; except those of whom you are certain; but know that none can be a true friend but he who has the fear of God.

The most perfect pleasures in this world are always mingled with some bitterness.

The world is the hell of the good, and the heaven of the wicked; i. e. it is all the evil that the former shall meet with, and all the good the latter shall enjoy.

By doing good to those who have evil intentions against you, you thereby shut their mouths.

He who knows well what he is capable of, has seldom bad success.

The excellency of many discourses consists in their brevity.

THE TRINITY AT THE CREATION.—What should hinder us from accepting the resolution, given by the best expositors, ancient and modern, and drawn from this consideration, that, in the unity of the Divine Essence, there is a plurality of Persons, coeternal, who might say with truth and propriety, " Let us make man;" and, " Man is become like one of us!" Of such a personality revelation informs us; it is that upon which the economy of man's redemption is founded; his creation, as well as that of the world, is in different passages attributed to the Father, to the Son, and to the Holy Spirit; what more natural, therefore, than that, at his production, this form of speech should be used by the Divine Persons? What more rational than to suppose, that a doctrine so important to the human race, was communicated from the beginning, that men might know whom they worshiped, and how they ought to worship? What other good and sufficient reason can be given, why the name of God, in use among believers from the first, should likewise be in the plural number, connected with verbs and pronouns in the singular? It is true, we Christians, with the New Testament in our hands, may not want these arguments to prove the doctrine: but why should we overlook, or slight, such very valuable evidence of its having been revealed and received in the Church of God from the foundation of the world? It is a satisfaction, it is comfort, to reflect that, in this momentous article of our faith, we have patriarchs and prophets for our fathers: that they lived and died in the belief of it; that the God of Adam, of Noah, and of Abraham, is likewise our God: and that, when we adore him in three persons, and give glory to the Father, to the Son, and to the Holy Ghost, we do as it was done in the beginning, is now, and ever shall be.—Bishop Horne.

A DEVOUT SPIRIT ESSENTIAL TO MINISTERIAL SUCCESS.—No human power or efforts can do good to the souls of men, except the Spirit of God work by them, nor can any authority or might prevent that good which this divine agent is pleased to do, often by feeble and unworthy instruments. To spread the gospel and to render men wise, holy and happy, we do not so much need the assistance of great abilities, eminent learning or even the powers of philosophy, eloquence and oratory, as we do men, filled with the Holy Spirit, full of faith, heavnly wisdom, holiness, zeal for the glory of God, and love to the souls of men, going forth in simple dependence on the Grace and Providence of God, using no carnal weapons, but the spiriual armor provided for them, and by fervent prayer seeking a blessing from Him alone. Before such preachers, or rather, before Him who has said; " Lo I am with you," &c., mountains would become plains. When the Almighty puts forth his strength, the meanest instrument can do all things. The almond rod of Moses divides the mighty waters of the deep Red Sea. The mantle of Elijah stays the course of Jordan's river, and the shadow of Peter heals the sick. What then shall not the Gospel do, divinely constituted as it is, for the restoration of man? Oh! let the spirit of devotion burn in our pulpits; let the ministers of Jesus Christ give themselves continually unto prayer, and the early triumphing of the Gospel shall be renewed. We shall act in the faith and in the power of the Apostle.—Watchman.

GOD so LOVED THE WORLD.—There is more of God's bounty expressed in that one verse, " God so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son," than there is in the whole volume of the world. It is an incomprehensible so; a so, that all the angels in heaven cannot analyze; and few comment upon or understand the dimensions of this so. In creation mere nothing was vanquished to bring us into being: in redemption sullen enmity was conquered to produce our restoration. In creation he subdued a nullity to make us creatures: in redemption his goodness overcomes his omnipotent justice to restore us to felicity. A word inspired the dust of men's bodies with a living soul: but the blood of his Son must be shed to lay the foundation of his renewed happiness. In the first, Heaven did but speak, and the earth was formed; in the second, Heaven itself must sink to the earth, to raise man to his original state. It was a more expansive goodness than was laid out in creation. " The redemption of the soul is precious," much more costly than the whole fabric of the world; for to effect this, God parts with his dearest treasure, even his well beloved Son.—Charnock.

BEAUTIFUL EXHORTATION.—Every sin you conquer shall give new strength; every temptation you resist will make you free in the Lord; every tear you shed will be noticed by your great High Priest; every sigh you raise will reach his ear. Up, then my dear young friends! and gird on the armor of God. Enlist under the banner of Jesus Christ; and let your powers, your energies, your faculties, your heart, all be his. Bright and glorious is the day before you; white and full are the fields that wait for you; girded and strong are the companions who will go with you; beautiful upon the mountains shall be your feet, wherever they bring the tidings of mercy. The state of the world is such, and so much depends on action, that every thing seems to say loudly to every man, 'Do something—do it—do it!' Keep your heart with all diligence; break away from every sin; live unto God; and your reward shall be what 'ear hath not heard, eye hath not seen, neither hath it entered into the heart of man to conceive.'—Todd.

PRAYER.—Prayer is the peace of our spirit, the stillness of our thoughts, the evenness of recollection, the seat of meditation, the rest of our cares, and the calm of our tempest; prayer is the issue of a quiet of mind, of untroubled thoughts; it is the daughter of charity, and the sister of meekness.

THE NATURE OF MISSIONARY WORK.

A letter from Mr. Goddard, missionary to the Chinese, now stationed at Singapore, to the Missionary Association at Newton Theological Institution, of which he was a member, has been put into our hands, from which we make a few extracts. Mr. G. is eminently a practical man and the reflections which follow are deserving careful attention at the present time. Speaking of his views of the work while in this country, he says:

"I then felt that whoever would be the means of saving souls in Boston, must lay aside all romance, and settle down to diligent, patient, and persevering labor. Whether any one abroad knows what he is doing, or not, must be to him a matter of small concern. He must bring his influence in contact with the minds of the wicked men, both individually and collectively, and in fervent, humble prayer seek the assitance of the Holy Spirit, without which all his labor is vain. Such is the nature of labor in the vineyard of the Lord in America, and essentially such do I find it on heathen ground. Such I found it in Burmah during my short visit there—such in Pinang—such here—and such I believe every where. The people for whom the missionary labors will deceive him, cheat him, steal from him, and take any advantage they can of him. They are generally dirty in their persons and dress, and when he speaks of Jesus they pay little or no attention. In short, almost every thing external is repugnant. In these circumstances the missionary must remember that beneath that uncouth, degraded exterior, is hidden a gem, if polished by the Spirit's influences, may become a diamond for the Redeemer's crown. Influenced almost solely by this motive, he must count no labor too great to be endured for such an object. I have been led to this train of remark, chiefly by the conviction which has been strengthened by the little experience which I have had, that the missionary spirit at home is somewhat deficient in this respect. It depends too much on circumstances, novelty, and romance. Christians will often be stirred up by the recital of some peculiar circumstances relative to missions, while the great fact which alone gives importance to missions, and without which the whole enterprise would be but a monument of human folly, viz., that the heathen are all perishing because they have not the gospel, produces little or no effect on their minds.

"Now, after all this is said, missionary work does not differ essentially in kind from that of a faithful minister at home. It may differ in degree, it may involve greater responsibilities and trials, but it is the same work and is to be accomplished in essntially the same way. I could wish, therefore, that instead of dwelling so much on supposed peculiarities of missionary life, there might be nourished up a spirit founded on the broad principle of love to God, whose love is trampled on, and to souls which are universally in all heathen lands.

"Where missionaries have come out influenced too much by the excitement of external circumstances, it has more than once happened that they have been entirely disappointed. Not finding in the actual circumstances of missionary life anything to sustain the feeling with which they entered it, they have either retired from the field, or remained to a great extent useless. Had they come influenced by love to Christ and to perishing souls, they would have found in the moral desolation of heathenism enough to keep alive that holy spirit.

"When the church comes to set about the work of missions as a work to be done, and to be done by her instead of doing as is now often done, viz., to labor a little occasionally in compliance with some excited feeling, and not with a fixed desire and determination to carry forward the work to its consummation, we may hope to see blessed results.

"It is a work to be done; it is a story to be heard; it is not a pitiful tale designed to excite men's feelings, and perhaps lead them under the influence of that excitement to throw a little money into a separate box, without thinking how little, or caring what becomes of it afterward; but it is a work to be done by the church; and every man when he joins the church pledges himself to do his part of it."—Christian Watchman.

PRAY FOR ME.

A friend lately related to me the following incident. "I have," said he, "for the last two years been a member of the church of God. The first year I lived in the daily exercise and enjoyment of Christian duties. At the close of the year, I left the village and the communion of the church, and took up my residence in one of our large cities. I took with me the usual letter of recommendation, but, for some reason or other, made no use of it. At the same time, amid the bustle and confusion attendant on my entrance into the city, I neglected by degrees my private devotions, and finally ceased them altogerher. Gradually yet rapidly I declined, and before long I could sin with perfect recklessness. After I had been six months in the city I married. My wife was young and gay, but had an air about her that prevented me from being boldly wicked in her presence. Yet, I continued my former practices when out of her sight, and was rapidly growing worse and worse. She knew that I was a church member, and supposed that my conduct was in accordance with my profession.

"One evening, after I had been married about six months, on my return home, I found my wife in tears. She had evidently been weeping long and bitterly, and there was some heavy grief preying upon her heart. I endeavored to rally her, but she begged me not to mind it. We retired to rest, but she did not sleep. In the middle of the night she awoke me, and throwing her arms around my neck, while her tears fell upon my cheek, said in a tone of the most earnest entreaty and with the deepest feeling, "pray for me!"

"Had the lightning struck her dead, I could scarcely have been more shocked than at that demand. I trembled like a leaf and for a moment a faintness overcame me. In that moment the transactions of the past year rushed over my mind and I was bowed down beneath the weight. The next instant we were both on our knees, and if ever I prayed it was then: My wife is now a devoted Christian, and I trust that I am also one of those 'whose God is the Lord.'"

My friend was a backslider. He had gone far, very far astray. He was undoubtedly much worse than ordinary sinners, for he had sinned against the light. He had become reckless; perfectly hardened to the whisperings of conscience, and impenetrable to the light of the truth. Yet the simple utterance of those three words, "Pray for me," came home to his heart like a dagger. "Pray for you?" he must have thought—"pray for you! Why I do not pray for myself—I have not prayed for a year." And then his whole course was pictured before him, and he saw himself as he was. The Spirit came to his aid and he was restored to the Savior he had so ungratefully left.

WHERE WILL MEN FIND ROOM AT THE JUDGMENT?

We have frequently heard it said, that the human race who have lived and may live hereafter could not find room to stand in the day of judgment, on the face of the earth. If there is any use in putting at rest such an idea, it is most effectually done in the following simple calculation from the Boston Journal.—N. Y. Observer.

A paragraph has several times gone the rounds of the papers, within a year past, in which it was shown, or attempted to be shown, that if all the human beings that have lived since the creation of the earth, and been buried beneath its surface, should be raised and stand upon it, the globe allowing a yard square to each person, would more than be covered.

From the following calculation it will appear that a comparatively small portion of the earth's surface would be sufficient to contain the vast multitude of human beings, allowing a yard square to each person, that has existed on the globe.

Suppose, then, for the sake of round numbers, that the earth has stood 6,000 years, and that the population has always been 800,000,000, as now estimated. Sixty centuries multiplied by three generations in a century, would make 180 generations of 800,000,000, and these multiplied together, would make 144,000,000,000, as the supposed whole population of the globe since the creation. Then suppose one yard square for each individual of this vast number, how many miles sqaure would be sufficient for the whole? Multiply 320 by 320, the number of rods in a mile, and the product will be 102,400, as the square rods by 5 1-2, and this product again by 5 1-2, the number of yards in a rod, and the product will be 3,097,600, as the number of square yards in a square mile. Then divide the 144,000,000,000 by 3,097,600, and the quotient will be 46,487 and a fraction over, as the number of square miles necessary to contain, in an erect or lying posture, the present and past population of the globe.

Then extract the square root of 46,487, and the root will be 215 and a fraction, showing 215, or less than 216 miles square of country—say as large as the state of New York—would furnish a standing place of a yard square, for one hundred and forty-four billions of the earth's supposed population from the creation to the end of six thousand years. T.

Humility.—It is recorded of one of the ablest and best men of the age in which he lived, that when he heard of a criminal condemned to die, he used to think, and often to say, "Who can tell whether this man is not better than I? Or, if I am better, it is not to be ascribed to myself, but to the goodness of God." It is the advice of an apostle, that, "in lowliness of mind each should esteem others better than themselves;" and if we seriously reflect upon the many sinful passions and desires which lurk in our bosoms, the many evil thoughts which sometimes arise in our minds, our many omissions of duty, our many unguarded expressions—there probably is not any of us but will find reason humbly to acknowledge, that he knows more harm of himself, than he knows of any one else.

Where shall I go last of all?—A Hindoo, of a thoughtful, reflecting turn of mind, but devoted to idolatry, lay on his death-bed. As he saw himself about to plunge into that boundless unknown, he cried out, What will become of me?' 'O,' said a Brahmin, who stood by, 'you will inhabit another body., 'And where,' said he, shall I go then?' 'Into another.'—'And where then?' 'Into another, and so on, through thousands of millions.'—Darting across this whole period as though it were but an instant, he cried, 'where shall I go then?' Paganism could not answer, and he died agonizing under the inquiry, 'where shall I go last of all?'—Southern Christian Sentinal.

Is Jesus Dead?—A Christian mother, who had met with many bereavements and sore afflictions, was in the habit of consoling herself in such seasons by saying, 'Jesus lives.' Her little daughter, one day, seeing her cast down and desponding, said, 'What is the matter, mother; is Jesus dead?'

How many professing Christians, by indulging inordinate grief, on account of worldly losses, convey to the world the idea that they have lost their all.

Charity, with some persons, is the next best thing to self-gratification.—Hannah More.

UNITY OF THE CHURCH.

The church of God is one. It has one common Parentage, one Redeemer, Governor, and Head; an identity of interest and object. It is a monument of redeeming mercy and preserving grace; the temple in which God's presence abides; the theatre of his most benevolent operations; the witness of his truth, and a treasure for which he feels the greatest solicitude.—Though composed of persons of all ages, of both sexes; of different nations, and who exhibit an infinite variety in their tastes, attainments, and condition; from the highest state of refinement to the most unlettered in the humblest walks of life.—Yet in this church are all worldly distinctions lost, and the new nature of those who are truly initiated into it, leads them to desire and labor for its peace and enlargement. Its relation to God is such as to render the duty of guarding the interests of piety, and reflecting the light of salvation for the recovery of a lost world, not only imperious but pleasant. The revealed will of Jehovah is the law of the church. By this rule every obligation, and every privilege, is defined. From hence we learn his gracious purpose that believers should be one. "Holy Father! keep through thine own name those whom thou hast given me, that they may be one as we are. That they all may be one; as thou, Father, art in me, and I in thee, that they also may be one in us; that the world may believe that thou hast sent me."

The complete union of a community so numerous as the disciples of Christ have become, and which is contemplated in the words of Christ above mentioned, could not be unnecessary, since it is a part of the Divine economy to make the union of Christians instrumental in the salvation of sinners; neither could this union have been secured by any other means than the incarnation and death of the Son of God. Through his death the enmity is slain; and "of twain" one new man is made; strangers are united in him as their common Head, and made heirs and expectants of the same glory. Neither the claims of law nor voluntary association could have produced a result so glorious.

By a most mysterious condescension the divine nature stoops to an union with sinful man, unfolding the attributes and perfections of the Deity, while man, by an easy and happy gradation, rises from a labyrinth of ignorance and wretchedness to an acquaintance and communion with God. The Father is revealed to the world thro' the Son. The Son is revealed in the hearts of believers. The Son of God is humbled even to death—man is raised from death and degradation, to life, and honor, and happiness unspeakable.

In the same ratio as Christians are united to the Father and the Son, are they united among themselves. Theirs is a union of views. Whatever diversity of sentiment may exist among them respecting other subjects, true christians do agree substantially in their views of the lost and ruined condition of man, since the introduction of sin into the world. They agree respecting the nature, office, and atonement of Christ, and that salvation can only be attained through faith in his name. The word of God is dear to all his saints.—They regard it as the charter of their freedom from sin, their directory in this world, and its promises the sum of their happiness in the world to come. This is the umpire in controversy, the test to which every opinion is to be brought; and all agree that whatever is contrary to this inspired volume should be rejected as the enemy of God and man.

The crops.—We believe the crops of all kinds promise a more abundant harvest in this and the neighboring counties, the present season, than has been gathered for many years. Having occasion to pass thro' a portion of the counties of Onondaga, Cayuga, Cortland, &c., a few days since, we were delighted with the evidences of plenty which presented themselves on every side. We observed the crops were not only heavier than usual, but much earlier.—The farmers have already commenced their hay-harvest in earnest, and there is a prospect of securing the crop in good order.—We saw several fields of grain which will be ready for the cradle in a few days.

South-Western Association.—Rev. Stillman Coon informs us that he expects to attend the South-Western Association as a delegate from the Western. He will also, Providence permitting, be with the Woodbridgetown church on the third Sabbath in August.

The Central Association does not send a delegate this year. Our best wishes are for the prosperity of our South-Western churches.

The Ladies' Companion.—The July No. of this excellent literary Magazine is duly received. Among the contents, which are entirely original, are the following:—"Boston," illustrated by a beautiful steel engraving, representing Boston and Bunker Hill, as seen from Chelsea, east of Boston Bay. "The Gamester's Fortune," by Mrs. E. F. Ellet. "Female Irreligion," by C. F. Daniels. "Lines addressed to a Friend on her Marriage," by Emma C. Embury.—"Song of the Western Emigrant," by Mrs. Caroline Orne. "The Bloody Hand," by J. E. Dow. "To the Memory of a Woman of Genius," by Mrs. Hofland. "The Tears," by Robert Hamilton. "Our Library, No. 3," by E. C. Embury. "The Emigrant's Warning," by Miss A. M. F. Buchanan. "Sketches in the West, No. 2," by Professor Ingraham. "Indian Traits—The Story of Niskagah," by Mrs. Seba Smith. "Dry up your Tears"—set to Music. "Fortune's Changes," by Mrs. Caroline Orne. "A Legend of the Passaic," by the Author of "Agnes of Governor's Island." The present No. contains eight extra pages.

CORRESPONDENCE.

For the Register.

It will be remembered by those who have read the article under "Missionary Intelligence" in the 3d No. of the Register, that our Missionary had formed an acquaintance with the Rev. C. F. Frey some time before that article was published.

About the same time, Mr. Frey proposed to Br. M. the formation of a society, conjointly of First and Seventh Day Baptists, for the promotion of christianity among the Jews, or, in other words, to unite as one the two denominations in the cause. Mr. F. and Br. M. called on a number of Baptist ministers and suggested the plan to them, and they appeared to favor it. In connection with the plan, it was proposed for Mr. F. to preach in Plainfield, and a meeting of the board requested that they might deliberate on the subject. This meeting was attended on the 26th of March, when a resolution was passed to present a proposition to the American Baptist Home Missionary Society for uniting our efforts, and appointed Br. M. to draft and present a plan to the board of that society. This he did on the 6th of April and the Board seemed interested on the subject, and appointed three of their number to meet a delegation from our Board on the 13th inst. Our Board having learned from Br. M. the result of his interview, appointed three also of their members to attend the joint meeting to consult further relative to the matter. The joint meeting took place according to appointment, in New York. The meeting was organized by appointing the Rev. Mr. Summers, President, and Eld. Maxson, Clerk: after which, Br. Maxson presented the following plan of the proposed union:

1. That a Missionary Board be formed jointly with the brethren of the A. B. H. Miss. Board, or if thought preferable, with brethren of the First Day Baptist denomination irrespective of their connection with the Board, & members of the S. D. B. Jewish Miss. Board, for the exclusive purpose of promoting the moral condition of the Jews.

2. That a Constitution be so constructed as that neither denomination shall surrender what may be considered by them respectively, as essential to a consistent religious course, and the spiritual welfare of the Jews; and so far as they are concerned, a mutual compromise be made so as to allow them to observe which day they may choose, without being deprived of the benefit afforded to them by the Board.

3. That in the formation of a Board a suitable number, jointly, (say two thirds) of the members be chosen from the First-day and the others from the Seventh-day Baptist denomination.

4. The object had in view in this plan, is to afford evangelical instruction to the Jews—to provide means for teaching Jewish pupils some mechanic arts by which they may be enabled to procure a living by their industry in christian society, and to educate and prepare for Missionary labors among the Jews, Jewish converts.

Br. M. also mentioned the subject of the difference of views in relation to the Sabbath, and that it might be thought to be a difficulty in the way of our laboring together in the work. On hearing the opinions of the committee it was found that nearly all thought it to be something of a difficulty, some in a greater, and some in a less degree, but finally a resolution was passed that we would present the subject to our respective societies, at their annual sessions. But from what has passed it is doubtful whether the proposition will be carried into effect.

Since the last report Br. M. has labored one month and twenty days in the mission, in visiting and distributing tracts. He has had some interesting conversations with Jews in the city, and in some instances a warm attachment was expressed. Some contend against our translations, some against the inspiration of the original, others believe the whole and seem to be expecting the Messiah, and are closely watching the passing events relative to Palestine, with a hope of the door being soon opened for their return to that land. Several young Jews have attended on the Sabbath meetings and seem much pleased with them.

By order of the Board.

GIVE TO THE POOR.

No one will deny that it is the duty of a Christian to give to the poor. Our worldly possessions are held in trust from the Great Giver of all, who has commanded us to comfort the afflicted, to clothe the naked, and feed the hungry. Yet how few christian societes recognize this principle!—It was never the intention of God, that one man should roll in luxury, and his brother famish for the common necessities of life. The law has made provision for the support of the poor in general, and Christians could not be expected to burthen themselves with every mendicant thrown in their way; but Christian societies should support their own poor.

Christians may be regarded as a great family, united under one head for the same object; this great family is divided into smaller brotherhoods, all uniting in general principles, but differing in things of minor importance. In these small bands the ties of brotherhood are closely knit.—Their forms of worship are the same,—they often meet beneath the same roof, and their prayers ascend in unison from the same altar to the God of heaven and earth. If, then, God in his wisdom should see fit to lay his hands upon one of these; if his worldly possessions are taken from him, and he has no longer the power of supporting himself; must the world be called on to support him? Will his brethren turn a deaf ear to his wants? Because he is unfortunate must he suffer neglect? Such is too often the case.

Men associate with their fellows and profess to be bound to them by the ties of love; but when they are called on to make an actual display of their good feeling, selfishness conquers, and they turn coldly away from a suffering brother. If, in a family of children there should be one who, in the vicissitudes of life, should experience some misfortune that should render the assistance of others necessary; and if, his brothers, being amply able to relieve him themselves, should send him to the poor-house, or with a subscription among strangers, for support; what should we think of them? We should call them cold-hearted, penurious men, who love money more than the commands of God. And in what does the case I have stated differ from religious societies? Are not the bonds that unite them nearly as strong as the ties of consanguinity? Yet it is not uncommon to see professors of religion among strangers with a subscription for the relief of their poor brethren, when their own society is amply able to support them. God has said thou shalt not kill; equally positively has he said thou shalt give to the poor. The first of these Christians recognize, but the last is too often forgotten.

If we judged from some, we should believe that penuriousness constituted a part of religion, and that a sanctimonious appearance gave them liberty to defraud the friendless stranger, and grind the face of the suffering poor. It is a solemn truth that the cause of Christianity suffers greatly from the illiberality and contracted views of many of its supporters. Men are taught to believe that charity and benevolence are the prevailing characteristics of religion; but, when they see the contrary character in, perhaps, a majority of religious professors, how can they be induced to join them? Many may start at the boldness of my remarks; but, if they will look closely at things as they are, they will find much truth in them. Christians should hold in mind the fact, that the eyes of the world are upon them ever, and walk more circumspectly, that by example, they may enforce the precepts they profess; and not, by yielding to the basest of passions, bring dishonor upon the noblest cause that can engage the attention of man. Messrs. Editors.—The following extract of a letter from a friend, contains so much that will meet a response in the heart of many a wanderer, and so strongly urges the necessity of keeping a strict and prayerful watch in the hour of temptation, that I am induced to offer it to you for publication, should you think it worthy of a place in the columns of the Register.

F. W. S.

'But why do you reprove me thus? the troubled spirit needs milder treatment.—True, indeed, were all the words you spoke; and they were as a mirror, in which I saw more plainly my own dreadful condition. The thought that I once was happy; the remembrance of those days which we together spent in the fear, in the love of God, are no longer the heralds of consolation, but messengers of the keenest anguish. No clouds then obscured the field of our enjoyment. On the wings of the morning, our petitions together ascended to Heaven's throne, and the shades of evening wafted up the notes of praise, the incense of grateful hearts; the Sabbath was a day of gladness, and the house of God a temple of rejoicing; in our rambles through forest and field, the theme which inspired our meditations was the one which fills Heaven with acclamations of praise to Nature's God; and when the day arrived in which I was to bid adieu to the May-day of life, and enter upon its more active duties, my soul's most ardent desire and my prayer to God was, that I might ever be an instrument of good to his creatures, and a means of advancing the glory of his kingdom on the earth. But how far short of this have I fallen! The exercises of secret devotion, so essential to vital piety, soon began to yield to the influence of that excitement incidental to the various and conflicting circumstances of my profession, and gradually the Spirit's influences were lost, until the monitions of the "still small voice" were no longer heard in the confusion which awaits the soul at war with its Creator.

'Years have rolled on; and time has effaced the bright visions which 'lent enchantment' to every prospect in the future. A victim of the world's unkindness, and without the consolations of religion, I feel as one made the sport of every wind and every wave. Life has lost its sweetness; and I would look forward for repose in the undisturbed quiet of the grave; but Oh, can I endure the presence of an offended God! Can there—say, can there be mercy for so vile a sinner?'

Brother Stillman Coon writes us a few interesting lines under date of Independence, July 7, 1840.

The revival which brother Irish mentioned in Coudersport, was, at the last accounts, still progressing. The cause of Temperance, at that place, seems to be in a flourishing condition, the total abstinence plan having been adopted a few weeks previous to the protracted meeting; and when I again visited the place, four weeks after the close of said meeting, one of the tavern keepers told me that the sale of liquors in his establishment had decreased ninety per cent.

Messrs. Editors.—Feeling a strong partiality for the following lines, and not having seen them in any publication of the day, I send them for publication in your paper; hoping they may prove as great a blessing to some afflicted believer as they hitherto have to me. M.

"There remaineth a rest for the people of God"

Sweet were the cheering words that broke
From our Redeemer when he spoke
Of mansions for the blest;
His saints again his face shall see,
And where he is, they too shall be,
In realms of endless rest.

Yes, there 's a rest for saints on high,
A rest prepar'd for those who die,
Reclining on his breast.—
The weary pilgrim homeward turns,
While in his bosom anxious burns
The hope of future rest.

How light the ills of time appear!
How short the state of suff'ring here!
If but in Jesus blest,
The way-worn trav'ler undismay'd,
Espies beyond death's gloomy shade
A heaven of endless rest.

O 'tis but just a step between
This mortal state and that unseen
Abode of myriads blest!
And oft my soul is in a strait
More anxious to depart than wait
To find the promis'd rest.

Hail, precious moments, as ye fly!
In swift successions, hasten nigh
Release to the opprest;
Come, welcome death, and friendly grave,
Gladly I'd pass the chilling wave,
And enter endless rest.

Accident.—A part of the staging of the new Baptist Church, in Bowdoin square, gave away about noon to-day, and Mr. Phillip Luther and Mr. Ezekiel Studley fell to the ground from a height of forty feet.—They were both severely injured, and we regret to learn that Mr. Luther's Leg was broken at the thigh.—*Bos. INTELLIGENCE.

SUMMARY.

Commodore Elliott.—The Court Martial which recently tried Commodore Elliott in Philadelphia, on sundry charges, have suspended him from the exercise of the duties of his office for four years, and withheld his pay for two years.

Highway Robbery.—An Italian named Palmer, who travels the country with a musical instrument, was decoyed into the woods between Lewiston and Youngstown on the 18th ult. by two men, and robbed of $90 dollars in sovereigns. He was then released on condition that he should immediately cross into Canada. The next night, a man who called his name Pickersgill, was arrested for horse stealing and recognized by Palmer as one of the robbers.

Joseph Bohall who murdered Richard Brown and his wife a few weeks since, in Leon, Cattaraugus co., has confessed his guilt. His object was to obtain $150 which Brown had in his possession.

Accident.—The Rev. Mr. Appleton and wife, of Manlius, were thrown from a carriage on the 1st inst. near Jamestown. Both were much injured, the former dangerously—he is now convalescent. The carriage was dashed to pieces.

A Family Consumed.—Six children of Patrick Toby in South Sherbroke, U. C., were consumed by the burning of a house, in which it is supposed, they were asleep when the house took fire.

Hydrophobia.—Two men have lately died of this dreadful disease in the north part of Philadelphia co. Pa.

Gold.—The product of the southern mines for 1839 was about $400,000, and the whole amount since the discovery is about $10,000,000,

The Vice President retired from the Chair of the Senate on the 2d inst. for the remainder of the session.

Gen. Santander.—It is reported that this distinguished personage, ex-President of New Grenada, died at Bogota on the 6th of May last.

Winnebago Indians.—The St. Louis Arg. says—The steamer Chippewa arrived last evening from Wisconsin river, bringing General Atkinson and his staff. The General had succeeded before he left in completing the peaceable transportation of the Winnebagoes to the west side of the Mississippi.

The Washington Globe says that informaton has likewise been received by the War Department, from Governor Dodge that the important operation of removing the Winnebagoes west of the river Mississippi has been completed, and the sub-agent, the Rev. Mr. Lowry, writes that they are encamped in the country which is to become their home, and settling down peaceably there.

Beware.—Chemical $5 notes altered to fifties are in circulation. The alteration is made with wonderful ingenuity.

Expenses of Girard College.—A communication in the Philadelphia Inquirer in relation to the Girard College, states that the entire expenses from the commencement of the work up to the 1st of January last, have been one million, one hundred and ten thousand, six hundred and thirty four cents; over six hundred thousand dollars of which have been expended for marble, stone, bricks and lumber, and other building materials, alone. Eighty thousand dollars have been paid in wages to laborers, and upwards of three hundred and ninety thousand dollars to the various masons, carpenters, blacksmiths, carters, plasterers, and others, employed in the construction of the building.

A pigeon was shot near Plattsburgh, a few days since, having fastened around his neck a piece of paper, on which was written, "Rocky Mountains, May 6, 1840."

A boy about five years old, named Bernard Murtagh, whose parents reside in Thames-street, was lately poisoned with arsenic, which his mother found in the house, and supposing it was magnesia, gave it to the child, who died in a few hours.

The King of Hanover.—By a report made to the Legislature of New York by Willis Hall, the Attorney General, relative to the title of the trustees of the Poultney Estate, to lands in Steuben and Alleghany counties, it appears that Ernest Augustus, Duke of Cumberland and now King of Hanover, is one of the present acting trustees of that estate.

The death of Br. W. H. Pearce, one of the Baptist Missionaries at Calcutta, is announced in the last intelligence from India. He was a minister greatly beloved and much devoted to the cause of his Master.—N. Y. Baptist Register.

The temperance procession on Saturday attracted much notice from its length and the beauty of its banners. Including the children, there were nearly 3000 persons. The address of Rev. Mr. Pierpont, at the museum, fully sustained the reputation of that gentleman.—Philad. Amer.

Upper Canada.—It may be remembered that some time in January last, one Livingston Palmer was arrested in Upper Canada, charged with distributing 'patriot' commissions, and endeavoring to enlist recruits for a new rebellion. He has recently been tried for high treason, found guilty and sentenced to death. He is said to be an American, from Vermont.

One Hiram Munn has also been tried for the same offence, and in like manner found guilty and sentenced.

Harvest in the Susquehannah Valley.—The York Republican has the following gratifying report of the crops in that county. From what we have heard we believe the same report will apply with equal correctness to the crops of the Susquehannah valley generally:

Harvest.—The farmers in this county are now busily engaged in cutting their grain, harvest having commenced at an unusually early period. The hay, which is now nearly, if not quite, all gathered, is very abundant, much more so than it has been for many seasons past. Rye, however, we are induced to believe from what we have heard is deficient in quantity and very inferior in quality. It was injured by the rust—the grains are shrivelled, and the ears not well filled, and this we notice, is the case throughout all this region. Wheat, however, with the slight exceptions of some partial injury by the fly or rust, will yield a plentiful crop of prime quality, quite equal in all likelihood to that of last year. Oats are good, but the corn is backward as yet—it may, however, improve as the season advances.

From Jamaica.—By the Mary Ellen, which arrived last evening, we have received Jamaica papers of the 9th of June, three days later than the intelligence brought us by the way of New Orleans. The papers as usual complain of a deficiency of crops; with what truth, it is hard to say. At Falmouth, the trial of Ward, arraigned for harboring the negroes who resisted the civil authorities on the 26th of May last, was continued, but had not yet been brought to an end. Great excitement has attended the whole course of the proceedings, and it is supposed if Ward is condemned that it will be the occasion of still more violent outbreaks among the black population. Ward is described as a Baptist clergyman of intrepid character, who has fastened the attachment of a large number of the apprentices.

United States and Texas.—The New Orleans Bee of the 19th inst., claims to have information from an authentic source, that the commissioners and astronomers for marking the boundary between the United States and Texas, commenced their labors at the mouth of the Sabine River, "in the sea," on the 21st of May last, and have marked the line as far as the 32d degree of north latitude, following the west bank of Sabine pass, lake, and river, as it seems they have been locally designated, as far as the 32d degree, which point the astronomers will ascertain as soon as practicable, from careful observation. When this important point shall be determined to the satisfaction of both parties, the trace of the true meridian towards Red River will be commenced; but from the advanced state of the season and other causes, it is thought that not much progress can be made the present season, on the line between the Sabine and Red rivers. Up to the date above mentioned, about four hundred miles of the boundary line had been definitely traced and settled, George W. Smyth, Esq., late surveyor, had been appointed commissioner on the part of Texas, in the place of Memucan Hunt, Esq., the former commissioner for adjusting the boundary.

The Dog.—In the neighborhood of Sparta a few days ago, a little boy named Burrel, aged about 4 years, strayed from his home and became lost in the woods, about a mile and a half from his parent's house. The parents became alarmed at the absence of the child and commenced a search, when the family dog was discovered by a black man issuing from the woods. The dog ran to the black man, rubbed himself against him, and used many artifices to attract his attention, in which he so far succeeded as to induce the black man to follow him a mile into the woods where he found the boy and restored him to his parents.—Sussex, N. J. Register.

Give your Son a Trade.—Solon enacted that children, who did not maintain their parents in old age, when in want, should be branded with infamy, and lose the privilege of citizens; he, however, excepted from this rule, those children whom their parents had taught no trade, nor provided with other means of procuring a livelihood.

Remarkable Physiological Phenomenon.—The Newark (N. J.) Daily says: The report of the extraordinary physiological phenomenon which was recently copied from the N. Y. Evening Signal—the inception and growth of an Eye in a citizen of Maryland—is confirmed by the Baltimore Sun.—The individual upon whose person this most remarkable phenomenon has developed itself, is Capt. George Davis, of Somerset county. He was born with but one visual organ, or at least there was nothing like a ball in the socket of the other. He continued in this way until he was ten or twelve years of age, when a small, but perfect eye began to form in the hitherto sightless socket; it increased in size until now he can see with it clearly and distinctly.—A casual observer would notice some apparant defect in his eye, as they do not look alike.

Important Mail Arrangement.—A contract has been made by the Postmaster General for a steamboat and Railroad mail from New-York to Boston, via New London, Norwich, and Worcester, with a car on the Norwich and Worcester Railroad arranged as a traveling Post Office for a clerk of the department, for receiving and assorting mails.—When the arrangement contemplated by the contract shall have been perfected, at least two hundred Post Offices will receive their mails from New-York from 12 to 24 hours earlier than they now receive them.

We learn from Capt. Finsley of the brig Gabrielacho, from Laguna, that Campeachy surrendered to the authorities of the State of Yucatan, on the 6th of June, the garrison being allowed the honors of war, and to be sent to Vera Cruz. The States of Yucatan and Tobasco had entered into a treaty of mutual protection, offensive and defensive, against Mexico. A considerable force had gone from Yucatan to assist the Liberal party in Tobasco, in driving out the troops belonging to Mexico.—Express.

ACCIDENTS ON THE FOURTH.

H. C. Hardinge, by the premature discharge of a fowling piece, had one of his arms so shattered that amputation was necessary.

On Friday night a boy was run over by a pair of frightened horses attached to a barouche, and had two of his ribs broken.

A boat containing four men and a female was upset in the North River, and one of the men, named J. Manvers, was drowned.

A lad in Temple street had three fingers blown off by the discharge of a pistol.

A young man named William Piggott had part of his nose blown off by the exploding of a pistol.

A gentleman named E. Conner had his face severely injured by the explosion of a rocket from the fire-work store 86 Chatham street.

A young man boarding at No. 11 Elm street, was severely burned by the explosion of some fireworks which he had stowed in his pocket.

At Philadelphia, Barney Higgins had an arm broken by a fall from his horse; John Stratton fractured one of his thighs in attempting to jump from a carriage with which the horses had run away, and a watchman named Forbes was badly hurt in attempting to arrest a drunken man.

The accident at Newark on the fourth was not as fatal as was at first represented. There was no loss of life but three individnals were badly hurt, as appears by the following account in the Newark paper.

During the services in the church, Messrs. Edmund Holden, George Clark and John Lemon, were firing a small mortar a few yards from the door. The vessel finally became so heated by the rapid firing that the powder exploded while they were loading it.

The three were immediately over its mouth, at the moment, occupied, it is said, in filling it with sand which constituted their wadding. They were all, of course, very seriously injured. Both eyes of one of them were filled and blinded, and doubts are entertained whether one or both will not be finally lost. Their faces and hands were also much injured. Medical aid was summoned, and we understand that the wounds were not likely to prove fatal.

From the Boston Transcript.

A lad, the son of Mr. Thomas Blasland, apothecary, at South Boston, was found in a dying state on the South Bridge, about 1-2 past 10 Saturday night—he was recognized and carried home, where he died ten or fifteen minutes afterwards. It is supposed he must have been overrun by some vehicle or that he fell from one.

Another lad, by the name of Homans, was thrown out from a cart, in which he was returning from the fireworks—about the same hour—and his head striking the curb-stone his skull was fractured. He survived the accident but a few hours.

From the Boston Mercantile Journal.

Accident at Portsmouth.—The friends of the administration at Rockingham county, N. H., celebrated the fourth of July at Portsmouth, and had a large pavilion erected in the form of an amphitheatre, with seats rising above each other. There not being so many guests as were expected, the doors were opened, and the seats at the sides were crowded with spectators, principally women and children; when at the commencement of the proceedings, a large portion of the seats gave way and came to the ground with a horrible crash, carrying with them nearly a thousand persons—and the consternation, the screams of affright, and the groans of pain incident to such an occurrence, may be more easily conceived than described. It fortunately happened that no person was killed—but several had their limbs broken, and others were considerably bruised. Among those injured was Mrs. Dearborn, the wife of Stephen Dearborn of Exeter, whose leg was badly fractured near the ancle.

Six hundred Slaves killed by Suffocation.—The last accounts from Mozambique state that two slavers, one a ship and the other a brig, were wrecked in Mozambique Harbor, during a hurricane from the south east, but the crews of both, and 200 slaves on board the brig, were saved. The ship had arrived the preceding day, and had not taken in any slaves. It was reported of the brig, which was commanded by a Spaniard, that she originally had on board 900 slaves, but during a hurricane (in the prosecution of her voyage) the hatches were battened down, and on opening them after the hurricane had subsided, it was discovered that three hundred slaves were killed by suffocation and want of food. The gale recommencing, the hatches were battened down a second time, the consequence of which was an additional 300 slaves perished from the same cause; and 100 of the remaining 300 slaves died on the passage to Mozambique Harbor, whither she repaired for the purpose of getting a further supply.

Horrible Death.—One of the most horrible scenes was witnessed in this county on Tuesday that has ever come under our observation. Bartholomew Vosburgh, residing in Danube, Herkimer co., left his residence in the forenoon of Thursday the 9th inst., in order to carry a grist to mill, some three miles distant. Having been subject to intemperate habits, it is supposed he became intoxicated on his way home. He arrived safely, though escaping many dangers, within about half a mile of his residence, when he was seen to fall from the wagon, with his leg remaining fast at some place in the forward part of it. Thus, suspended by his leg, with the upper part of his body upon the ground, his horses at the height of their speed, was he dragged past his residence, when his leg was severed or torn from his body, and he was left lying in the road, horribly mangled.

No trace of a feature was left. His arm and shoulder were broken, together with his ribs on one side, and one leg which was in part lost, and the remainder twice broken. The whole body together presented a most horrible spectacle; and yet surprising as it may seem, he lived some hours after being picked up in the road, and appeared to be rational.—Albany Argus.

The Great Arctic Problem Solved.—The long mooted geographical problem of a North West Passage to the Pacific ocean from the Atlantic, is at length solved: there is such a passage. The honor of this discovery belongs to Messrs. Pease and Simpson, of the Hudsons's Bay Company. In 1837, and again in 1838, they attempted to complete the exploration of the northen shore of this continent, by decending Coppermine River, which empties into the Arctic ocean in longitude about 110 west, and from its mouth proceeding eastward until they should arrive at the westernmost point reached by explorers from the Atlantic. In both years they skirted along a great extent of coast, though much impeded by ice, but failed to accomplish the grand object of their pursuit. Now at length their perseverance has been rewarded. They have ascertained that Boothia is an island, and that it is separated from the main land by a strait from three to ten miles wide, which connects the Gulf of Bothnia (partially explored by Fury and Hecla) with the Arctic ocean, in about 68.33, and long. 98.19. The entire passage from the mouth of Coppermine River to the Atlantic, (extending near 50 degrees of longitude,) lies to the southward of lat. 59.—Jour. of Com.

The late East-India Squadron.—The U. States frigate Columbia, and corvette John Adams, which arrived at Boston on th 15th ultimo, were absent from the U. S. a little more than two years, having left Hampton roads on the 6th of May, 1838. During that time they visited Arabia, India, Ceylon, Sumatra, China, the North and South Pacific Islands, and South America on the east and west. The voyage is said to have been one of great variety and interest. A number of missionary stations of the American Board of Foreign Missions were visited, and the benevolent purposes of the missionaries encouraged by the general commendation and approval which the officers of the squadron manifested towards the missionaries themselves; who, in turn, every where tendered to the officers a welcome and hospitality; and the missionaries on visiting the ships, were always received by the officers with attention and courtesy. Midshipman Morris, attached to the John Adams, was left at the Sandwich islands, in one of these missionary families; and being in a decline soothed by the kind care of this family; he breathed his last among friends, though afar from kindred. He now sleeps in that lovely Isle of the Seas, instead of coursing the deep tides of the ocean. Dr. and Mrs. Judd were the friends with whom young Morris was left; and he died with a resignation* that springs from a hope that his spirit was reconciled to God through a Redeemer.—Jour. of Com.

Decent Thief.—Sometime on Friday evening, while Col. Johnson, Vice President of the United States, was at the Temperance Hall, his watch was stolen out of his fob. Very little was said about the affair except to his immediate friends. He returned from Reading, and yesterday morning his watch, 'in good order and well conditioned,' was sent to him.—Phila. Penn.

POETRY.

THE CRUCIFIXION.

BY ROBERT MONTGOMERY.

Star of the East! thou God and man unmixt!
Thou that didst dwell in thine Elysian bowers
Of sempiternal light, before the world
Rolled fresh and glittering from Almighty hands!
The fire-winged choristers who harp on high,
Alone can sing the sorrows of thy love;
Of love that snatched a universe from hell,
And burst the starry gates of Heaven.

Lo! in yon pillar'd hall, amid the hum
Of fierce-tongued soldiers, see the Savior stand,
All quivering from the scourge, around they romp,
And tear his holy dress with tiger hands,
Then robe him in an azure vest, and crown
His God-like temples with entwined thorns:
And last, as from His pierc'd and flesh-torn brows,
The heavy blood drops ooze, with impious jeer
They place the sceptre reed within his hand,
And kneel, and bow, and smite his awful head,
And spit upon his grief-worn face, and cry,
"Hail, Monarch of the Jews!"

That mock'ry 's o'er;
And now, to crucifixion see him led,
His cross in front by some Cyrenian borne.
O, never yet was such an altar rear'd'
O, never yet was such an offering slain!
His agony is dumb: they scoff, and taunt,
And grind their murd'rous teeth, but not a throe
Of wrath can wrinkle his celestial calm!
Forgiveness is his prayer. The undying souls
Of those long swallowed in the eternal gulf,
And they that are, and they that shall be born
To battle with the flesh,—the throne of God,
And all the bright wing'd choirs, whose harps shall sound
"Salvation" through the star-roof halls of Heaven,
To welcome back the heir of Glory,—those
Are playing round His heart, and deadly pangs
Force no resentful frown.

At Golgotha
Behold the blessed Christ! Upon the Cross,
Upon the Cross His holy limbs are stretch'd,
And every nerve and vein is rack'd and wrench'd
In agonies unspeakable; and see!
Where through his palms the hammer'd nails have pierc'd,
And through his bare and unresisting feet
The red wounds gape and spout! Stupendous scene
Of awful pain—the martyr'd Son of God.
Uprear'd upon the Cross to save the World!
Approach! and gaze! and wonder till ye weep!
Convulsive lines of torture grave his face,
And flutter o'er his breast! the veins unrol
In loose and languid stretch, and from his brow
The lukewarm life-stream trickles down,
And clots beneath his feet! his head is bent
Blood-matted o'er his shoulders; while his eyes,
Dim-grown and hollow with the rack, look meek
Upon his butchers round the cross, who howl,
And o'er his quarter'd garments cast their lots.
And lo! with eye upturn'd in voiceless woe,
His Virgin mother; all a mother's pangs
Of pity for her tortur'd Son upheave
Her bosom, and convulse her bloodless cheek:
Nor can the deadly riot of his pains
Chill the warm current of his filial love;
Adown, with tender gaze of truth, he looks,
And to the bosom partner of his toils
Confides the weeping Mary—to a Son!

And sad, but ignominious sight?—two thieves
In bloody fellowship with Christ are hung;
One turns around with sidelong glance of scorn,
To rail, and mutters from his parched throat
A hideous jeer. The other, meek and faint,
Dejected cries, "O Christ! remember me
When thou art in palace of thy love!"
Divine and glorious answer!—"Ere the day
Shall die, in Paradise with me thou'lt walk."

But see, the sun hath sunk in clouds away,
As if aghast! A pall of darkness veils
The land of Palestine;—a stilly gloom
More dreadful than the deepest night. The hills
Grow dim; the rivers roll as if in wrath!
And men, with quailing and drooping lips,
Come forth and stare, tongue-tied, upon the skies!
And hark! from off the Cross is loudly heard,
In piercing tones of death—"My God! My God!
Oh, why hast thou forsaken me?"—Again!
"My God! My God! Oh why dost thou forsake!"
'Tis o'er! the blood-red eye is film'd and shut
Within its socket;—'gainst his weary breast
The last heart pulse hath beat; and now, behold!
With waxen limbs, and gore-wreath'd locks, and lips
With sweet compasion printed on their curve,
The Christ,—a Sacrifice for lost mankind!

O! never since the infant beam of time
Glanc'd on the new born world, was such an hour!
The Temple's vail was rent in awful proof;
The Sun of Israel set; the Eternal curse
Was blotted out with holy blood—Earth quail'd
As though some Spirit of the skies had come
To heave her huge foundations! Every rock
And mountain shook, while o'er the muttering deep
The dismal waters coil'd—as if they fear'd!
And last, the graves unlock'd themselves, and shades
Walk'd out, and glided through the quaking town,
And floated by the living like faint gleams
Of fairy moonlight o'er a pallid wall!
Hell heard, and shuddered as it heard the wail
And dying words of Christ!—while Satan howl'd
And gnash'd his teeth amid the furnace glow
Of everlasting fires, to know his wrath
Should ne'er be glutted on the world! that Heaven
Was won, and to rebellious man unbarr'd!
Unbarr'd!—Oh! if imagination may
Plume her young wing, and wander, faith-borne, there,—
A peal more joyous than the choral stars,
Upon the birth-day of created worlds,
Re-echoed round her crystal domes; while all
The countless seraphs wreathed their dazzling wings
In awe before the lightning-shrouded shrine
Of the invisible! then woke their harps
To melodies divine, and hail'd the Lamb
Triumphant from his martyrdom below!

Great Lord of Love and Light! that now art thron'd
Amid the unimagin'd halls above,
Oh, speed! Oh, speed! the universal day
Of Peace and Truth: roll on the flood of time,
And waft thy message to the farthest isle
Beneath thy Sun!—Speak Thou! and light will flash
Upon the poison'd Soul, as erst it did
From its primeval fount, on Nature's gloom!
O! then, no more will martyr widows drop
Their flaming limbs upon the funeral pile,
Nor foaming victims with delirious yells
Be crush'd with cars, or ripp'd with steel! But Truth,
In her celestial beauty, shall appeal
And banish dreadful Superstition's deeds;
Till every heart and eye, and voice and hand
Shall worship Thee; and every land and isle
Become thy flock, and every soul be saved!

Two thousand years have swiftly travel'd down
The gulf of time since on the glorious Cross,
Divinest Martyr, Thou wert nail'd!—the World,
With all its pageantry and pride, prevails;
Men smile and struggle,—labor, sin and die,
As if Thy blood had never blotted out
The crimes of earth; as if, at last, Thy might
And majesty shhuld not appear. Still, Thou
Hast said! and Thou wilt visit earth again!
But not the homeless orphan of the world,
To wander on in pain and woe, and weep
And perish on the tree; but on thy car
Of lightning, rolling from the unfathom'd depths
Of Heaven! while Spirits, robed in radiant light,
Brandish their glittering banners o'er thy throne,
And all the clouds, like burning billows, flash,
And bound beneath thy feet! The trump shall peal
That dead-awakening blast more full and deep
Than thunder in its maddest roar!—The sea
Shall yawn, and all her buried hosts arise,
The graves burst open, and the dust unite
Into a living form—and then shall come
The Judgment and the Everlasting Doom!

MISCELLANEOUS.

NEVER TOO OLD TO LEARN.

Socrates, at an extreme old age, learnt to play on musical instruments. This would look ridiculous for some of the rich old men in our city especially if they should take it into their heads to thrum a guitar under a lady's window, which Socrates did not do, but only learnt to play on some instrument of his time, not a guitar, for the purpose of resisting the wear and tear of old age.

Cato, at eigty years of age, thought proper to learn the Greek language. Many of our young men at thirty and forty have forgotten even the alphabet of a language the knowledge of which was necessary to enter college, and which was made a daily exercise through the college. A fine comment upon their love of letters, truly.

Plutarch when between seventy and eighty, commenced the study of Latin. Many of our young lawyers, not thirty years of age, think that nisi prius, scire facias, &c., are English expressions; and if you tell them that a knowledge of Latin would make them appear a little more respectable in their profession, they will reply that they are too old to think of learning Latin.

Boccacio, was thirty five years old, when he commenced his studies in polite literature. Yet he became one of the three masters of the Tuscan dialect, Dante and Petrarch being the other two. There are many among us ten years younger than Boccacio who are dying of ennui and regret that they were not educated to a taste for literature, but now they are too old.

Sir Henry Spelman neglected the sciences in his youth, but commenced the study of them when he was between fifty and sixty years of age. After this time he became the most learned antiquarian and lawyer. Our young men begin to think of laying their seniors on the shelf when they have reached sixty years of age. How different the present estimate upon experience from that which characterized a certain period of the Grecian republic, when a man was not allowed to open his mouth in caucuses or political meetings who was under forty years of age!

Colbert, the famous French minister, at sixty years of age returned to his Latin and law studies. How many of our college learnt men have ever looked into their classics since their graduation?

Dr. Johnson applied himself to the Dutch language but a few years before his death.

THE BELGIAN GIANT.

The Christian Reflector, published at Worcester, Mass., gives the following account of Mr. Bihin, the Belgian giant, from a correspondent at New York:

He is from Belgium—thirty-three years old—seven feet eight inches high, and weighs three hundred and twenty pounds. Although he weighs so much, he is by no means corpulent; he exhibits the appearance of a full, fair man. He is one of the noblest specimens of humanity ever witnessed in America. His countenance exhibits intelligence—his manners are easy and graceful—his step dignified—his address affable, and in conversation he is pleasant and courteous. He appeared always ready to gratify the curiosity of the curious, by answering their thousand and one questions about his height, age and weight, and to allow strangers to examine his mammoth limbs, and measure his hands and feet.

He would put himself in an erect posture when any one wished to stand up before him or under his arms, or to put their hands on the top of his head. The head of a man of medium height standing before him would come below his breast. To see a group of men and women stand round him would remind one of Saul the son of Kish, who, "when he stood among the people, was higher than any of the people from his shoulders and upward."

He measures around his breast fifty inches—his foot is twelve and his boot thirteen inches long. His head exhibits the German form broad and large. A common man's hat on his head looked like that of a boy. His physical strength is evidently in full proportion to his stature and magnitude,

Don't be affrighted if misfortune stalks into your humble habitation. She sometimes takes the liberty of walking into the presence chamber of kings.

House of Napoleon at St. Helena.—Mr. Bennett, a traveler whose journal has just been published in London, gives the following account of the last home of the Emperor Napoleon:

"The house in which the chosen Emperor of the French lived and breathed his last, is now in the possession of a St. Helena farmer, who treats the building with respect, in an inverse proportion to the extent of his agricultural improvements. When I visited this venerated edifice in the early part of the year 1833, it bore the appearance of a respectable cottage. A small plot of garden-ground, enclosed by a wooden fence, and a few steps, conducting to a portico covered by a verandah, occupied the front of the dwelling; while the interior consisted of a billiard-room, and drawing-room, consecutively disposed, and a third and more interior apartment, communicating on either side with a small closet, one of which had served as Napoleon's study, the other as his bed-room. The sacra auri fames had been spared the first apartment, or billiard-room, which furnished with a table and chairs, was employed as a refreshment-room for visitors; the drawing-room in which Napoleon expired, was more dilapidated, and contained a threshing and winnowing machine, profusely chalked and penciled with names of persons. Now, alas! the floors of all the rooms were broken, decayed, and scarce safe to tread; the drawing-room was filled with manure; and the rest of the building devoted to stabling, or something worse; the whole presents a scene of filth and ruin that would scarcely bear investigation.

Spirit and Matter.—Divined aright, there is nothing purely organic; all things are vital and inorganic. The microscope is developing this sublime fact. Sense looking at the historic surface beholds what it deems matter, yet is but spirit in fusion, fluent, pervaded by her own imminent vitality and trembling to organize itself. Neither matter nor death are possible: what seem matter and death are sensuous impressions, which, in our sanest moments, the authentic instincts contradict. The sensible world is spirit in magnitude, outspread before the senses for their analysis, but whose synthesis is the soul herself, whose prothesis is God. Matter is but the confine of spirit limning her to sense.—Orphic Sayings.

Laziness.—Dr. Hale used to say that "laziness grows on people; it begins in cobwebs and ends in chains." I have experienced—he observed—that the more business a man has, the more he is able to accomplish; he learns to economize his time; that is a talent committed to every one of you, and for the use of which you must account.

Advantage of poverty in early life.—An English judge being asked what contributed most to success at the bar, replied, "Some succeed by great talents, some by high connexions, some by a miracle, but the majority by commencing without a shilling."

As Jonah's gourd withered in the morning, when he hoped for the most benefit from it, against the ensuing heat of the day; so the blessings of this world frequently wither, when we expect to find most freshness in them, and to receive most refreshment from them.—Arrowsmith.

What unthankfulness is it to forget our consolations, and to look only upon matters of grievance; to think so much upon two or three crosses as to forget a hundred blessings.

FOR THE FARMER.

THISTLES AND PEAS FOR SWINE.

Mr. Editor:—Last August while passing through the eastern part of this state, I observed a field in which were growing peas and Canada thistles, in about equal proportions. A man had been mowing and was carrying out some of them. I inquired what he did with them, to which he replied, that he had for several weeks fed six swine on them and he never had hogs do better. He said in the spring the piece of ground was so entirely covered with thistles that he gave up all hopes of getting a crop from it, and concluded to turn it out for a hog-pasture; but seeing it recommended in the Farmer to sow peas for hogs, he concluded to try the experiment with this field. He procured the small early peas and sowed them upon the furrow and harrowed them once over. The thistles grew luxuriantly and answered a much better purpose than oats or barley to support the vines. As soon as the peas begun to get full he began to mow them and feed them to his hogs, considering this better economy than to turn the hogs into them; for they were every day growing and becoming better. He says the hogs eat the thistles with greater avidity than they do the pea vines, and he thinks they are equally nutritious. This is certainly a useful way of managing a thistle patch, inasmuch as you not only turn them to use and profit, but get them entirely out of the way before the seed ripens so as to produce a new crop the next year.—Farmer's Monthly Visitor.

On Feeding Sheep.—Little and often says experience. In feeding all kinds of domestic animals particular care should be taken to avoid placing too much feed before them at a time, for it is observed that food which has been long blowed upon is never relished afterward, and will only be eaten from the most pressing necessity.

It is well known that the exhalations from the lungs of all animals, contain great impurities, which have been thrown off from the blood; and these coming in contact with the food renders it unpleasant if not injurious, and the instinct of animals prompts them to reject all poisonous substances offered them as food. The true maxim is little and often—never crowd the trough with food, or the rack with hay, to avoid the trouble of soon replenishing them again, if you wish your stock to thrive and do well; and particularly, if you desire to economise your winter store of provender. Lazy boys always fill the rack and trough the fullest, in order to save the trouble of doing it soon again.

Sugar Beet Butter.—We acknowledge the receipt of a specimen of the richest article of the butter kind that we have almost ever had the good fortune to meet with. It is of a bright yellow hue, which we are told is natural, and not the effect of artificial coloring. The flavor of the butter is not to be surpassed, and we must freely acknowledge that we have seldom known it equalled. This luxurious article of diet was made by Mr. Homer Eachus, of Egmont, Delaware co., Pa.—Philadelphia Ledger.

Great National Work!

LADIES COMPANION, (established in 1834,) a popular and highly esteemed MAGAZINE OF GENERAL LITERATURE AND THE FINE ARTS: embellished with Gorgeous and Costly Engravings on Steel, Copper and Wood, the Quarterly Fashions, and also with Fashionable and Popular Music, arranged for the Piano-Forte, Harp and Guitar.

TERMS—$3 a year. Single copies 25 cents.—Office 109 Fulton street, New York.

Mrs. L. H. Sigourney: The editors are happy to communicate the information to their readers, that arrangements have been effected with this talented lady by which she will still continue to be a regular and constant contributor to the 'Ladies Companion.' Her engagements in other quarters will not interfere with that connection with the 'Companion,' which secures to its readers the enjoyment of her beautiful productions.

Dr. Oliver Wendell Holmes of Boston; Professor Longfellow of Cambridge College, and Mrs. Anna Maria Wells of Boston, will hereafter contribute to the 'Ladies Companion.'

SPLENDID NEW STEEL ENGRAVINGS by our best artists, accompany each number; illustrated by tales and spirited sketches, which will as heretofore, continue to be magnificent and far superior to those published in any cotemporary work in America.

QUARTERLY FASHIONS.

Plates of the prevailing Fashions appear once every three months, viz: December, March, June and September.

The Ladies Companion contains a larger quantity of reading than any other magazine issued in this country, and its subscription price is only three dollars a year. The great combination of talent secured for the coming year will render it unequalled by any other periodical.

THE MUSICAL DEPARTMENT.

This department of the Ladies Companion has ever commanded a large share of attention, and has been looked upon with no little interest by its readers, and more especially the Ladies, whom the publisher is in the highest degree anxious to please.—It will continue to be a subject of more than usual care to him, and to the Professor under whose supervision it is placed, to make that portion of the magazine allotted to Music, more than ever deserving of the countenance of every lover of music.—It has ever been and will continue to be the desire to have all pieces of Music printed correctly and free from errors.

Over every department an equally careful supervision will be strictly exercised by the Editors, and all appropriate expenditures will be liberally bestowed, as it is the design of the publisher, with the aid of his contributors and the advice of his friends to make the Ladies Companion distinguished for beauty and accuracy of its typography—the variety and high tone of its literary articles—and the unequalled splendor of its pictoral Embellishments, which are entirely new and engraved by A. Dick, expressly for the work.

It is the determination of the publisher to use every means to maintain the superiority which the Ladies Companion has obtained. For four years he has steadily pursued a course of improvement, and he flatters himself that his present facilities are such as to give the Ladies Companion eminent advantages over all other publications of its character.

From the foregoing it will be perceived that the Ladies Companion embraces every department within the range of Belles Letters and the Fine Arts: and no exertion or expense will be deemed too great to render the work equal to any other extant. The flattering and general testimonials of nearly every contemporary journal in the United States, and in fact many on the other side of the Atlantic, have strongly asserted the undeniable claims of the Ladies Companion to the support of the public generally. There is no work that gives its readers such a great return for their subscriptions.

TERMS,—$3 a year in advance, or $4 during the year. No subscription received for less than one year.

Complete sets of the volume from May, 1839, can be furnished at the subscription price by applying at the office. All letters must be addressed, post paid, to WM. W. SNOWDEN, 109 Fulton street, N. Y.

Z. T. BENTLEY,
Attorney & Counsellor at Law,
AND
SOLICITOR & COUNSELLOR IN CHANCERY,

Will attend to all business in his profession with fidelity and despatch, at his office on Cortland Street, three doors west of the Presbyterian Church.

FOR SALE,

LARGE MAPS of Mississippi and Alabama, shewing the public and Indian Lands, Indian Reservations, Land Districts, Townships, Streams, &c., engraved from the Government surveys and plans in the General Land Office, Washington City; by E. Gilham, Draughtsman in the General Land Office.

F. Taylor, Bookseller, Washington city, has just published (and secured the copy right according to law) the above Maps, which will be infinitely more complete and accurate than any heretofore published. They are published on separate sheets, each containing six square feet, and will be found especially useful and valuable to those interested in the lands of either state as they show every item of information which is in the possession of the Land Offices relative to water courses, township lines, Indian Lands and Reservations, land districts, &c., and will be found perfectly accurate and precise in those points.—They can be sent by mail to any of the United States, subject to single letter postage. Price two dollars, or three copies of either will be sent by mail for five dollars. A liberal discount will be made to traveling agents, or to any who will buy to sell again.

Editors of newspapers any where who will give the above advertisement (including this notice) one or two insertions, shall receive by return mail a copy of each map, if they will send a copy of the paper containing it, to the advertiser.

Valuable Family Paper.

To Clergymen, Teachers of Sabbath Schools, and Bible Classes, Students, and Heads of Families.

THE Publisher of the Advocate respectfully informs the Christian public that on the 2d of May, the first No. of the Second Volume will be issued with such improvements in its literary and graphic departments, as the taste, talent, and industry of those connected with it shall be able to make. The proprietors intend to make it the best and cheapest religious newspaper in America. We shall continue to publish, as usual, "Illustrations of the Bible," consisting of views of the most remarkable places and objects mentioned in the Old and New Testaments; also views of all the principal Missionary Stations throughout the world—engraved by the first artists in the United States, after original sketches taken on the spot, by Laborde, Forbin, Morier, Le Bruyn, Ker Porter, Stephens, Buckingham, McFarlane and others. Also, the celebrated Cartoons, of Raffaelle; MAPS, &c. The Advocate is published every Saturday, (on a large imperial sheet, fine paper,) at 122 Nassau st., New York city.

Terms $2 50 per annum, in advance. Persons acting as Agents, and Postmasters, are allowed 50 cents commission for every subscriber they obtain and from whom we receive a year's subscription—they remitting two dollars for each subscriber, with the name and post office address. The paper is established on a permanent basis, being sustained by an Association, with a Capital Stock of $10,000.

All letters must come free of postage, or they will not be taken from the office. Remittances may be made at our risk, through the postmasters, who are authorised to enclose and remit payments for periodicals, free of expense.

ROBERT SEARS, Publisher.

Papers throughout the United States, copying the above two months, will be entitled to the Advocate for one year from the first number in May, 1840.

DE RUYTER INSTITUTE.

GILES M. LANGWORTHY, Teacher of Math.
AUGUSTUS L. SAUNDERS, M. D., Lecturer on Chemistry.

Ladies Department.

Mrs. L. M. CARPENTER, Preceptress.

This Institution is located in a pleasant and healthful village of De Ruyter. Its buildings are both spacious and commodious. Study rooms of which there are a large number, are furnished with chairs, tables, bedsteads, and stoves; and rented to gentlemen at one shilling per week; or one shilling for each student, the rooms being large enough to accommodate two. Good board is afforded at one dollar and twenty five cents per week, including washing or lodging. One shilling extra, is charged to those who require both.

The institution is furnished with a good Philosophical and chemical apparatus. It is also furnished with a valuable Library. A scientific society connected with the Institute, is furnished with a choice collection of Minerals and Curiosities.

About twenty-one thousand dollars has already been expended on the De Ruyter Institute for the purpose of facilitating the student in his pursuit of scientific knowledge.

It is the object of those to whom the management of the Institute is entrusted, to make the expenses of acquiring a knowledge of the sciences, as light as possible.

And the public may be assured that a strict attention will be paid to the moral cultivation of the student; and the trustees and teachers will spare no reasonable pains to render the time spent at the De Ruyter Institute, as agreeable and profitable to the student as circumstances will admit.

Young gentlemen and ladies wishing to engage in the pursuit of science, are respectfully invited to spend a term or two, at the De Ruyter Institute and satisfy themselves in regard to its merit.

The year is divided into three terms, of fourteen weeks each. The first term commenced on the twelth day of September; The second term on the second day of January; and the third term on the eighth day of May.

TO A RESIDENT OF DE RUYTER INSTITUTE.

Thou art, indeed, a queer inhabitant
Of classic ground. I little deemed our walls
Were built for such as thee. That one so wise
As thy reputed self, would deign to seek
The pamper'd lore of schools. But since 'tis so
Thou canst not sure despise the ordeal
Of thine instalment. For thou may'st not pass
Into the mysteries of our learned craft
Till duly questioned.

Ah! thou bringst us news
Of the famed pilgrim land. And thou hast seen
Perchance the very rock on which they sprang,
In their hearts thankfulness who hailed that shore
As the young Eden of the western world.

O tell me of the Ocean! Does it wear
The calm and beauty of its innocence
The same, with which it welcomed and flung back
The first pure ray of the primeval sun!
Or have the secrets of its hidden soul,
Treasured so long and well disturbed its brow,
And stamped it with the semblance of unrest
Which its deep fountains never may wash out.

Mute,—Mute,—why truly thou art over-wise
Withholding more than meet: well tell me then
Of thy retreats beneath the feathery fern
Or the long waving sea-grass, 'mid the reeds,
That screen'd thee in thy wily gambollings
From the dread presence of thy mortal foe.

Art thou forbid to speak? or dwells there still Among thy race the humbling recollection
Of thy lost glory? shaming thee to raise
That voice, that with its utterance once did work
Thy ruin, and for the world a deadly woe.

Keep thine own secrets then. Methinks thou hast
A look of sadness. Does it grieve thee so,
To be an exile in this western home!
What wouldst thou in thy prison-parlour crave
More than surrounds thee! Here are goodly stones
From thine own eastern coasts, and seemly groups
Of all the mineral tribes, from the rough granite
To the alluvia of the modern world.
Bright corals from the sounding deep, and pearls
And shells of delicate hues, from every coast
The northern Mya, and the cardium
And bright Patella with its rainbow tints
And Cyprea, and a nameless number more.
Are they not beautiful as when they decked
Thy ocean's bed or paved its rocky shore?

And here are stalactytes from southern caves
And Indian arrow-flints, the lost and found
The ponderous antlers of some smitten deer,
And weapon of the cruel sword-fish too,
And will not all suffice?

But thou hast more!
For thou may'st weekly listen to the voice
Of thrilling eloquence, and pompous phrase
Which Cicero might envy, and would teach
A Roman Senate wisdom. And then thy porch,
Whereon in massy symbols are escutcheon'd
The insignia of thy Royal domicil,
The "Quesitor Scientiæ," O 'tis enough
To crown thy boasting, if thy wily eye
Descried not 'neath the semblance of well-meaning,
A hidden mischief.

I see,—I see it now,
Thou art a prisoner! Still, the enmity
Between thy race and mine leaves me the heart
To wish that thou wert free. O had I power
To send thee forth, another dawn should find
Thy cage untenanted.

RELIGIOUS.

SOURCES OF FALSE HOPE.

This subject, on which some thoughts were offered last week, may seem to require illustrations in some further particulars.

It was remarked in the course of the former article, that ignorance, especially ignorance of religious truth, prepares persons to become subjects of the delusion of which we are speaking. We may add here, that awakened sinners are peculiarly exposed to deception, in consequence of superficial or mistaken views of the nature and signs of a change of heart.

Those who believe in experimental religion, justly regard conversion as a great change. But those who have a superficial acquaintance with subjects of this nature, are in danger on this account of looking more at the apparent greatness and uncommonness of what they experiences, than at its peculiar character. If, when under its peculiar awakening, they experience some very marked and striking alteration in their feelings, they are in danger of mistaking this for a change of heart. They think so great a change as they have felt, can be nothing less than conversion. In looking forward to it, they have anticipated some extraordinary change rather than a change of any peculiar character in other respects; not considering that while conversion is, from its nature a great change, there may be other changes in the feelings of a sinner, under religious concern, which are to him as uncommon, and as perceptible as this. It is rather a dark sign therefore, when we find persons, in telling their religious experience, disposed to dwell almost exclusively, on the greatness of their change, as being something very new and wonderful to them; such as they never felt before nor since;—and that without having much regard to the moral nature of their exercises.

It is, likewise, a common and correct opinion among those who believe in experimental religion, that conversion is an instantaneous change. It is a change of such a character, that it must be instantaneous. All those who fully understand and receive the representations which the Bible gives concerning the entire difference of character in the same individuals, before and after their conversion, concur in the persuasion that the new birth is not a gradual but an instantaneous change.

This just impression, however, may be employed by the adversary as an instrument of deception, with those who are the subjects of awakening. They are apt to suppose that an instantaneous change of heart will be accompanied by a sudden and perceptible alteration in their feelings.—Undoubtedly this is a very common fact, though it is by no means necessary or universal. But there is great danger that persons, under distress of mind, may mistake any sudden change in their feelings for a change of heart. Those who have never experienced such a perceptible alteration in their feelings, at or about a particular time which they can point out, are commonly very doubtful concerning the reality of their change. This shows how much reliance men are disposed to place on the circumstances of a sensible suddenness, as connected with a change of heart, and as being a safe criterion of it. As the absence of this circumstance may occasion unreasonable distrust in the minds of real Christians, so the existence of it may encourage a groundless confidence in those who have never been the subjects of regeneration. Persons under great distress and agitation, are subject to sudden and sensible variations in the animal feelings. And if they do not carefully attend to the causes and the nature of those changes, they will be in danger of mistaking some of the most remarkable for a change of heart; especially if what they experience is not only sudden, but also new and astonishing to them. The danger of deception from this source is increased in cases where such sudden and sensible changes of feeling happen to persons at or near some particular time, when they are rather expecting deliverance from their terrors. The tempter endeavors in various ways to lead anxious persons to fix upon a particular time, as at some meeting or at some season of prayer, when they entertain a strong desire, and, perhaps, an expectation that their hearts will be renewed, if they are ever to be renewed. Perhaps they may have been injudiciously counseled to limit themselves in this manner, for the sake of bringing their case to a crisis, and inducing them to come the more speedily to the all-important decision. Where this is the case, however, there is great danger that the crisis to which they are brought will be to an unfavorable one. There would seem to be a natural tendency in the persuasion, or expectation entertained by an anxious sinner, that his conversion must take place at or before a certain time, both to produce a sensible change in his feeling when the time, comes, and to lead him to consider that change, whatever may be its character, as true conversion. Circumstances of this nature have a powerful influence upon a nervous system, and through this, upon the imagination of persons who are rather in a state of alarm than of real conviction.—When the sinner has shut himself up in his chamber, with a determination not to leave it till he has met with a change, or when he has gone to a prayer meeting or an anxious meeting, with a kind of desperate resolution not to return without a new heart, he will be likely, by the very circumstances, to be thrown into great agitation of mind, and will be powerfully impelled to imagine the change which he seeks to realize; or, at least, to substitute in the place of it, some of the vivid sensations of a highly excited mind. We do not say that circumstances of this nature may never be attended with a favorable results; nor that they may not be the very means, in the hands of God, in many instances, of leading anxious sinners to repentance; nor would we affirm that human sagacity is always incapable of discovering in what cases they may be safely confided in. But we think there is peculiar danger attending their influence; that, although they are perfectly safe under the direction of the providence and Spirit of God, they are peculiarly unsafe in the hands of men; and are doubtless sometimes employed by the adversary as the means of fatal deception. He can transform himself, at such times as well as others, into an angel of light; and having led the awakened sinner to look for a change at some particular time, he finds a great advantage from that circumstance, in imposing upon the excited imagination of that sinner, some of the multiform counterfeits of conversion.—Congregationalist.

From Scott's Christian Life.

PROOFS OF PROVIDENCE.

If there be a God, he must necessarily be the cause of all other things that are and do exist. For whatsoever might not have been, or may not be, must be derived from something which cannot but be. If it might not have been, how came it to be? Not from itself to be sure, for then it must always have necessarily been; and therefore it must finally be resolved into some other cause which is of itself, and so cannot but always have been and always be. Now that this world is not of itself, but from some other cause that is of itself, is evident; because whatsoever is of itself, must necessarily have all the being, and all the perfection of being that is possible.—For that which is of itself is necessarily of itself, and it is not only true that it cannot but be, but also that it cannot but be of itself; for if it might not have been of itself, it might not have been at all, because itself, or its own essence, is the only ground or reason of its being; and therefore, if that reason might have failed, it might never have been at all. Now that which necessarily is of itself, hath neither actual nor possible cause of being; for if it hath an actual cause, it is not of itself; if any possible one, it is not necessarily of itself; and if it hath no possible cause of being, it is all that it is possible to be, that is, it is so complete and perfect, that no possible being, or perfection of being, can be added to it.

Besides, that which is of itself includes necessity of being, must always actually be what it is, and have nothing potential in its nature; and that which hath nothing potential must have all possible being and perfection. For, if there be any possible perfection of being which it hath not, it must be in possibility of being what it is not; and if so, it is not necessarily what it is. So that if the world be of itself, it must include in the nature of it, a necessity of being, and if so, it must always actually be, that is, be always out of all possibility either of not being or of being what it is not; and if it be out of all possibilty of not being, it must have all possible being; if out of all possibility of being what it is not, it must have all possible perfection of being; that is, all possible power, and knowledge, and wisdom, and goodnes, which do all as necessarily result from self-being, as any essential property from any essence. Since therefore this material world hath none of these possible perfections of being in it, it is impossible it should be of itself, and if it be not of itself, it must have a cause of being that is distinct from and before itself: and what can this cause be but God? since that which caused the world must be before all causes, and that which is before all causes must be uncaused, and of itself, and that which is of itself, must have all possible perfection, and consequently be God.

Since therefore the world was made by God, it will from hence necessarily follow, that it is ruled and governed by him. For, if he made the world, to be sure he made it for some end, it being unconceivable that infinite wisdom should frame a world that is capable of the most noble and excellent ends, without designing it to any end at all; and if he designed it for any end, to be sure he is concerned that that end, whatever it be, should be accomplished; and if he be, his own concernment will lead him to the exercise of a Providence, which is nothing else but a constant and steady guidance of those beings which he hath made, to those common and particular ends for which he made them. For, if he made them for any end, to be sure whatever it was, he did not let it drop out of his mind and thoughts as soon as he made them, but still carries it along in his eye and intention; and if he still intends that end, there is no doubt but he still prosecutes it, which he cannot do without a Providence: for how can he drive things on to the ends for which he made them, if he be withdrawn from the world, and hath wholly sequestered himself from all the affairs of it.

FOR THE CHRISTIAN.

THE LAND OF BEULAH.

"Beulah, married; a name given to the Jewish Church, importing its marriage with God as their husband and sovereign." Isaiah lxii. 4. Calmet. A name given by Bunyan, to a state in the Christian's experience, where the sun shines night and day. Of which Payson once said,

"When I read Bunyan's description of the land of Beulah, where the sun shines, and the birds sing night and day, I used to doubt whether there was such a place; but now my experience has convinced me of it, and it infinitely transcends all my previous conceptions."

Dr. Payson, in his late letter, says—"Were I to adopt the language of Bunyan, I might date this letter from the land of Beulah, of which I have been some weeks a happy inhabitant. The celestial city is full in my view. Its glories beam upon me, its breezes fan me, its sounds strike upon my ears, and its spirit is breathed into my heart. Nothing separates me from it but the river of death, which now appears as an insignificant rill that may be crossed at a single step, whenever God shall give permission. The Sun of Righteousness has gradually been drawing nearer and nearer, appearing larger and brighter as he approached, and now he fills the whole hemisphere; pouring forth a flood of glory, in which I seem to float like an insect in the beams of the sun; exulting, yet almost trembling while I gaze on the brightness, and uttering with unutterable wonder why God should deign to shine on a sinful worm. A single heart and a single tongue seem altogether inadequate to my wants.—I want a whole heart for every separate emotion, and a whole tongue to express that emotion."—Wesleyan Journal.

THE CHRISTIAN'S HOME.

The earth never was designed for the Christian's home. It is a field in which he is sent to labor. Here he spends the heat of the day, and he cannot find his home, until the evening comes and his work is ended. If this earth had been designed for the Christian's home, it would have been made a very different place. Would it have been filled with so many snares and miseries? It would have been rendered a peaceful, quiet, holy habitation. But now God has prepared for him a better habitation, where nothing shall ever enter to disturb his rest, and where he shall feel himself for ever at home. The Christian only sojourns here like a wayfaring man to lodge for a night, but heaven is his home, where he has an eternity to spend. Eternity! eternity!! O, the boundless thought! How can we settle down in the dust as though we were always to continue here? How can we feel otherwise than as strangers and pilgrims on the earth?—Griffin.

FOR THE INFIDEL.

FOREVER.—"Who can paraphrase upon the words forever and ever!" said the dying Newport. Yes, who can paraphrase upon them? What mathematician can number their years? Whose imagination so vivid as to stretch onward to that day when eternity shall have run its cycles? Alas! the imagination tires in the task; the mathematician is lost in his computations, and the mind falters as it gazes into that dread abyss. Well might the dying free-thinker, as he was hovering upon its borders, exclaim, "Oh, eternity! eternity! who can discover the abyss of eternity?" What countless ages, for ever wasting, but never told! And yet how near they roll! Their waves dash upon the shores of time at our very feet: and soon, oh soon, we launch upon their shoreless bosom. Sinful man, art thou prepared to number the hours which make up that vast eternity to which you are hastening? Time-serving professor, art thou prepared to traverse those trackless paths, which know no termination, forever?—Awake, O thou that sleepest, and gird thyself for the journey. Time is but a meteor's gleam, a single inch; and then eternity stretches onward to the judgment, and from the judgment, still onward, forever and forever.—Western Rec.

THE REDEEMER'S TEARS.—All the tears which Jesus shed on earth were tears of compassion. Those he wept over Jerusalem were, perhaps, the most tender and the most numerous. There was much pathos in the transaction at the tomb of Lazarus.—But that was the grave of a friend, and he was surrounded by those whose tears were yet freely flowing for their recent loss.—He gazed upon a rebellious and guilty city, thronged with his bitterest enemies, who thirsted for his blood. He foresaw the sufferings he was about to endure without her gates. These, however, elicited no tears. He looked farther, to the tempests of wrath which were already gathering over her towers, and were soon to burst in desolating judgments upon her children.—This opened the fountain of his compassionate sorrows, and if tears alone could have saved her, she had not perished.

And do I look back to the full accomplishment of Jerusalem's woes with only the common interest of a student of history? Can I contemplate the present state of her outcast and scattered families, and withhold the tribute of a tear? Surely the callous indifference of Christians to the condition of the children of Israel has been a part of the curse denounced upon unhappy Zion. Nor has it been less than a partial curse to ourselves. "I will bless them that bless thee, and curse him that curseth thee."

O Savior! let one of those tears as it were fall upon my heart and assimilate it to the tenderness of thine! Then shall I look on sinners generally, as thou didst; and my best affections, and my most strenuous efforts, will be engaged to every plan which promises well for the wide diffusion of the saving benfits of thy redeeming love.—Were I more like thee, I could not pass a day without shedding many a secret tear; without pouring forth many a fervent prayer; without using some means for the salvation of perishing sinners.—Rev. J. East.

WILFUL SIN.—When a person begins to sin wilfully, then it is that he first kindles the eternal fire.

FOR MOTHERS.

EFFECTS OF PRAYER ON THE MINDS OF CHILDREN.

Not long since, a pious mother of my acquaintance, who was in the habit of singing and praying with her children, called her three little sons round the domestic altar. After singing a hymn suited to the occasion, she bowed the knee before the Lord. She felt deeply impressed with a sense of the divine presence, and an unusual degree of solemnity filled her soul, while her fervent desires, mingled with grateful thanksgivings, ascended to a throne of grace. While supplicating the blessings of God to rest upon herself and friends, she remembered that she was a mother—she prayed for her darling sons.

After recounting over the goodness of God towards them through the past day, in sparing their lives, preserving their health, bestowing upon them food and clothing, and all things necessary for their comfort, she besought the Lord in the most tender and importunate manner to pardon them, if they had sinned by disobedience through the day, adding, in language suited to their years, that if they had, while absent from her, sinned against the Lord by disobeying any of her reasonable commands, the Lord knew it; for although hidden from her view, His eyes had been upon them.

The prayer was ended—the mother rose from her knees. At that moment, the youngest son, aged about seven years, began to weep immoderately—the children all wept. The mother having used no language to excite fear in their minds, and not being conscious of any previous effect produced by the prayer, was unacquainted with the cause of their weeping. She called the youngest of the three to her side; and she inquired why he wept thus bitterly? She inquired again, "What makes my little son weep so?" "Mother," he replied, while he continued to weep, "I have been disobedient to day; I went into Mr. L——'s house without asking your permission, and was in company with a boy who used bad words." And he could not be pacified until frequently assured by his mother, that if he repented of his faults, the Lord would pardon him. The second son, then, with tears in his eyes, remarked to his mother, that when absent from her he remembered her instructions, and he intended to be an obedient and good boy. The oldest, also weeping, confessed that he had disobeyed and offended his mother, was sorry for it, and wished to be a better boy. There seemed to be a reality in their penitence; their hearts were affected, and their affection uncalled for.—Now, may I be allowed to inquire what produced this effect? What caused these children to confess faults, which, until then were entirely unknown to the mother?—Was it the simple language of the mother's prayer? Or was it not a consciousness in them that they had done wrong, while the eye of the heart-searching Jehovah had been reading the thoughts and intentions of their hearts? Ye Christian mothers, who have precious souls committed to your care, be encouraged by the narration of these simple facts to go and do likewise.—Monthly Journal.

THE CHRISTIAN MOTHER.—While my children were infants on my lap, as I washed them I raised my heart to God, that he would wash them in that blood which cleanseth from all sin; as I clothed them in the morning, I asked my Heavenly Father to clothe them with the robe of Christ's righteousness; as I provided them food, I prayed that God would feed their souls with the bread of heaven, and give them to drink the water of life. When I have prepared them for the house of God, I have pled that their bodies might be fit temples for the Holy Ghost to dwell in; when they left me for week-day school, I followed their infant footsteps with a prayer, that their path through life might be like that of the just, which shineth more and more unto the perfect day; and as I committed them to the rest of the night, the silent breathing of my soul has been, that their Heavenly Father would take them to his embrace, and fold them in His paternal arms!—Scottish Guardian.

FOR THE PENITENT.

THE SINNER'S REFUGE.

It is the cross of Christ. As the serpent elevated by Moses in the wilderness was the occasion of restoration to the languishing Israelite, so the Son of man gives spiritual health to the diseased sinner. As the ark, prepared by the command of God, gave security to Noah and his family, safely surmounting the billows which submerged a world with its inhabitants, so he is preserved from the waves of iniquity, who is buoyed up by the omnipotent arm of the Messiah.

Of himself, what can the sinner do?—Blinded by sin, can he grope his way to the gate of the Heavenly Jerusalem? Palsied by disease has he self-inherent energy to effect a cure? He is a poor, hopeless being. If he looks without, to those who are similarly situated, he looks in vain.—Not only weakness is his portion, but to him crime is also attached. He has left his Father's habitation and he wanders an outcast. All the way in which he walks, is forbidden. Guilt momentarily accumulates upon his head, the weight of which must ultimately press him down to irremediable ruin.

What can the sinner do? Ah! surely the reply is plain. He can heap up guilt.—He can perish in his sins. He can reap that which is daily sown.

But is there no way of escape? Aye, inquirer, one, and one alone! It is the cross, that cross, planted on Calvary, on which was sacrificed the Lamb of God. It tells of hope—it speaks of relief—it promises salvation. Oh, the cross! the cross! It brings life from death, hope from despair, happiness from misery, peace from remorse, salvation from the doom of destruction.—N. Y. Evangelist.

MEDITATION.

"Seen of Angels."—[illegible] 16.

Angels of mercy! You saw Him leave His seat of glory above, and descend to the meanest and most wretched of His worlds. Ye were in attendance when He stooped from the height of His power, and was born in a stable at Bethlehem! Ye were with Him in the vast howling wilderness, when the dark hour of temptation had passed, and He was left alone. Ye were with Him in His retirements, in the secret and fervent pouring forth of prayer, such as man never prayed. Ye were with Him in His hour of desertion and mocking, of scourging and death! And ye were with Him in the sepulchre, and ye saw the stone rolled from the door, the guard set, and ye heard the last call answered and the last watch word given.

Angels of glory! Ye saw him burst the bonds of the tomb, and rise triumphant!—Ye saw Him chain to his [illegible] the king of hell, and seize the keys of death and the pit! Through your shining ranks He passed, on His way to His Father's mansions. Ye have seen that glorified body which was pierced for man! Ye have bowed before Him in Heaven! Ye see Him now above, all lovely as He is, and cast your crowns before His throne, and give Him blessing, and honor, and glory, and praise, and power, for ever and ever.

O then for your tongues to describe his sufferings! O for your harps to celebrate His glories!—London Christian Guardian.

FOR THE LADIES.

From the Ladies' [illegible]

FEMALE IRRELIGION.

It would be difficult to determine which is the most disgusting, religious cant or open and avowed infidelity, if even the pretence to belief, were not an acknowledgment that we ought to have faith, and that unbelief is to be regarded as a sin against society. Hypocrisy is among the most hateful of the blemishes that disfigure the human character, and is so repugnant to the fine feelings of a man of honor, that he sometimes rather [illegible] it even more contemptible than the unconcealed revilings of professed skepticism, and to a merely superficial observer of human frailty it is so. The man who but partially studies his own bosom [illegible] his impressions of [illegible] would always come to that conclusion, for meanness and manliness are such opposite qualities that the contrast strikes powerfully; and sometimes the case is decided without due discrimination. Nothing is more natural than to decide between affected piety and acknowledged disregard of religion on this ground. A well constituted mind so abhors hypocrisy in all its shapes and has so utter a loathing for the [illegible] of church-going-cant and for the frivolity of its professions, that it frequently finds itself ready to yield its preference even to an infidelity that at last steers clear of deception.—The conclusion is wrong, but we repeat, that it is natural; and I have no hesitation in adding, is grounded upon a good feeling, though erroneously applied.

These thoughts, cursorily and perhaps carelessly thrown together, are intended as a merely prefatory vindication of the writer of the few remarks that will follow, from a charge that may possibly be brought against himself. He would guard with more solicitude against the suspicion of insincerity than against any other imputation with which his character might be assailed. What he says, he feels, and what he utters, though it may be very erroneous or very silly, is always uttered with the single hope that it will be deemed in earnest and be received in good faith. Give credence to his sincerity and less is cared about the estimate that may be made of other qualities.

With the firmest faith in the reality of religion, and with the full belief for ourselves that Christianity is the most rational as it certainly is the most benign and most practical code of spiritual and temporal guidance, it is by no means our purpose to defend its tenets, urge its authenticity, or prove either its purity or its divine origin. All this will be taken for granted. It has already been too ably and too conclusively established by other hands to leave any such necessity to us. Such is not the object.

We have a merely isolated aim. This article is a "lay discourse" altogether, and though it claims to be Christian in its tone and spirit and object, it were fair to say in the onset that its writer makes no specific professions of any thing but belief and a uniformity of endeavor to square his acts as nearly as possible to the precepts of "the faith that is in him." Graduated to the standard by which some sects measure their members, he would come abundantly too far short to be admitted. At any rate he hopes so.

We believe that it will be conceded that your male flouter of religion is by no means among the most attractive members of the community, and that whatever may be the strength or weakness of individual belief in revelation, decent people look with horror on such disciples of depravity. They find no favor even among those who have their own abstract embarrassments in belief. What then is the light in which a woman is looked at under such circumstances? It is to this point we speak; it was this aspect of the case which led us to a consideration of the subject, and all that has been said before must be excused as introductory—possibly a lawyer might call it "surplussage."

An irreligious man—one who professes to be so, and glories in his own shame—who considers it an honorable distinction to be ranked among unbelievers, and who mouths blasphemy among his acquaintances as a sort of accomplishment to be proud of, is unquestionably disgusting enough; he takes decided precedence of the porter-house drunkard who blurts blasphemy over his mug of Albany ale without knowing what he says, and is merely vulgar and profane amidst an association whose whole object is a forgetfulness at once of self-respect as well as of respect for every thing else. There may be excuse for such excesses, though there is no justification for them. But, what extenuation can be awarded to the female who so far forgets herself and her sex as to repudiate the God who made her by contravening his ordinances. What possible palliation can she plead? Man may make himself a beast, and does so very often, but, can woman brutify herself to his level—the lowest level of human nature—without exciting special wonder? Humiliating enough is it, that she sometimes debases herself to personal pollution—that she is frequently found capable of disregarding the sanctity of earthly associations, but, it is too bad to believe that she can voluntarily jeopardize the safety of her soul!

That she sometimes holds her immortal existence in quite as slight esteem as she does her earthly fame, is, however, but too manifest from her history, and especially from her modern history. Even her superstition—if you please fanaticism—has sometimes added charms to the amiability of woman; she has frequently found a salvo even in her faults—would it be too much to say that she has made herself interesting in her crime? The reader of her history must answer, no. It would be exceedingly easy to adduce a thousand instances in proof of this position, and to exhibit a catalogue as long as all the muster-rolls of female "benevolent societies" in Europe and America. Sorry are we to say so, but, a great many of the distinguished women in the world, have been bad women! It were gross slander on the sex, however, to say that the pestilence has been general or that pernicious example has by any means been followed to any alarming extent. It has not been followed but avoided by the great majority. Woman is intrinsically the salt and savor of human existence; but for her the world would not be worth inhabiting. Her presence is all that renders it desirable to live! What, then, would be the condition of the world if women were to volunteer an infidelity that would render it wretched? Who under the light of heaven could sustain the wish to live on earth after its brightest ornament and its only comfort had concluded to render it wretched by banishing the belief that its dearest hopes and its most cherished associations were but a miserable imposture! Suicide is the only resource that can occur to him who, confiding to woman, has faith in her infidelity! Who could wish to cling to his existence, in the belief that his sister, his mother, or his wife! is of opinion that his faith is false and that the cherished affections of his heart and the precepts of his education are no better than so much deception!

For the purpose of placing a proposition before the reader, not actually conceded with any other view than to exhibit its intrinsic absurdity, let it be admitted that religion is of doubtful reality—if you please, of more than dubious authenticity in its origin—suppose, if you please, that it is mere poetry and fiction—if our religion, the religion of Jesus Christ furnishes the best examples and affords the purest axioms of human action, were it well to discard its rules and repudiate its precepts? Certainly not, as it seems to us. At all events, it will always be impossible to convince us that unbelief in woman is not the most revolting feature in human character. To look without loathing upon a lady-libertine, is impossible, and to behold her in the light of the worst of all libertinism—infidelity—is enough to make us forget that she is woman—in fact, to regret that woman ever came on earth!

Thoughtlessness and levity are, perhaps, characteristics of the sex, and far be it from us to find fault with them; volatility and vivacity may run into thoughtlessnes, and do sometimes very gracefully, but irreligion is unendurable. A woman's unbelief in religion is scarcely less derogatory than an avowed disparagement of chastity. In our opinion, there is about as much depravity in the one as the other.

That our holy religion is "worthy of all acceptation"—that he who scoffs at its rites or its ordinances deserves not only the penalty of its own denunciations, but the scorn of every well regulated mind, must be acknowledged even by those who have no formal connection with the Christian Church. The despiser is disgusting, as we verily believe, to his own comrades in vulgarity. We have rarely witnessed a rowdyism of unbelievers, in which each individual did not seem to crave a monopoly of the blasphemy for himself. While he was uttering the common-places of infidelity from his own mouth it was all very well and he considered it very current wit; but, the moment that an associate launched into a similar strain he became shocked, and hardly ever failed of rebuking the enormity. There is something intrinsically revolting in irreligion, even among the very men who delude themselves into the belief that they possess it.

When Dr. Young said,

"An undevout astronomer is mad,"

he might very well have added that a pretended unbeliever is not only a fool but a liar. He is a liar since he utters the grossest of untruths, and he is a fool for supposing it possible to make any body believe him!

What must be said of woman under such circumstances? If the rougher and ruder sex forfeit all claim to respect by denouncing religion, and loses caste even within its own narrow circle of associates, to what fathomless depth of degradation and contempt does female character plunge itself by such denunciation! Contempt is not the word we should use. It is not contempt with which we contemplate the spectacle of a woman who has so far forgotten her sex and her nature as to proclaim herself an unbeliever—it is horror! We shrink from her presence, as we would avoid a viper. Female skepticism is social poison—it is the bohon upas of civilized society. No man approaches it but with dread, and even the criminal, condemned to die under its branches, would prefer any other death. It is impossible to imagine any thing more than half as hideous as woman's deformity in this aspect. To find her in the haunts of infamy, to look upon her in her lowest estate in any station, were painful enough; but, we submit to every man of proper feeling if he ever yet saw a woman in any other grade of debasement quite so low or quite so striking in the utter profundity of her fall, as when he has heard her avow herself an infidel? It may have been his lot to fall in with a female felon in a Court of Justice, and possibly he may have seen a woman on the gallows, but did he ever look upon her with as much loathing? Woman may steal or she may murder and go to gaol or to the gallows for the crime, for she shares a common lot in the divisions of human frailty; but she was not made for Owenism!

Fanny Wright is no woman—mother though she be. She is merely a "man-milliner" who furbishes up matters marital without too scrupulous an inquiry into dates. In other words, she is, exceptio probat regulum, and a very decided exception she is. If it had so chanced that she had been born a few years sooner, she would most certainly have been whipped—dreadfully whipped too—through every county and township in which she ventured herself, and deserved every lash vouchsafed to her: for though every son and daughter of Adam and Eve have the right to the free exercise of their own opinions, and though we would be the last to coerce restraint upon them, yet we do maintain that they have no right to obtrude them on the public. People cannot very well be punished for taking arsnic, especially if they take it in doses potent enough to kill themselves, but they have no right to poison the public wells. Suicide is a crime that human laws find it difficult to reach after the perpetration, but, it is their duty to do execution upon all other homicide, because the criminal leaves himself ameanable to human punishment.

We do not pretend to an understanding of other people's feelings, but we claim the right to represent our own; and begging the privilege of assuming them to be in consonance with the feelings of a majority, —we trust a very large majority—of mankind, there will be no hesitation in saying that there is not on earth, in the waters underneath, or in the heavens that overhang it, so deeply disgusting an object as a woman who repudiates religion. Woman may unsex herself by profanity of merely colloquial language, and that is degradation deep enough, she may be a curser and swearer some slight hope of amendment? it is not utterly impossible that her last and lowest personal depravity may be redeemer by repentance and reformation!—the Magdalen may meet with favor; but, we put it to the most charitable to say whether there is rational liberality enough extant to look with any allowance upon her who permits herself to disavow dependence on her God!

Is it possible, even for infidelity itself, to look with any thing but loathing on the religious infidelity of woman? False in her faith on that point, is there ground for dependence on her upon any other? Is she who disregards the Deity deserving of faith from man?

Woman presents herself to the world under every advantage; she comes before it with every thing in her favor. Man, as he ought to do, holds his homage in never ceasing fealty. She commands his respect and she makes it the most pleasing portion of his existence to love her! How sadly does she change the scene, how deplorably does she deprecrate her destiny, when in defiance of the best and purest attribute of her character, she throws away her brightest gem and discards her choicest charm! Woman never looks lovelier than in her reverence for religion, and it is impossible for her to appear more unlovely than in despising it. How can she ever forget, not only the higher and more sacred considerations which should be the end and aim and object of human life, but those graces, which adorn and beautify her sex in particular, by wandering into the vagaries by which none but the worst specimens of *man*hood disfigure and brutify their nature!

If it were possible for her to look at herself as she is looked upon by others—if she could see her features in the same mirror in which they are seen even by the skeptic himself, no woman could ever be an infidel or permit herself to speak lightly of serious things; even if she felt no loftier incentive than the good opinion of the opposite sex. We submit it to the most confirmed and most determined one of the number, if we are not right! C. F. D.

DIVINE LOVE.—Love is the only atmosphere in which God and man can meet and live.—Thornton.

A DYING REBUKE.

An accomplished and amiable young woman, in the town of ———, had been deeply affected by a sense of her danger. She was the only child of a fond and affectionate parent, and the deep depression which accompanied her discovery of guilt and depravity, awakened all the jealousies of the father. He dreaded the loss of all that sprightliness and vivacity, which constituted the happiness of the domestic circle.—He was startled by the answers which his questions elicited; while he foresaw—or thought he foresaw—a fatal encroachment on a hitherto unbroken tranquility. Efforts were made to remove the cause of disquietude: but they were such efforts as unsanctified wisdom directed. The Bible, at last—Oh how little may a parent know the far-reaching of the deed, when he snatches the Word of Life from the hand of a child! the Bible, and other books of religion, were removed from her possession; and their places were supplied by works of fiction. An excursion of pleasure was proposed, and declined. An offer of gayer amusement shared the same fate. Promises, remonstrances, and threatnings followed.—But it was the unhappiness of the father which completed the inducement to compliance. Alas, how little may a parent be aware that he is decking his offspring with the fillets of death, and leading to the sacrifice, like a follower of Moloch! The end desired was accomplished. And all tho'ts of piety, and all concern for the future, vanished together. Less than a year shifted the bright scenes of domestic peace.—The fascinating and gay L——— M——— was prostrated by a fever that bade defiance to medical skill. The approach of death was unequivocal; and the countenace of every attendant fell, as if they had heard the flight of his arrow. I see, even, now, that look directed to the father, by the dying martyr of folly. The eye seemed glazing—and it was dim in hopelessness; and yet there seemed a something in its expiring rays, that told reproof, and tenderness, and terror in the same glance. And that voice — its tone was decided, but sepulchral still—"My father—last year I would have sought the Redeemer.—Fath—er—your child is"—eternity heard the remainder of the sentence; for it was not uttered in time. And the wretched survivor saw before him the fruits of a disorder, the seeds of which had been sown when his delighted look followed the steps of his idol in the maze of a dance. Oh how often, when I have witnessed the earthly wisdom of a parent banishing the thoughts of eternity, have I dwelt on the expression that seemed to arise from a season of departed hope—"last year I would have sought the Redeemer!"

FOR THE MINISTER.

A HINT TO DESPONDING MINISTERS.

A certain minister who had been very successful in his labors in the gospel vineyard, at length saw but very little fruit attending his ministrations. To be useless, he could not bear—his soul was bowed down under the discouraging prospects around him.—Nothing on earth was so gloomy to him, as a spiritual dearth; for he had been used to showers of reformation and mercy, and nothing else could satisfy his mind.—Seeing no outpouring of the Spirit, no sinners converted under his preaching for some time, his soul was beset with desponding and melancholy fears.

While thus exercised, he dreamed a gentleman hired him to work for him, and the price of his labor, per day, was stipulated.—On enquiring what his employer would have him go about, he was informed he must go and hammer a certain rock to pieces.—"That," he replied, "will do no good for the rock is large and hard, I could never break it to pieces." "That is nothing to you," said the gentleman, "follow my directions, and I will pay you your wages."

The laborer then went to work; and though it appeared an endless, and therefore useless task, he labored with diligence and patience for the sake of his wages.—After awhile, contrary to all his calculations, the mountainous rock broke into shivers.

The minister saw that the dream contained instructions for him; he felt the reproof, resumed courage, and was again blessed with seeing the rocky hearts of many of his hearers broken by the hammer of God's word.

Says the famous and judicious Hooker—The sons of God we neither are all, nor any one of us, otherwise than only by grace and favor. The sons of God have God's own natural Son as a second Adam, whose race and progeny they are, by a spiritual and heavenly birth. God, therefore, loving eternally his Son, he must needs eternally in him have loved and preferred before all others, them who are spiritually since descended and sprung out of him. These were in God, as in their Savior and not as in their Creator only. It was the purpose of his saving goodness, his saving wisdom, and his saving power, which inclined itself towards them. They who were thus in God, eternally by their vocation and adoption, God now actually in them, as the artificer is in the work which his hand doth presently frame. Life floweth originally from the Father, not to us but by the Son; not by the Son to any of us in particular, but through the Spirit.

DEATH.—A man would not be sorry to be ejected from a cottage, in order to his living in a palace: and yet how apt we are to fear death, which to a child of God is but the writ of ejectment that turns him out of prison, and transports him to his appartments of a court!—Toplady.

THE REGISTER.

De Ruyter, July 21, 1840.

Mr. GEORGE P. MAXSON is a traveling agent for this paper.

 POST MASTERS may enclose money in a letter to the publisher of a newspaper, to pay the subscription of a third person, and frank the letter if written by himself.—POST-MASTER GENERAL.

"A FIRST-DAY BAPTIST," who requests us to "publish a few articles" descriptive of our "peculiar views of the Sabbath," is respectfully informed that we have no desire to conceal our sentiments on that subject; on the contrary, we could wish they were known and appreciated by the christian public at large. We trust they would be found no less scriptural than "peculiar." Though it is not our intention to make our paper the medium of protracted controversies on any subject; yet, we trust, we shall be ready at all times to give to every one that asks us a reason not only of our hope, but also of our observances. Our reasons for the observance of the Sabbath can be given so briefly as to be seen at a glance.

1. We take the institution as we find it in the scriptures; accounting that the divine example in hallowing the seventh-day of the first week in time, and claiming it in its weekly recurrence in subsequent ages as his "holy day," and enjoining its observance on man, as a duty—together with the importance of the institution itself in relation to the great interests of religion and humanity—and the glorious rest in Heaven which it typifies—the example of Christ and all the inspired and good men in primitive times—are conclusive evidence in its favor.

2. Whether the Sabbath is considered moral or positive in its nature, or both moral and positive, the obligation to observe it remains unaffected; for if it be moral, then of course it is incapable of change while human society exists, as all other moral duties are; if positive, then the will of the Institutor alone can nullify or change it; but since there is no such expression of the Divine will found in the scriptures, therefore neither the institution, nor the time of its celebration, have undergone any modification or change by any competent authority.

3. To render our views on this subject at once familiar to our "Baptist" brother, we refer him to the stand taken by Baptists respecting the mode of Baptism, as illustrative of the position we occupy in respect to the Sabbath. They hold (and we think correctly) that immersion is the true and only scriptural mode, and believers in Christ the only proper subjects of the ordinance. Now, if the worthy, learned, and sincere Pedo-Baptists are wrong in practicing infant baptism, and substituting affusion for immersion, because they have (to use a common phrase) no "Thus saith the Lord," for such usage, can any thing like consistency be claimed by Baptists (we speak in all kindness,) if they abandon the same positions in the one case which they defend in the other?—if they explode the theory of the Pedo-Baptists as unscriptural, can they establish any claim for an institution like the Sabbath, by mere inference without direct authority from the Bible? Or how can they urge that as duty for which there is no command?

4. We wish it to be borne in mind by our brother that it does not devolve on us to prove that the fourth commandment is not abrogated, and that the day it recognizes is still the Sabbath, but on our brethren whose practice on this subject is opposed to ours, to show that such abrogation and change are divinely authorized. When it can be shown that the first day of the week is commanded to be kept holy as the Sabbath, we will comply. Until this is done, the law of the Sabbath remains unaffected by any event however beneficent, or any practice of the church however ancient, if it be subsequent to the days of inspiration. On these subjects the church may err, but the scriptures are infallible.—If she has departed from the divine rule, the earlier the apostacy the more inexcusable is the defection. If there is law for the practice and observation of the first day of the week, she certainly possesses sufficient means and talent to show that law; if the law cannot be shown requiring another day to be kept, then it is not a duty to observe any other Sabbath than that enjoined by the fourth commandment, which is the seventh day of the week.

All, therefore, that can be said about great events having transpired on other days of the week; and whatever obligation they may confer for the due commemoration of such events, while the fourth commandment is a part of the decalogue, stands for nothing with us.

If the practice of the church is law for us now, Baptists may give over their opposition to all the errors which the Papists have introduced, and which have so defaced the beauty of Zion, and embarrassed the successful propagation of evangelical truth. And if the practice of a majority of the professed church of Christ determines our duty we must give up the Sabbath; but we apprehend that Baptists would have as strong objections to the adoption of this theory as ourselves.

In addition, we only say that the practice in question is neither as ancient nor general as has been pretended, but is among the tares which were sown by the enemy while the church was sleeping, during the long night of apostasy, and that their growth has been fearfully luxuriant, and has operated much to the prejudice of evangelical sentiments and practice in the church of God.

Thus we have briefly, and we trust, with sufficient clearness, given our views of this important subject. We repeat that we have no unkind feelings toward the Baptist people. Their sentiments are our sentiments, with the exception of their views of the Sabbath, and we wish them abundant success in carrying forward the triumphs of evangelical truth & piety; but we submit whether their "peculiar" views should not be applied to this, as well as to baptism, and other kindred subjects; and whether without it their theory can "be made perfect."

TO POST MASTERS.

We wish to say that very much depends upon a faithful discharge of their official duty. Publishers of periodicals frequently suffer great inconvenience, and losses too, by a little neglect on the part of these officers. We have had very little reason to complain thus far. Generally they have done us justice—but, in a few instances, our paper has been sent to persons whose names were forwarded to us as subscribers, and, after having sent it regularly for four or five months, we have been informed that the papers were not taken from the office. Is it excusable, while the law is so plain, for those whose duty it is to give the necessary information—to withhold it to the serious detriment of publishers? We sincerely and respectfully request Post Masters to comply with the provisions of the law on this subject.

PRINTER'S CONVENTION.—The American Citizen contains an invitation to the Publishers and Master Printers in Western New York, to attend a Convention at Pavilion, on the 7th of August next, and says: "All are interested in the object of the contemplated convention, and we hope every Paper and Job Office in Western New York will be represented on the occasion. Let us come together—exchange greetings—compare notes—and do whatever shall appear to us best calculated to promote the interest, respectability, and influence of the Press which we represent." Success to the enterprise.

☞We invite the attention of all persons who wish to remit payments for the Register, to an abstract of the Post Office law under the head of this paper. We wish to avail ourselves of all lawful measures to save expense, in these times of pecuniary distress. We respectfully request persons living out of this state, and especially in the Southern and Western States, to procure if possible, notes on the Bank of this State, as we have in some instances been subjected to serious inconveniences and some loss, by having uncurrent money sent us in payment for the paper.

We have just received the manuscript copy of the Minutes of the Western Seventh-Day Baptist Association, held at Persia, Cattaraugus co., N. Y. We should judge our brethren must have had a very interesting session. Great unanimity seems to have characterized their proceedings.—Brethren Edwin Stillman of the first church in Genesee, Allegany Co., N. Y., and James H. Cochran, were ordained to the work of the ministry at the Association. Their minutes will be printed immediately and ready for distribution by the first opportunity.

TO THE PATRONS OF THE JEWISH MISSION.

In a note sometime since addressed to the connection, we then gave notice that the funds received were not sufficient to meet the expenses of the Mission—and that the Board would be obliged to take it as an indication of your wishing to discontinue the Mission, unless the Treasury was replenished. The Treasury still remains minus—and consequently, the Board is unable to meet the expenses already accrued. It was expected that the brethren throughout the connection would aid in sustaining this Mission—but while some have done nobly, others have done nothing. The Board cannot but regret the heartlessness and apathy of their brethren in this work—that after having called Br. Maxson from his settled residence, and from his pastoral charge when his labors was very much needed—where he had the privilege of uniting with a Christian assembly, and the opportunity of engaging in the worship of God with his brethren—should now so soon desert him in this newly established Mission, a work at least very discouraging, and is rendered much more so by the indifference manifested by his brethren in the work. It was expected, ere this time, that the state of the funds would have justified the Board in directing your agent to visit other cities—but this is not the case, and your Board is deeply mortified at so unexpected a failure, and do most sincerely hope that you will not abandon the Mission, but will again consider the subject.

Are not the fields white and already to harvest, and can you now abandon the work as having done what the Lord required of you? What sacrifice have you made to aid in carrying forward this Mission?—Perhaps there has not been as much effected by your agent as you anticipated; if not, the fault may not be his, you may have expected too much in so short a time, and what is worse, your visits to the throne of Grace may have been less frequent. You may have entirely forgotten this Mission in which you professed to engage with much zeal—to cease agonizing at the throne of Grace would render us exceedingly guilty in the sight of God, and let it be remembered that alms must accompany our prayers, or this work can never be effected, and they who have it in their power, can only be consistent by offering both. For us to pray that our agent may be sustained and we not contribute, would be like saying to the poor and destitute, be ye fed and clothed, without administering to their wants. Can any one suppose that God is well pleased to see his people so tardy in applying the means he has placed in their hands to disperse the word of Eternal Life to the lost, scattered, and dispersed people of Israel? Can you suppose for a moment that God approves of our present position? It must be recollected that great inducements was held out by many warm-hearted Christians, that as soon as the agent was in the field, funds would be forthcoming, and that it was distrusting the providence of God to first provide for the work. From these inducements and the united call of the denomination, the Church was induced to part with their beloved pastor, and deprive themselves of the wholesome instruction and faithful warnings which always characterized his ministry.

It [illegible] at his own expense—he has a large family dependent upon his scanty means, and that he has spent the greater portion of his life in the service of the denomination, and that at the sacrifice of nearly all the property he acquired in early life, should he when engaged in this great work be obliged to spend the remainder—while those who are able to sustain him, [illegible] what he has done? The Board can see no reason why there should be such indifference manifested towards sustaining the Mission. The prospect is as favorable now, as it has been at any former period.

There is a call for the scriptures in the Hebrew language—the descendants of Abraham wish to examine the prophecies, and their fulfillment. And can the day be far distant when Jehovah will "assemble the out-casts of Israel, and gather together the dispersed of Judah from the four corners of the earth?" Let it be recollected that he who said "I am jealous for Jerusalem and for Zion with a great jealousy," and most emphatically declared, "I will bless them that bless thee, and I will curse them that curse thee."

The Board would remind the churches of a resolution which they sometime since adopted, viz: to devote a portion of the first Sabbath in each month in addressing the throne of Grace in behalf of this mission. Let this resolve be strictly adhered to by each Elder, and each Church, and every brother and sister, and show our dependance for success upon the God of Abraham.

By order of the Board.

A CALL TO THE PHARISEE.

Who is meant by the Pharisee? By Pharisees we mean all that class of individuals who make their dependance upon themselves for future happiness. It includes all who trust in their own righteousness, wisdom, moral conduct, negative or positive goodness; not being so bad or better than their neighbors. This disposition shows itself in various ways. In some it is a sounding profession, in others, a great display of benevolence to the poor, and the church. In some a punctilious adherence to the popular moral reforms of the day. In others a particular attention to dress and all the outward forms of a party, or religious sect. It is not lukewarmness, or indifference, but self-complacency, self-security—a delusive satisfaction that a man feels within himself. To this class of individuals I wish to address a few words.

It is one of the most awful and alarming states into which an individual can possibly fall; yet it is the state of large numbers who profess godliness. It is to be found among all classes as well as in all countries and churches, upon the face of the earth. How many thousands do we see at ease folding their hands and blessing themselves in their hearts, who are totally ignorant and insensible of the danger to which they are exposed; and because they see and feel no danger, draw the conclusion that all is well, while they are sleeping upon the very brink of ruin. Reader is not this thy own case? Suffer me to address you in the language of the distressed mariners to their sleeping prophet; "What meanest thou O Sleeper? Arise and call upon thy God!" if so be, he will think upon thee and thou perish not. In the language of the Holy Ghost, "Awake thou that sleepest, and arise from the dead, and Christ shall give thee light."

O thou self-secure sinner! however closely wrapt in the mantle of thy own goodness, think seriously, if it is but for a moment, upon thy awful situation, and instantly call upon God. You are guilty and condemned already, and mercy is your only remedy and refuge. However lightly you may think of mercy at present, to seek it is of the highest importance. To see the truth and feel the force of this remark, carry your thoughts to yonder throne of mercy and listen to the songs of millions of the redeemed, whose voices are as the sound of many waters, adoring and praising God's goodness; and from that throne go with me to the bed of death, and then set a value if you can, upon his redeeming love! Imagine yourself in the trying situation, in which a few hours, days, or years will place you! The world can no longer charm you! The tears of relations and friends can do you no good! Now stripped of every earthly enjoyment and prospect; your soul—your naked soul—dismantled of all its false coloring, stands before God, whose eyes cannot look upon sin with any thing less than infinite hatred.—With all these objects and considerations in view, let me press upon you to seek for mercy to-day! While it is called to-day, "harden not your hearts." But if these considerations are not sufficient to awaken you from your slumbers, and arouse you from your carnal security to call upon God for mercy, let me remind you of the Judgment—the Judgment of the great day of the Lord! Then if you have not fled for refuge to the only hope set before you, you will seek in vain for shelter from the rocks and mountains, and all the refuge of lies in which you had entrenched yourself.

REVIVAL RECORD.

Revival in Poughkeepsie.—The Baptist Record contains an account of a revival of religion in Poughkeepsie, N. Y., during which there has been between forty and fifty hopeful conversions in the Baptist Congregation—thirty of whom have been baptized. A large proportion of these were heads of family.

Revival in Shelbyville, Ky.—The Banner and Pioneer says, "The Baptist church in Shelbyville under the pastoral charge of Br. Baker, has recently experienced a refreshing season. Fifty-two were baptized, and ten others stand propounded for baptism." Thirty-eight have recently been received, by baptism, into the church at Burks' Branch near Shelbyville.

One hundred and forty-one are reported by the superintendant to have been received into the fellowship of the Methodist Protestant church, since conference, on the Coshocton circuit, and one hundred and fifty-two on the Clearfield circuit.

Dover.—Brother Hayden baptized 11 on the first Sabbath in this month, making 47 since the revival commenced.

From the Cross and Journal.

Granville, May 19, 1840.

BROTHER COLE,—A simple statement of what the Lord has been doing in this place during the last nine months, may not be uninteresting to your readers.

Since September, I have baptized sixty-eight, many of whom were heads of families in the prime of life. Five of this number were Methodists, and five Presbyterians, one of whom acknowledges the subject of baptism had tormented him for twenty years; others are beginning to examine the subject, and we trust candidly and prayerfully.

Our Episcopal brethren have also visited our Jordan, for the purpose of immersing! and be assured this service is not without meaning, when performed by the water side.

Yours in the bonds of Christ,

HENRY CARR.

INTELLIGENCE.

SUMMARY.

Five Hundred Dollars is offered by the Governor of Tennessee for the apprehension of Zebediah Payne, the murderer of young Coltart, near Shelbyville. He is described as about 20 or 21 years of age, 5 feet 10 or 11 inches high, stoop-shouldered, light, or sandy complexion, fair skin, blue eyes, heavy eye brows, wears his locks generally long and flowing, and has rather a fat appearance.

Peaches were ripe in Charleston, (S. C.) on the 24th of June.

There was wheat cut in the vicinity of Zanesville, (O.) on the 2d inst., about two weeks earlier than usual.

Expeditious and Praiseworthy.—In the late passage of the Great Western across the Atlantic, a sailor, while shifting the jib, lost his hold and fell overboard. The ship passed over him—the engines were stopped—boats lowered, manned, and let down—the man at half a mile distance was taken up, brought on board, and the vessel put under way again, in the space of eight minutes.

Virginia Crops.—The harvest is now nearly completed, and the crop is good.

Aerial Traveling.—A man somewhere in the western country, is said to have proposed to carry the U. S. mail at the rate of 100 miles an hour, in the air. Whether this is practicable or not, we judge the common method of conveying the mail, would be quite as sure and safe, if all concerned would discharge their duty with fidelity.

Texas.—It is said the crops in Texas this year will be immense.

The Benefit of Laughter.—A man who broke in some windows in a watch-house in England, was lately tried and condemned. He was identified by his laugh. The magistrate pronounced it good evidence. This is a caution to laughers.

The Bible and the Catholics.—The pastoral letter of the Archbishop and Bishops of the Roman Catholic Church of the U. S., recommends the frequent reading by the laity, of the versions of the Bible authorized by that Church. We are glad to have them read the scriptures in some version.

Judge Hinckley lately died at his residence in Northampton, Mass., aged 82.

Longevity.—A man named Francis Beuregaurd, died at the Grey Nun's Hospital, Montreal, a few days since, aged 107 years, 9 months, 7 days.

The Temperance Reform among the Catholics in Philadelphia is advancing rapidly. It could hardly have found more proper subjects on which to exert its influence.

Noble.—It is said that the father of Daniel and Ezekiel Webster, mortgaged his humble premises in Salisbury to get his boys through College, and that the property remained subject to his incumbrance, till discharged by the means supplied by filial gratitude.

Ex-Governor Isaac Hill, has been nominated by the President of the U. S. for the office of Receiver General of New England, to reside in Boston.

Incendiarism.—Several attempts have been made recently, to set fire to buildings in Mobile.

A child lately died in Baltimore, in consequence of having swalled several percussion caps. Its sufferings were very great.

A Counterfeiter was lately fired on by the police of New Orleans, and so severely wounded that his recovery is doubtful. This measure is thought to have been necessary in order to his capture. He was shot at three times. Two of the shots took effect.

The Pressure.—Sixteen steam boats have been laid up nearly all the season, on Lake Erie, for want of business. Nine of the above are at Buffalo.

Canal navigation is now open between Pittsburgh, Pa., and Cleaveland, Ohio.

The French Chamber of Deputies, by a large vote, have agreed to renew the charter of the Bank of France, to extend to December, 1867, or twenty-seven years.

Caught at Last.—C. McKewen, who murdered a man six years since, was arrested and escaped—has been re-captured, and is now in Louisville prison awaiting his trial.

Consul Trist, who lately sued the Editor of the New York Sun for a libel, has been beaten. "So much for an attempt to muzzle the newspaper press."

A slave at Nashville, Tenn., lately jumped overboard from a vessel and was drowned. He seems not to have entertained such views of the "Patriarchal Institution" as many northern men profess to hold, and appears to have been determined to give a practical denial to the doctrine, "that negroes are not capable of taking care of themselves."

A Wisconsin paper says, "The wheat crops in that Territory last year, were astonishingly large, and promise to be even more abundant the present year.

Green Corn appeared in the Albany Market a number of days since, raised on an island below the city. The Albany Argus says "they are not much behind the south this time."

Important to Emigrants.—There is to be a sale of United States public lands, at Mineral point, (Wisconsin,) on the 5th of October next. These lands are situated in the valley of the Wisconsin, and on both sides of the River, and are said to be of much value on account of the great quantity of pine timber.

The Natchez Free Trader says, "We are happy to learn that the Cotton prospects are grand—almost beyond parallel where the soil has suffered no inundation—in Mississippi. Both on the high grounds and on the river bottom, the growth has been astonishingly rapid, and if serene dry weather should come on as expected, great quantities of cotton will be picked up in Adam's county and in the parish of Concordia, opposite side of the river, in the month of July. This we think is very early for cotton harvest.

Death.—Mr. Jacob Vanderwater, who was wounded by the discharge of a cannon during the visit of the Vice President to Brooklyn, died on the 13th inst. His arm had been amputated on the Sunday previous.

A small sail boat upset at Charleston, (S. C.,) on the 4th inst., and Mr. J. R. Hersey, his son Chas. Hersey, and Mr. H. Humphrey were drowned.

It is estimated that the tobacco crop in Virginia of last year, will reach 40,000 hhds., the largest crop made in the state for fifty years past. Perhaps it may have been the most profitable crop, certainly it is a most filthy one, and if the money wasted, and worse than wasted, in the use of this miserable narcotic were applied to works of internal improvements, none of the public works would stop for the want of funds, hard as the times are.

Indian War.—We learn, on the best authority, that the Ottoes have crossed over to the Missouri, and have commenced plundering the inhabitants of the upper country of the state of Missouri. The Iowas also have commenced with the Missourians.—Col. Kearney of the 1st dragoons has sent all his disposable force to their assistance, from Fort Leavenworth, and has called on the military of Clay conuty, Missouri, for further assistance.—Chicago American.

New Counterfeit.—Wayne County Bank, at Palmyra—3's, letter A, vignette Perry's victory; on the right end head of Washington, and on the left Franklin. Signed E. Fenton, Cashier; G. Burkurth, President—purporting to be engraved by Rawdon, Wright, Hatch & Co., New York.—Palmyra Sentinal.

The following intelligence cannot but be acceptable to our readers:

Extract of a letter from the western part of the state of New York, dated July 1st, 1840:—"The connection between Buffalo and Boston will probably be perfected in 1841. The Auburn and Rochester Railroad Company are urging forward their work with vigor. The engineer and contractors are determined to have 30 miles (within nine miles of the half of the whole road) completed and in full operation by the first of next September. By the bye, I should not be surprised if a large portion of the stocks of our western railroads should be eventually held in Boston."

Oppressive act of Maryland—.This State, at its late Session, passed a most tyranical, and, as it seems, unconstitutional act with reference to the free people of color of that and other states. The principal section, (the first,) imposes a penalty of $20 on any free negro or mullatto coming into Maryland from any other state whether to settle there or not; and for coming in a second time, having been once arrested under this law, or for remaining in the State five days after paying the $20, a penalty of $500—one half to the informer, and the other half to the Maryland COLONIZATION SOCIETY. Any free negro or mulatto refusing or neglecting to pay the penalty, in either case, is to be sold as a slave, the proceeds to go, in case of the smaller penalty, to the sheriff, and in case of the larger, one half, after deducting charges, and ten per cent. for the sheriff, to the Colonization Society!

We learn that the son of Elias Inman, who lives on the bank of the river, a few miles above this city, was drowned last Sabbath evening. The boy was about fourteen years old, and jumped into a boat which he pushed from the shore, intending to land upon a large rock, at a short distance from him. The boat struck the rock, swung round and the boy pitched overboard and was drowned. The father was too much intoxicated to make an effort to save him, but reeled into the house, and declared if he could have caught him he would have given him a——flogging!

Aboliton in the South.—Those in the South who will not bow the knee to Baal, are begining to show themselves. The following is from the Pennsylvanian of yesterday:

The Mobile Register has a communication stating, that George B. Simmons, who had for about a twelve month previous been the resident minister of the Unitarian church in that city, and who had acquired a high, and enviable reputation as a pulpit orator, had been obliged to leave the place on account of two discourses which were thought by his hearers to contain abolition lectures. The writer of the communication says:

"He presumed to read us lectures on our domestic relations, pronounced strictures on the conduct of masters to their slaves—indulged in a lofty strain of eloquence as to the probable capacity of the latter—spoke of their being embryo Miltons and Newtons of the African blood—declared that an insurrectoin, if successful, would rank them in the opinion of the world with our ancestors, who achieved their independence from their mother country."

After the delivery of the second sermon, says the writer:

"He was waited upon by several gentlemen, most of them regular attendants at his church, and was informed that he would no longer be permitted to remain in the city—and that if he consulted his personal safety, he would leave as speedily as possible, as they could not ensure him protection when the community should be thoroughly aroused"

After a day or two's deliberation, he adopted the advice of his friends, and left.

REMARKABLE ESCAPE.

On Thursday evening last, about 5 o'clock, Mr. L. D. Goman, in company with seven or eight young ladies, were riding through the different streets of our village, enjoying a delightful evening's drive in a coach drawn by four spirited and noble horses belonging to Col. Ehle's livery, and driven by Daniel Avery; when, after having nearly finished their excursion and arrived from the west in the front of the Lincklaen-House,—the driver having given a broad berth to the north side of the street, in order to sweep around in that direction to permit some of the party to alight,—the horses by some fortuitous circumstance became frightened, and dashed off down the hill to the east, whirling the coach and its devoted tenants, with such frightful velocity, as fairly to chill the current of life, in all who were witnesses of the fearful feat.

The driver, after the horses had attained full motion, which they did in passing a very few rods, seemed to direct his attention solely to the successful passage of a bridge at the foot of the descent. For some moments previous to their reaching the bridge, it appeared doubtful to him upon which side he could affect a passage, such was the excited state of his team; during these moments of suspense, it seemed to him and those who were spectators, as tho' they were inclined to cross the bridge upon the left passage, but suddenly for some cause, just before reaching it, the leaders sheared and entered upon the right passage; this movement being made, it seemed as though all must be inevitably dashed to pieces against the middle pier. The wheel horses, however, so soon partook of the influences of the leaders, as to bring the coach far enough over, to clear all but the left fore wheel, which struck the lower timber lying upon the bridge, with such tremendous force as to cleave it asunder, when the hub of the wheel coming in contact with the inclined timber of the pier, ran up it several feet and slipped off. This concussion gave the coach such an immoderate lift, as to throw the driver from his box. In his perilous descent, he struck with one foot upon the whiffle-tree, holding the reins and whip in his right hand and grasping the box with his left, and planting a foot upon one of the wheel horses, he threw himself again into his seat upon the box, for a renewed conflict for the mastery.

His seat fairly secured and the bridge passed, hope begun to dawn upon the prospect of bringing up his team without any material injury; this, however, was again dimmed by the rolling entirely away and separate from the carriage, of the left fore wheel, in consequence of the loss of the linch-pin, which was thrown out in the concussion upon the bridge. The noble and affrighted horses were now at the top of their speed on the rising ground upon the old Peterboro turnpike, and after running about a quarter of a mile in this situation, with one wheel off, and the coach for a miracle, retaining its upright position, the driver was enabled by great coolness and presence of mind to stop them, when all were safely alighted and received the heartfelt congratulations of the numbers that flocked to greet them upon their providential escape.

No blame can be ascribed to any one in this matter, but much credit rather to all, for their praiseworth behavior in this time of peril,—the LADIES in particular, observing a coolness and self-possession worthy of all commendation. But to the calmness and intrepidity of the driver especially, [illegible] the party indebted for their safety. How much, we have often reflected, under such trying circumstances, depends upon self-possession; and we hesitate not to say, that with half the consideration evinced on this occasion, the dreadful catastrophe of the Lexington, on Long Island Sound, might have been averted.

POETRY.

For the Register.

WHAT IS LIFE!

'Tis like the bright tint of the azure blue sky,
Like the sweet balmy breath of the breeze that sweeps by,
Like the sun's golden rays, as he moves to the west,
Like the moon's silver beams as she sinks to her rest.

Like the rose-bud unfolding its delicate hue,
Its bright glist'ning leaves besprinkled with dew,
Like the rose-bud's perfume it passes away,
It lives with the morning, and dies with the day.

Like dew-drops that chasten the lily's pure glow,
Like the rainbow encircling the mountain's huge brow,
Like the sound of the harp, as it falls on the ear,
Like the meteor's brief stay, as it flits through the air.

Like the comet's proud march, through the deep azure vault,
Like the vanishing glory of morning's short halt,
Like a leaf that's borne on, by the raging wind's blast,
Like the transient remembrance of dreams that are past.

Like the lightning that gleams through the mystic-clad sky,
Like the thunder-bolt's sound as it proudly rolls by,
Like the frail bark which tossed on the ocean's proud wave,
Goes down to its caverns, the sailor's low grave.

De Ruyter Institute, July, 1840. A. E. C.

A SUMMER MORNING.

BY N. P. WILLIS.

Throw up the window! 'Tis a morn for life
In its most subtle luxury. The air
Is like a breathing from a rarer world;
And the South wind seems liquid—it o'ersteals
My bosom and my brow so bathingly.
It has come over gardens, and the flowers
That kissed it are betrayed; for as it parts,
With its invisible fingers, my loose hair,
I know it has been trifling with the rose,
And stooping to the violet. There is joy
For all God's creatures in it. The wet leaves
Are stirring at its touch, and birds are singing
As if to breathe were music; and the grass
Sends up its modest odor with the dew,
Like the small tribute of humility.
Lovely indeed is morning! I have drank
Its fragrance and its freshness, and have felt
Its delicate touch; and 'tis a kindlier thing
Than music, or a feast, or medicine.
I had awoke from an unpleasant dream,
And light was welcome to me. I looked out
To feel the common air, and when the breath
Of delicious morning met my brow,
Cooling its fever, and the pleasant sun
Shone on familiar objects, it was like
The feeling of the captive who comes forth
From darkness to the cheerful light of day.
Oh! could we wake from sorrow; were it all
A troubled dream like this, to cast aside
Like an untimely garment with the morn;
Could the long fever of the heart be cooled
By a sweet breath from nature; or the gloom
Of a bereaved affection pass away
With looking on the lively tint of flowers—
How lightly were the spirit reconciled
To make this beautiful, bright world its home.

MISCELLANEOUS.

WONDERFUL NEWS FOR THE DEAF, DUMB AND BLIND—THE GREATEST DISCOVERY OF THE AGE.

The following most important and interesting paper we find in the London Morning Advertiser, and have no doubt of its veracity, as the editor speaks from personal evidence, and his paper is one of the most respectable in the British metropolis. We are much surprised how we or our contemporaries have missed it before, for it is certainly the most thrilling and important intelligence received by the Great Western.—However, we are consoled for the delay by the pleasure of being the first to lay it before the American reader.—Emp. State.

EXTRAORDINARY CURES OF THE DEAF AND DUMB.—Dr. Turnbull's mode of restoring or developing the senses of hearing and sight, is undoubtedly the most wonderful discovery of the age. On more than one occasion we have laid before the public accounts of the miraculous cures of which we have actually witnessed the performance, and which, we hesitate not to confess, had we not seen we could scarcely have believed. However, as too much publicity cannot be given to a discovery calculated to confer upon many human beings blessings scarcely inferior to existence itself, blessings, without which life lacks its chief value, a discovery by which those excluded by the absence of sight or hearing, from the most desirable intimacy and communion with the external world are admitted to enjoyments previously unknown to them, to receive the light of Heaven with all delightful revelations, and hold free converse with their kind—as too much publicity cannot be given to such a discovery as this, we unhesitatingly lay before the public the wondrous facts which we witnessed on last Wednesday. Two patients recommended to Dr. Turnbull's care by the Rev. Dr. McKinley, of Kilmarnock—one named Margaret Shields, aged nine years, whose parents thought she had lost her hearing, when an infant, by fever—the other named Mary Wilson, aged thirteen years, of Templeton Burn, Kilmarnock, whose parents say she was born deaf and dumb—were introduced into the room where we attended to witness Dr. Turnbull's operations.

Into the ears of each of these children the operator poured a few drops of white liquid, and added a small bit of lint to prevent its escape. They were then allowed to sit quietly for about an half an hour, when the Doctor slowly and silently approached first the one and then the other, with his watch in his hand; and in both cases, no sooner did he come within two or three yards of the patient, than her eye indicated a feeling of surprise, and a moment after as the ticking of the watch became more distinctly heard, she uttered an exclamation of delight, and assumed an attitude of most anxious attention, apparently desirous thoroughly to enjoy the new sensation. Some simple sounds were next uttered by the Doctor's assistant, and were immediately repeated by the child upon whom the experiment was tried. Words were next spoken in a similar manner, and with a similar result, and even whole sentences after being pronounced by Dr. Turnbull's assistant were repeated by the patient, who, only half an hour before, was both deaf and dumb. The child, of course, evinced no consciousness of the meaning of the words, but seemed to utter them from the delight of exercising a new faculty. Such a wonderful result attended us. As language would altogether fail to convey an adequate idea of the emotions we experienced, we state the simple fact which, indeed, needs not any extraneous embellishments to heighten its interest.

We have given the name and address of the Rev. gentleman who recommended the children, in order that the sceptical may have an opportunity of ascertaining their condition previous to the operation we have just described.

In addition to the above we find the following in the London Sun:

We have great pleasure in bearing testimony to the above well merited observations of our liberal contemporary, who has omitted to add that people are flocking from all quarters, and many from the Continent, to Dr. Turnbull, and departing in gratitude and joyfulness of heart at their happy relief. We think the Government ought to step forward and purchase this invaluable discovery, for the general benefit of mankind. If the man who has caused a blade of grass to grow where none ever grew before was deemed a public benefactor, how much greater is the glory of him who unveils the beauty of day to the blind, bestows the charm of speech on the dumb, and wakens the harmony of sweet sounds to the deaf?

MAGNANIMITY AND GRATITUDE OF A LION.

Prince, a tame lion, on board his Majesty's ship Ariadne, had a keeper to whom he was much attached; the keeper got drunk one day, and as the captain never forgave the crime, the keeper was ordered to be flogged; and the grating was rigged on the main deck, opposite Prince's den, a large barred up place, the pillars large and cased with iron. When the keeper began to strip, Prince rose gloomily from his couch and got as near to his friend as possible; on beholding his bare back, he walked hastily round the den, and when he saw the boatswain inflict the first lash, his eyes sparkled with fire, and his sides resounded with the strong and quick lashings of his tail: at last, when the blood began to flow from the unfortunate man's back, and the "clotted cats" jerked their gory knots close to the lion's den, his fury became tremendous; he roared with a voice of thunder, shook the strong bars of his prison, as if they had been osiers, and finding his efforts to break loose unavailing, he rolled and shrieked in a manner the most terrific that it is possible to conceive. The captain, fearing that he might break loose, ordered the marines to load and present at Prince; this threat redoubled his rage, and at last the captain desired the keeper to be cast off, and go to his friend. It is impossible to describe the joy evinced by the lion; he licked with care the mangled and bleeding back of the cruelly treated seaman, caressed him with his paws, which he folded round the keeper as if to defy any one renewing a similar treatment, and it was only after several hours that Prince would allow the keeper to quit his protection and return among those who had so ill-used him.—Martin's British Colonics.

THE FARM OF A BONAPARTE.—Mr. Hill, who has lately visited Bordentown and vicinity, says (in the "Visiter") that the premises of the late King Joseph, although he has been absent in Europe for the last few years, continue to increase in exterior beauty, as the grounds in useful cultivation must gain in annual production. The same buildings, whether of brick or wood, that were so trim and bright twenty years ago, lose none of their beauty and lustre. For more than a mile in distance, running along the old stage road, and in sight of the present rail road, is the high picketed fence, through which is seen the margin of trees and shrubbery extending as a bank around the premises, and through that are described the cultivated grounds. In one enclosure the deer are seen sporting among the trees—in another is ground under the cultivation of the plough—in a third is waving wheat, or other grain or grass. Barns and other buildings are erected at suitable distance. The whole premises are laid out either for ornament or use of some sort.—No part of them seems to be neglected.

From this description it would seem, that some Republican farmers might take a lesson about the neatness, and the fitness of things, from this royal tiller of the soil.—Boston Journal.

PRIDE.

It is a rare thing to excel many, and to despise none. It is a hard matter for a man to be cried up for an eminent saint, & an excellent person, and not to let in through his ears into his soul the infection of pride and vanity. Few men have such steady heads as to be able to stand upon the spires and pinnacles of glory without giddiness. It was the sin of pride, as divines generally believe, that ruined a multitude of the angelic host. These once most glorious spirits, walking upon the battlements of Heaven, grew dizzy with their own greatness, and fell down into a state of utter darkness and extreme misery. Upon whose fall one observes, that pride is a vice highly descended, and commonly entailed on the most high-born and excellent minds; because it was first born in heaven, and conceived in the womb of an angel's mind. Let us, therefore, (being taught by these examples) so war with all other lusts and vices, as to bend our chiefest force against this sin of pride; and when we have done our best, we shall find the conquest difficult enough.—Bishop Hull.

COLUMBUS AND LUTHER.—Twenty years only intervened between the discovery of America and the first preaching of Luther. The christian scholar may be pardoned if he lingers for a moment upon the analogy which subsists between these remarkable events. Columbus, pursuing his perilous course across the Atlantic, and led forward by the single star of lofty and inspiring hope, may be regarded as no inapt emblem of that adventurous Reformer who embarked upon a stormier sea than ever rocked the billow of the intrepid sailor. How mighty the enterprise of both! How magnificent the result! A land of beauty opened its flowery valleys to the navigator; but a richer land of promise blossomed before the eyes of the Reformer.

FOR THE YOUNG.

YOUNG MEN.

Most young men consider it a great misfortune to be poor, or not to have capital enough to establish themselves in good business. This is a mistaken notion. So far from poverty being a misfortune to him, if we may judge from what we every day behold, it is really a blessing; the chance is more than ten to one who starts with plenty of money. Let every one look back twenty years, and see who commenced business at that time with abundant means, and trace them down to the present day; how many of these can boast of wealth and standing? On the contrary, how many have become poor, lose their places in society and are passed, by their own boon companions, with a look which painfully says, I know you not!

REDEEM TIME FOR STUDY.

The busiest workman can spare some moments. If you mean to get wisdom you must learn the value of moments. Great attainments have been made in these little snatches. Whether you work or play, do it in earnest; but never be unemployed an instant. Unstable and indolent people loose much of their life in thinking what they shall do next. Always have a book within their reach, which you may catch up at your odd minutes. It is incredible until trial has been made, how much real knowledge may be acquired in these broken scraps of time. Resolve to edge in a little reading every day, if it is but a single sentence. The man who pursues this method will infallibly become learned. Take a little time for reading from each end of your night's rest. If you gain fifteen minutes a day, it will make itself felt at the end of the year. I have thought that the mind acts with double vigor, when forced into the brief periods of application. By degrees you will learn to save moments from work. And in the long winter evenings, you will certainly be inexcusable, if you do not devote an hour or two to your books.

"MY MOTHER LEARNED ME TO WORK."—Such was the remark of one of our Boston matrons, who had graced the first circle of society, whose husband was reputed to be rich, but who in the great commercial pressure of '37, had, in common with others of his class, all the profit of years swept away. 'My mother learned me to work'—and her face looked as happy in her cheap lodgings, as ever it did when surrounded by the paraphernalia of luxury and pride. Such a wife is a treasure; but what would she have been, had not her mother learned her to work?—Boston Times.

FOR THE PHYSICIAN.

From the New York Observer.

ANATOMY.

"The proper study of mankind is man."

There never have been facilities for the study of anatomy, which could be rendered subservient to all, until those furnished the world by one whose name might be placed beside those great ones, who by brilliant efforts of genius have brought great good to man, Dr. Augoux of Paris, who by an astonishing and admirable contrivance, has succeeded in relieving it of its horrors and loathesomeness, which hitherto have been the great barriers in the way, and made it possible for all to pursue the study and advance rapidly with little time and trouble. All may attend lectures and witness demonstrations, with no more associations of ideas with the real subject, than a beautiful painting would suggest.

We may add, (for those who have not seen the recent accounts of it,) that the figure and size of the human body are represented by the same material as that employed in the manufacture of snuff-boxes, painted to life, with the muscles and tendons, or sinews, the arteries, veins and nerves running through the whole body, most beautifully and accurately shown; the muscles coming off layer by layer, commence with those of the head, and the delicate ones that give the wonderfully varied expressions of the face; next, those of the arm, which are so much concerned in our works, labors, or recreations; the neck opens showing the trachem or windpipe, &c.; the chest also, wherein are seen the heart, lungs, and the large and important blood and air vessels, passing to and from them. Below are seen the stomach, liver, &c. (matters of great concern, inasmuch as so many are troubled with dyspepsia, mentally, if in no other way,) the absorbents, the medium through which we receive nutrition, emptying into the silvery thoracic duct, which although not one quarter of an inch in diameter, is the great channel through which alone this noble house "we live in" becomes developed.

Thus the whole human system with its ten thousand wonders, is faithfully reflected by this wonder of art, and an avenue opened for the student of nature, the philosophic mind, to approach and drink deeply at the fountain that delights it, rich and undying draughts.

The spirit and enterprize of our citizen, Dr. Bedford, in embracing an early opportunity of introducing one of these splendid works into our city, is commendable indeed, and no doubt many who may reap benefit from the opportunies they now have, will consider the doctor richly entitled to their gratitude.

The doctor has gone through one course of lectures on this subject at the Stuyvesant Institute, and is proceeding with the second at Clinton Hall.

FOR THE FARMER.

LE CONTEUR, ON WHEAT.

No individual living has made as many experiments with wheat, has done as much to determine the qualities and worth of the many varieties of this plant, or has so well shown its habits, and the soil required for its production in perfection, as Le Conteur, of the Isle of Jersey. His essay on the several topics connected with the management of the wheat crop, is of great value to the practical as well as the scientific farmer, as showing some of the many results he arrived at, in the course of his investigations. He says:

"It is perfectly true, however we may account for it, that all plants become tired of one soil, and one manure. They, like the human race, have their appetites and loathings, and a person that would be forced constantly to eat the same kind of food would not only infallibly sicken of it, but would most likely suffer in his health. So it is with the cultivation of wheat, or any other plant. The best cultivator of Lucerne I have ever known whose practice extended over forty years experience, assured me that until he adopted the mode of giving the plant fresh food yearly he was never able to make it produce as he has since done. One year it was dressed with decomposed manure; the next with ashes; the third with salt; and the fourth, with lime. I have applied this principle, and this system to wheat. That which is grown on land manured from the mixion or dung heap one year, becomes seed for land prepared with lime; that again becomes seed for land dressed with ashes; then for land dressed with mixed manures, and so on.—Vary the food or stimulants of the wheat plant as much as possible, in order, giving a good variety of every chance of finding a new soil on each occasion, or sowing."

HINTS FOR JULY.

From a belief of its utility, confirmed by several years practice, we earnestly recommend a trial, to those who have not adopted the practice, of curing their clover-hay and such as abounds in clover, IN GRASS COCKS, instead of spreading and curing it in the old way. It will save labor, it will save hay, and add much to the value of that which is housed. As soon as the grass has become wilted in the swarth, and the external moisture evaporated, and by all means before any of the leaves become dry and crumble, put the grass in grass cocks, as small at the base as possible, not to exceed a yard in diameter, and taper them off, by adding forkfulls to the apex, which may be four or five feet from the ground. Leave them undisturbed at least 38 hours and until you are pretty certain of sun or a drying wind; then open the cocks, and if once turned, the curing will be complete in three or four hours, scarcely a leaf will be wasted, and the hay will be bright, fragrant and will keep well.

Cut small grain before it comes dead ripe, for the following reasons:

1. If omitted, bad weather may intervene and delay the harvest too long.
2. Dead ripe grain wastes much in harvesting.
3. Early cut grain makes the best flour.
4. When any portion of the culm or straw is ripened, or becomes dry, there is no further supply or nourishment from the soil; and the grain then gets as much food from the cut as it could get from the standing straw. Hence, when straw turns yellow under the ear, however green it may be, the grain should be cut. And when the straw becomes badly affected with rust or mildew, the sooner it is cut the better.—Cultivator.

A GOOD THING.—A strong cement for glass, wood, &c.—Steep isin-glass twenty-four hours in common white brandy, then gently boil and keep stirring until the composition is well mixed, and a drop, if cooled, will become a strong jelly. Then strain it through a clean linen cloth into a vessel to be kept closely stopped. A gentle heat will dissolve this glue into a colorless fluid. Dishes of wood, glass, or earthen, if united with this cemet, will crack elsewhere rather than separate in the old break. In applying the cement, rub the edges which are to be united, then place them together, and hold them for two minutes and the work is done. This is very easily done, and incomparably better than any thing else for the purpose.

MAKING BUTTER.—Every farmer who makes his own butter, will be glad to learn how to make the most from milk, & at the same time produce an article of good quality. Putting a pint of cold water during the summer months into each pan of milk when strained from the cow, will materially aid these desirable objects. The milk will not sour as quick, and the cream will rise more perfectly. The reason why butter made in the summer becomes rancid so soon, is owing to the imperfect manner in which milk, frequently soured before churning, is separated from the butter. Retarding the souring of the milk by the application of cold water, obviates this difficulty.—Genesee Farmer.

Ladies Department.

Mrs. L. M. CARPENTER, Preceptress.

This Institution is located in the pleasant and healthful village of De Ruyter. Its buildings are both spacious and commodious. Study rooms of which there are a large number, are furnished with chairs, tables, bedsteads, and stoves, and rented to gentlemen at one shilling per week, or one shilling for each student, the rooms being large enough to accommodate two. Good board is afforded at one dollar and twenty five cents per week, including washing and lodging. One shilling extra, is charged to those who room [illegible] both.

The institution is furnished with a good Philosophical and chemical apparatus. It is also in possession of a valuable Library. A scientific society connected with the Institute, is furnished with a choice collection of Minerals and Curiosities.

About twenty-one thousand dollars have already been expended on the De Ruyter Institute for the purpose of facilitating the student in his pursuit of scientific knowledge.

It is the object of those to whom the management of the Institute is entrusted, to make the expenses of acquiring a knowledge of the sciences, as light as possible.

And the public may be assured that a strict attention will be paid to the moral cultivation of the student; and the trustees and teachers will spare no reasonable pains to render the time spent at the De Ruyter Institute, as agreeable and profitable to the student as circumstances will admit.

Young gentlemen and ladies wishing to engage in the pursuit of science, are respectfully invited to spend a term or two, at the De Ruyter Institute and satisfy themselves in regard to its merit.

The year is divided into three terms, of fourteen weeks each. The first term commenced on the twelfth day of September. The second term on the second day of January; and the third term on the eighth day of May.

IMPRESSIONS FROM THE REVIEW OF YOUTHFUL DAYS.

The deep impress made by the associations of childhood and youth on the mind, always remain through life, serving, as a well written page spread out before us, to bring to our memories the scenes, the joys, and the disquietudes of our early life, in all their bright visions and fancies in which they appeared in our youth. It brings up for our contemplation, the varied interests which hurried us along in the meandering path of life, and raises anew in the mind the sensations which have so long lain concealed by other thoughts. There is not a single occurrence of our lives, which remains in our memories, that does not bring some peculiar sensation corresponding to the nature of that occurrence. If, in early life we, by mis-judging or by deceitful appearances, have been led from the path of rectitude, and become entangled by outbreaking sins which bring upon us the frowns of the just, and the reproach of friends, though we again return from this mode of life, the fruits of this disobedience remain through life, obscuring the bright visions of the mind with mists of darkness, whereever we take a review of the past.—Yet those who have pursued a more honorable course of life, have their minds impressed with thoughts of a different character. Though the scenes of by-gone days may awaken in the mind deep and solemn reflections, yet they cause no sense of regret. They are feelings which were cultivated by these very objects to which our mind is refered, and they correspond to the spirit in which we enjoyed them while in the spring-time of life.

The place of our nativity, from which we have long been absent, produces on our return solemn reflections, as well as those which are pleasing. Thus, as we approach our native place we behold the mansion in in which we spent our infancy, our childhood, and our youth. Every object around interests us. There is the gentle stream that meanders through the meadow at no great distance from our dwelling. Along its banks we have often wandered to pluck the daisies and gather the opening flowers. There is the grove, in which we have spent many hours of healthful recreation, and to which we have oft retired to read our little bible and other books furnished us by our parents. There, too, are the woodlands which we have often traversed with our comrades, penetrating their inmost recesses to espy the rude scenery of nature.—And there, too, are the hills in the midst of the neighborhood, presenting almost every degree of grandeur, consisting of moderate swells, rugged elevations, and steep precipices, while beyond, they seem to form one solid range bounding the horizon.

When the sun is declining in the west, we may frequently see the fleecy clouds towering from their summits to the heavens and sporting in the breeze. We, now and then, see them put on gold and violet, and variegated in all the richness of colors.—How beautiful is this view! It fills the mind with delight, and raises it almost to ecstacy. But our pleasure is heightened by the reflection that they are the scenes with which we were conversant in the days of our youth.

From these splendid pictures of nature, we turn to seek those who formed the friendly circle, and partook of the gayety of our early life. Where shall we seek them? Some of them have, long since, been borne to their silent repose in the church-yard, where they will sleep till the loud trump awakes their slumbering dust. Others are in foreign climes, engaged in the bustling cares of life, and hurrying along with the rapidity of a strong current. There are some yet remaining with whom we spent the spring of life, and with whom we had many agreeable pastimes. But the change that has come over them! The smile of pleasure that glowed on their cheeks, the hilarity of the youthful spirit, have given place to the gravity of age, and the habits of the man of business. We feel a solemn sensation on perceiving this change which works with its silent power on our country. Yet we feel, too, that a greater change is to take place.

The great truth is rivetted in the mind that all mankind must pass away; that this earth, with all its beautiful and sublime scenery, must fall in ruins, and vanish as a vapor. In these deep reflections what is there here to keep the mind from dejection? Is there any thing amidst these transitory scenes on which it may rest? or will it, at once, admit the idea that, in this great change, it will be annihilated and forever cease to exist.

The mind shudders at the thoughts of annihilation, and it seeks for something more firm than the vanities of sublunary things on which to rest its hopes. It lays hold on the promises proclaimed in the gospel, and feels assured that, though the heavens and the earth pass away, there will be a new heaven and a new earth, where the sanctified shall dwell forever in courts of bliss.

RELIGIOUS.

ASIATIC PROVERBS.

Do good to him who does you evil, by this means you will gain the victory.

Men, because of Speech, have the advantage over beasts; but brutes are preferable to men whose language is indecent.

If you can do good to-day, defer it not till to-morrow.

He lives in true repose, who bridles his passions.

A passionate man is capable of nothing;—how unfit then is such a person for a Governor!

A rich man who is not liberal, resembles a tree without fruit.

You cannot keep your own secret—what cause then have you to complain if another to whom you have declared it should reveal it?

A wicked man should be considered as dead while he is alive: but a good man lives even in the tomb.

On many an occasion a good book supplies the place of an agreeable companion.

He who is of a surly and unyielding disposition, never fails to excite trouble, even among relatives and friends.

To have pity on one's enemy when he has an advantage over him, is the mark of a great soul.

A good action never perishes, neither before God nor before men.

Never despise a man because his employment is mean or his clothing is bad. The Bee is an insect which is not very pleasing to the sight, yet its hive affords abundance of honey.

The people enjoy repose only when governed by those who enjoy none.

Do not rejoice at the death of your enemy; your life is not eternal.

It is extremely difficult to render him wise who knows nothing; because his ignorance causes him to believe that he knows more than he who attempts to instruct him.

Fear the man who fears you.

Do nothing without design.

The thought of evil frequently derives its origin from idleness.

The most proper manner of punishing an envious person, is to load him with benefits.

When you speak, let it be in such a manner as not to require an explanation.

The most precious acquisition is that of a friend.

Every kind of employment requires a particular sort of genius.

The best expended riches are those which are given for God's sake.

FORGIVENESS.—He that means to communicate worthily, must so forgive his enemy, as never to upbraid his crime any more. For we must so forgive as that we forget it; not in the sense of nature, but perfectly in the sense of charity. For to what good purpose can any man keep a record of a shrewd turn, but to become a spy upon the actions of his enemy, watchful to do him shame, and by that to aggravate every new offense? It was a malicious part of Darius, when the Athenians had plundered Sardis; he, resolving to remember the evil turn, till he had done them a mischief, commanded one of his servants, that every time he waited at supper, he should thrice call upon him, "Sir, remember the Athenians." The devil is apt enough to do this office for any man; and he that keeps in mind an injury, needs no other tempter to uncharitableness than his own memory. He that resolves to remember it, never does forgive it perfectly, but is the under-officer of his own malice. For as rivers that run under ground do infallibly fall into the sea, so is the injury that is remembered; it runs under ground indeed, and the anger is hid, but it tends certainly to mischief; and though it be sometimes less deadly for want of opportunity, yet it is never less dangerous.—Bp. Taylor on Forgiveness.

Let those who are instrumental in bringing one sheep into the fold of Christ on earth, remember that they add one harp to the chorus of heaven.—Rev. W. Marsh.

TIME.—Every hour comes to us charged with duty, and the moment it is past returns to heaven to register itself how spent.—My hours, how trifled, sensualised, sauntered, dosed, sinned away!—Rev. T. Adam.

When Peter followed Christ at a distance, Satan easily stepped in between them.

A BEAUTIFUL PICTURE, BY AN EARLY MASTER.—"What a union is there between two believers. They have one hope and one desire; they serve one faith and one Master. There is a union of the spirit, as well as of the flesh—one spirit and one flesh. They read the Scriptures together; they fast together, they teach, warn, bear one another's burthens. They are together at the church, and at the Lord's table; they share together afflictions, persecutions, and joys. Neither conceals any thing from the other, neither avoids the other, neither is burdensome to the other. Freely the sick can be relieved, and alms distributed to the poor. They sing their psalms and hymns together, and emulate each other in sounding the praises of their God. Jesus Christ is pleased when he sees and hears such things as these; to them he gives his peace. Where two are, in his name, there he is also, and where he is the wicked one cometh not."—Tertullian, on the early Christians—A. D. 150.

"BLESSED IS HE THAT BLESSETH THEE;" Num. xxiv. 9.—The following very remarkable circumstance, will show how clearly this Scripture is sometimes fulfilled, with regard to the lineal descendants of those to whom the promise was originally made.

A few years ago a converted Jew, who was greatly persecuted for his religion, sought and found protection in the house of a warm friend of Israel, the Rev. W. Marsh, of Birmingham. After he had resided in the family for some months, one of Mr. Marsh's children fell sick and died.—Another and another followed, until at length four of his beloved offspring had descended to the tomb. Of course, this was looked upon by some as a judgment on Mr. M. for having so long harbored one who had been a blasphemer of our Lord. But mark how mysterious are the ways of God! and how rich always in mercy to his people!—These four children severally declared upon their death beds, that they had been brought to a knowledge of the truth by means of the converted Jew! So true the promise of our God "I will bless thee and thou shalt be a blessing." And "Blessed is he that blesseth thee."

"WHAT IS TRUTH?"—This is a question which the Bible will answer. God has not left his truth without a record, but has displayed it, for the inspection of all, in the pages of that sacred book, which was written for our learning. There the sage may gather wisdom, and "the wayfaring men shall not err therein." There is something in the Truth which Holy Scripture teaches, that is far above truth of every kind.—Unassisted man labored to reach it, but in vain. He imagined a model of perfect purity; and reasoned by the analogy of nature upon a life to come. But he knew nothing; and lived in doubt, if not in total blindness. "Where is the wise? Where is the scribe? Where is the disputer of this world? hath not God made foolish the wisdom of this world?" Yes: a despised race first received the divine message; and to them alone, of all the nations of the world, was communicated, in all the stages of its progress, that truth which is "now made manifest by the appearing of our Saviour Jesus Christ; who hath abolished death, and hath brought life and immortality to light through the Gospel."

THE HOLY SCRIPTURES.—As the bounty of God appears in the furniture and comforts of our natural life, in that he hath not only provided for simple necessity, but enriched it with plentiful variety; thus he hath done likewise towards the spiritual life in the provision of the Holy Scriptures, having in them so rich diversity of the kind of writings, prophesies, and histories, poesies, and epistles; and of the same kind, and expressly on the same subject, four books written by the hands of four several men, but all led by the hand of the same Spirit; and all of them so harmoniously according together, as makes up one song; the four with a delightful variety of notes, but no mistuning or jarring difference; those that seem to be so being duly considered, do not only well agree, but there is still some instructive advantage in the diversity; each recording something, some of them divers things that are not in the other; and what one hath more briefly, is more enlarged in some other; they are not so different as to be discordant, nor so the same as to be superfluous.—Leighton.

I CANNOT praise a fugitive and cloistered virtue, unexercised and unbreathed, that never sallies out and sees her adversary, but slinks out of the race, where that immortal garland is to be run for, not without dust and sweat. This was the reason why our sage and serious poet, Spencer, describing true temperance, under the person of Guion, brings him in with his palmer, through the Cave of Mammon, and the Bowers of Earthly Bliss, that he might see and know, and yet abstain.—Milton.

The devout Christian, whom in perilous times, and towards the close of life, a gracious Providence has thrown ashore in some sequestered corner, from whence he views those secular tumults with which he hath no farther concern, is, perhaps, arrived at the next degree of happiness to that of just spirits made perfect.—Bishop Horne.

FOLLY.—With the talents of an angel, a man may be a fool; if he judge amiss in the supreme point, judging right in all else, does but aggravate his folly.—Young.

EFFECTS OF THE HOLY SPIRIT.—Mark the rain that falls from above, and the same shower that droppeth out of one cloud increaseth sundry plants in a garden, and severally according to the condition of every plant; in one stalk it makes a rose, in another a violet, divers in a third, and sweetening all. So the Spirit works its multiformous effects in several complexions, and all according to the increase of God. Is thy habit and inclination choleric? Why, try thy self if thou be very apt to be zealous in a good cause, and it turns thy natural infirmity into holy heat. Is melancholy predominant? The grace of God will turn that sad humor into devotion, prayer, and mortifying thy pleasures to die unto the world. Is thy temperature sanguine and cheerful? The goodness of God will allow it unto thee in thy civil life, in a good mean; but over and above, it will make thee bountiful, easy to pardon injuries, glad of reconciliation, comfortable to the distressed, always rejoicing in the Lord. Is a man phlegmatic and fearful? If this freezing disease which is in thee from thy mother's womb, be not absolutely cured, yet the Holy Ghost will work upon it, to make thy conscience tender, wary to give no offense, to make thee pitiful, penitent, contrite, ready to weep for thy transgressions. "There are two handles to take hold of every thing," says a heathen: a dissolute man takes hold of original frailties, and makes them serpents; a holy man declines their serpentine nature, and catcheth them by that part, which may conduce to all manner of virtue. This is the comfort of hope against original inquination, that this great enemy, by the operations of the Spirit, shall be made our friend or our footstool.—Jeremy Taylor.

THE QUAKERESS BRIDE.

BY MRS. E. C. STEDMAN.

O! not in the halls of the noble and proud,
Where fashion assembles her glittering crowd;
Where all is beauty and splendor array'd,
Where the nuptials performed of the meek quaker bride;

Nor yet in the temple those rites which she took,
By the altar, the mitre-crown'd bishop and book;
Where oft in her jewels doth stand the fair bride,
To whisper those vows which thro' life shall abide.

The building was humble, yet sacred to Him,
Before whom the pomp of religion is dim;
Whose presence is not to the temple confin'd,
But dwells with the contrite and lowly of mind.

'Twas here, all unveil'd, save by modesty, stood
The Quakeress bride, in her pure satin hood;
Her charms unadorn'd by the garland or gem,
Yet fair as the lily just pluck'd from its stem.

A tear glisten'd bright, in her dark shaded eye,
And her bosom half utter'd a tremulous sigh,
As the hand she had pledged was confidingly given,
And the low murmured accents recorded in Heaven.

I've been at the bridal where wealth spread the board,
Where the sparkling red wine in rich goblets was poured;
Where the priest in his surplice from the ritual read,
And the solemn response was impressively said.

I've seen the fond sire in his thin locks of gray,
Give the pride of his heart to the bridegroom away;
While he brushed the big tear from his deep fur-
rowed cheek,
And bowed the assent which his lips might not speak.

But in all array of the costliest scene,
Nought seemed to my eye so sincere in its mien,
No language so fully the heart to resign,
As the Quakeress bride's—"until death I am thine."

GLORIES OF THE SAVIOR.—In this contemplation we are at once lost in an unmeasurable ocean of overpowering glory. Imagination is bewildered—language fails.—Go, take a survey of the earth on which we dwell; collect every object and every quality which have been pronounced fair, sweet, or lovely; combine these into one resplendent orb of beauty. Then leave the bounds of earth, and wing your flight thro' the fields of immensity; in your progress collect what is fair and lovely in every world—what is bright and dazzling in every sun; combine these into other orbs of surpassing brightness; and thus continue to swell the number of the magnificent aggregates, till the whole extent of creation is exhausted. And after having united these myriads of bright constellations, combining in itself the concentrate beauty and loveliness of the whole created universe, go and compare an atom to the world—a drop to the ocean—the twinkling of a taper to the full blaze of the noon-tide sun; and then you may compare even this all-comprehending constellation of beauty and loveliness with the boundless the ineffable beauty and excellence of Him who is the brightness of his Father's glory, who is God over all, blessed forever.—Lond Miss. Reg.

SIN IN THE WILL.—"When the blood of thy martyr Stephen was shed," says St. Paul, "I also was standing by, and consenting unto his death, and kept the raiment of them that slew him." (Acts xxii. 20.) God chiefly inspects the heart; and if the vote be passed there, writes the man guilty, though he stir no farther. It is easy to murder another by a silent wish or a passionate desire. In moral actions God values the will for the deed, and reckons the man a companion in the sin, who, though possibly he may never actually join in it, does yet inwardly applaud and like it.—Cave.

Oh that such as have for many years together sat under the ministry of the Gospel of Christ, and to this day are altogether strangers to this blessed union with Christ, would now, with all seriousness, apply themselves to know it experimentally: oh that they would, with holy Paul, account all things loss and dung for the excellency of the knowledge of Jesus Christ' (Phil. iii. 8.;) even this, that they may be 'found in him,' (ver. 9.) to know him with interest, to know him in this mysterious and beatifical union, Christ in them, and they in Christ.—Alas! this is the undoing mistake of thousands who are called Christians; they know somewhat of the history of Christ, they have some notions of a Christ in their heads, but this is the precipice upon which they ruin themselves, they think to be saved by a Christ without them; they hang upon the outside of the ark, they live upon bare notions: the Son of God took our nature upon him, died for our sins, rose again, and is gone up into heaven, and sits at God's right hand: and therefore conclude they shall be saved. Oh but what a fallacy do they put upon their own souls! (James i. 22.) Christ is the hope of salvation, it is true, but it is not simply Christ in our nature, not simply Christ on the cross, not Christ in the grave, no, not alone Christ on the throne, but, saith the apostle, 'Christ in you the hope of glory.' (Col. i. 27.)—It were an easy thing to be saved, if a Christ without us were all; and I know no reason why reprobate men and devils might not get to heaven on such terms. Christ must be in us by his Spirit; and we must be in Christ by faith, or else our persons and our hopes are both reprobate. (2 Cor. xiii. 5.) Appear before God's tribunal in the great day without this union, and plead what you will, your answer will be, 'I never knew you: depart from me.' (Matt. vii. 21—23; Luke xiii. 26, 27.)—Case's Mount Pisgah.

Sin in time of health, wears a very different aspect from what it does on a death bed.

As there is but one Heaven, so there is but one way to it; Christ, the living Way, wherein Christians walk by faith.

A person who can live in this world without suffering slander, must be too stupid or too insignificant to deserve attention.

FOR THE CHILDREN

THE LIE

A man who is now minister of the gospel, gave me the following account. I tell it to you in order to show what repentance is. 'I had one of the kindest and best of fathers; and when I was a little white-headed boy, about six years old, he used to carry me to school before him on his horse, to help me in my little plans, and always seemed trying to make me happy; and he never seemed so happy himself as when trying to make me happy. When I was six years old, he came home one day very sick. My mother, too, was sick; and thus nobody but my two sisters could take care of my father. In a few days he was worse, and all the physicians in the region were called to see him. The next Sabbath morning, early, he was evidently much worse. As I went into the room, he stretched out his hand to me, and said, 'My little boy, I am very sick. I wish you to take that paper on the stand, and run down to Mr. C.'s and get me the medicine written on that paper. I took the paper, and went to the apothecary's shop as I had often done before. It was about half a mile off; but when I got there, I found it shut; and as Mr. C. lived a quarter of a mile farther off, I concluded not to go to find him. I then set out for home. On my way back, I contrived what to say. I knew how wicked it was to tell a lie, but one sin always leads to another. On going in to my father, I saw that he was in great pain; and though pale and weak, I could see drops of sweat standing on his forehead, forced out by the pain. O, then I was sorry I had not gone and found the apothecary. At length he said to me, 'My son has got the medicine, I hope, for I am in great pain.' I hung my head and muttered, for my conscience smote me, 'No sir, Mr. Carter says he's got none!' 'Is this possible!' He then cast a keen eye upon me, and seeing my head hang, and probably suspecting my falsehood, said in the mildest, kindest tone, 'My little boy will see his father suffer great pain for want of that medicine!' I went out of the room and cried. I was soon called back. My brothers had come, and were standing—all the children were standing around his bed, and he was committing my poor mother to their care, and giving them his best advice. I was the youngest; and when he laid his hand on my head, and told me that in a few hours I should have no father; that he would in a day or two be buried up;—that I must now make God my father, love him, obey him, and always do right, and speak the truth, because the eye of God is always upon me—it seemed as if I should sink; and when he laid his hand on my head again and prayed for the blessing of God the Redeemer to rest upon me, 'soon to be a fatherless orphan,' I dared not look at him I felt so guilty. Sobbing, I rushed from his bedside and thought, I wished I could die. They soon told me he could not speak. Oh, how much would I have given to go in and tell him I had told a lie and ask him once more to lay his hand on my head and forgive me. I crept in once more and heard the minister pray for 'the dying man.' O how my heart ached! I snatched my hat and ran to the apothecary's house and got the medicine. I ran home with all my might, ran in, and ran up to my father's bedside to confess my sin, crying out, O, here father; but I was hushed; and then I saw he was pale, and that all the room were weeping. My dear father was dead! And the last thing I ever spoke to him was to tell him a lie!—I sobbed as if my heart would break; for his kindness, his tender looks, and my own sin, all rushed upon my mind. And as I gazed upon his cold, pale face, and saw his eyes shut, and his lips closed, could I help thinking of his last words, 'My little boy will see his father suffer great pain for the want of that medicine!' I could not know but he died for the want of it.

In a day or two he was put into the ground and buried up. There were several ministers at the funeral, and each spoke kindly to me, but could not comfort me—Alas! they knew not what a load of sorrow lay on my heart. They could not comfort me. My father was buried, and the children scattered abroad, for my mother was too feeble to take care of them.

It was twelve years after this, while in college, that I went alone to the grave of my father. It took me a good while to find it; but there it was, with its humble tomb-stone; and as I stood over it I seemed to be at his bed side, to see his pale face and hear his voice. O, the thought of that sin and wickedness cut me to the heart. It seemed that worlds would not be too much to give, could I then have called loud enough to have him hear me ask his forgiveness. But it was too late. He had been in the grave twelve years; and I must live and die, weeping over that ungrateful falsehood. May God forgive me!'—Todd's Lectures to Children.

FOR THE MINISTER

From the Christian Intelligencer.

Among the sermons of modern date which command attention of Christian ministers, a charge to Mr. Jones by Dr. McAll, on the experience of a Christian Pastor is peculiarly energetic, awakening, and solemn. As it is not probable that any of our brethren have seen it, I send you one extract from it for their perusal and edification.

MINIMUS.

DECAY OF PIETY IN THE MIND OF A MINISTER

Consider how great are the advantages afforded to your adversary from the many and peculiar temptations to which your office specially exposes you; all tending to undermine your principles, and endanger your fidelity. If you are successful, you will be tempted to pride; if disappointed, to murmuring. If the execution of your task be found easy, you will be assailed by criminal indolence or self-dependence; if connected with a sense of difficulty and inadequacy to its just fulfilment, to a remission of effort corresponding to the diminution of hope. If you are made the instrument of conveying to others a measure of spiritual blessings greater than you are conscious of in your personal experience, you will be open to the paralizing suggestion either that all is a delusion, or that you are a deceiver; if while exploring with interest the mysteries of Revelation, and bringing them forth successively, with all the vividness of their impression full upon you, they are found to fail of their effect upon others, you will find it hard to retain unabated the strength of your conviction with the meekness of your forbearance.—and the danger will continually be increased, lest your religious sensibilities at length should be exhausted, and come to partake in their turn, of the very sluggishness and languor against which they have maintained a fruitless conflict. The preservation of your mind in meekness purity, and readiness for spiritual action, while opposed and thwarted by a thousand counteracting influences, will often resemble the efforts of a dove, struggling to reach her nest, amid the rush of tempests and the career of eddying winds. With other men, such feelings may be casual and unfrequent; with you they may be expected to form the history of every day and hour. Others may be revived by quickening impulses, and the application of unwonted stimulus in views of truth and duty, new and unexpected, and pressed home powerfully by the voice of pastoral exhortation;—but what is to rekindle the wasted lamp of piety within your desolate bosom?—If the light that is in you be darkness, how great is that darkness!

"Should we, alas! suppose you to degenerate only into formality or secret unbelief; and that your efforts in the pulpit, though not remitted, or even sensibly abated of their fervor, should come to spring, not from the solemn sense of the things you utter, or the interests you are professedly aiming to secure;—that you should commit no flagrant inconsistency, but speak truth in the spirit of falsehood;—that you should be as a whited sepulchre, beautiful without but full of death within;—that your name should be preserved with no dishonor, but your principles sink every day into deeper and deadlier slumber, and your motives become tainted with a larger and more fatal infusion first of indifference, and next of hypocrisy;—your prayers more unfrequent—your interest in the salvation of souls more languid—your consciousness of responsibility more feeble—your watchfulness against temptation more inconsistent, and your resistance to the hidden apostacies and wanderings of the heart more irresolute, what could be paralleled with the misery of such a condition, either on earth or in hell? Every spring of sanctity and vigor drying up within you, and yet the symbol of official consecration not obliterated from your brow;—hope withering;—and yet the seared and shrivelled leaves of a profession once so distinguished, hanging thick about you:—the fragrance of your anointing wholly vanished and exhaled, and only its substance remaining, as it might minister an aliment to fiercer flames and deadlier anguish; you would present a spectacle to the world, and to angels, and to men, pre-eminent alike in guilt and wretchedness; enshrouded with darkest omens, and signs mysteriously prophetic of uttermost destruction. Where should we look for the victim so signally prepared for the slaughter, or adorned with chaplets of such portentous bloom!"

TO THE MEMBERS OF OUR CHURCHES WHO ARE LEAVING THEIR HOMES FOR SUMMER EXCURSIONS.

Permit us to offer you a few words of counsel before you leave us, in search of that recreation, which many of you need, and that repose from the fatigues of business, which we trust will invigorate and strengthen you. We have a few parting counsels to give, which, if you follow, and find beneficial, you can recommend them to others.

1. Take with you the word of God, and let no engagement of travel, or change of scene, prevent the daily perusal of some portion of that blessed book. It contains the charter of your salvation, and if you read it with confidence and prayer, it will prove a solace in the hour of sorrow, a friend in the time of need. The plan of selecting a passage of scripture in the morning, committing it to memory, and calling it up in your thoughts during the day, will serve many important ends. It will afford food for the mind, exercise for the feelings, and so engage the heart, if well applied, as to save you from many of the injurious influences by which you may be surrounded. Guard against a hurried, careless perusal of the Holy Book. If you wish to be attracted by its beauty, awed by its sublimity, and imbued with its spirit, you must dig into its precious stores, & bring forth the rich treasures which they contain.

2. Forget not your private devotions.—Fidelity here may be attended with some difficulty, but if you love to hold intercouse with God; if you "make your boast in him;" if your fellowship be with the Father, and with his Son Jesus Christ; you will surmount the hindrances that may cover your path, and, "give thanks at the remembrance of his holiness." You will remember God upon your bed, and meditate on him in the night watches. Early will you seek him. Every day will you bless him, and though sometimes you may be barred the privilege of entering your closet and shutting the door, still you may lift your heart to Him who reads the breathing thought, and is ever ready to communicate the treasures of his grace.

3. Maintain your Christian character.—Feel your responsibility. Recreation must be viewed in the light of duty. The claims of God on our allegiance, affection, and homage, are never suspended. There is no portion of our time but for which we must give account; and we might expect that when business is laid aside, and family cares dismissed, and we have the entire control of our time, that we should find more opportunities than usual for the services of religion. But this is seldom realized in summer travel. It requires great self-knowledge, and self-control, deep reflection and constant watchfulness, a spirit of earnest prayer, united with the habit of making surrounding objects minister to our mental and spiritual improvement, to guard against the dangers which the suspension of business, and an entire change of scene, are apt to throw around us. Walk worthy of your vocation,

4. Avoid those exercises which dissipate and deprave the thoughts.—We know that in some of our summer retreats there are many temptations. See that your amusements and those of your children, be rational and innocent. Scrutinize the books you read, circles in which you move, the places of pleasure to which you are invited, and close your ear to every charmer that would seduce you from the path of purity and virtue. If you expect being stationary at the shore or springs, take with you a supply of moral or intellectual food for your company, and a little to spare, that you may give to him that needeth.

5. Keep holy the Sabbath-day, and attend to the ministrations of God's house.—Go not in search of novelties—Venture not into those where your Divine Master is avowedly degraded to the level of a man, and shorn of the glory which belongs to him as God; and as the Sabbath is an improper day, and a house professedly opened for the worship of Almighty God, an improper place in which to indulge the taste for fine music, fine painting, or strange scenes of any kind, so would we urge upon you to guard against the foolish and injurious curiosity, which so often induces individuals, when in strange places, to seek houses of worship rather with a view to hear errors in doctrine, and see superstition in practice, than to glorify God, and receive his blessing.

6. Strive to do good.—Take along with you a bundle of Tracts for distribution, and thus you may spread tidings of joy, and leave behind you precious seed that shall germinate, and grow, and flourish when you are far away. "Let your light shine before men." "In the morning sow thy seed, in the evening withhold not thine hand."—"Whatsoever thy hand findeth to do, do it with thy might; for there is no work, nor device, nor knowledge, in the grave whither thou goest." Go then in a spirit of thankfulness and prayer, and may the God of grace bless, preserve, and keep you, and bring you back in safety and peace.—Episcopal Recorder.

REVIVALS.

The effusions of the Holy Spirit are still enjoyed in many parts of the United States, though, perhaps not to so great an extent as during a few months past. It should be a subject of devout and constant prayer by all christians, that the blessed work of revival may continue to spread till every branch of the Zion of God shall be resuscitated, and sinners saved. This is called for by other considerations than the up-building of the different denominations, as such. The welfare of the whole community demands it. The church of Christ as a whole, has many obstacles to contend against. In addition to the apathy of her own members and the influence of party bickerings which surround and agitate her, the strife of party politics is calculated to turn off the attention of her members from the objects of their high calling. Perhaps in no case has the lines of party politics been more closely drawn, than in the present campaign. The waters are every where moved, even troubled—poisoned—and what but religion, pure, undefiled religion, can preserve the church from defilement and ruin in such a time as the present. We are of opinion that the spirit of revival which has so happily prevailed to a great extent, has tended in a great measure to check the extravagance of politicians—and an increasing degree of piety is still necessary to hold in check the passions of our fellow-men.

We do not wish to intimate that church members have no duty to perform at the polls, as citizens and patriots. They have an important duty to perform. But let that duty be done conscientiously and deliberately, with single-heartedness to God, and the interests of religion instead of suffering during the coming canvass, will be promoted, and revivals will be multiplied through our whole country.

If government is a divine institution, then christians in the exercise of the elective franchise should have as much reference to the glory of God, as in any other act. When this principle is unreservedly cherished and acted upon, the people of this country may be said to appreciate the benefits which a form of government, like ours, is destined to confer on its citizens and the world, and not before.

WORLD'S CONVENTION.

By the Britannia Steam Ship arrived at Boston, via. Halifax, an account of the organization of the World's Convention, which assembled in London, (Eng.,) has been received. Delegates from various parts of the United Kingdom, from the Continent, and the United States of America were in attendance. A short time before the hour for the organization arrived, Mr. W. T. Blair, of Bath, (Eng.) called the attention of the meeting, and suggested that in consequence of the great age and infirmities of the venerable Thomas Clarkson who would take the chair, and the unhappy effect which excitement might have upon him, that they should receive him without any demonstrations of applause, in silence, and standing, which was acquiesced in. Mr. Clarkson was unanimously elected to the chair, and after a short address in which he stated himself to be the only surviving member of the committee which was instituted in England, in 1787, for the abolition of the slave trade, and expressed his continued interest in the cause of emancipation; he briefly mentioned the great objects before the Convention, and the measures necessary to effect them, and invoking the divine blessing on their labors, retired at an early hour. On his retiring, Mr. Blair of Bath was called to the chair. Of six Secretaries, two were from the United States, viz: Mr. Stanton, of New York, and Mr. Phillips, of Boston. Mr. O'Connell made a spirited address to the Convention, urging them not to disperse without "accomplishing something that should have a permanent effect in forwarding the great object of Negro Emancipation." Mr. Fuller, from the State of New York, said he believed that Mr. O'Connell could do more to emancipate the slaves of America, than the Convention could do, by issuing an address to his Irish brethren in America. Mr. O'Connell was understood to say that before the Convention adjourned, he would submit such an address. Henry Beckford, an emancipated negro from Jamaica, addressed the Convention. After a lengthy and animated discussion, respecting the admission of female delegates to the Convention, to sit, speak and vote, as members of that body, it was decided that they could not be admitted to take part in the proceedings of the Convention. They were rejected on the ground that it was opposed to the national habits of the English to admit ladies, as members of a public deliberative assembly. We may give some further particulars of the proceedings of this body at a future time if anything of interest should transpire, as the subject has excited so much interest in the minds of the people in this country.

The article on "Camp-meetings" in another column, will doubtless be read with interest by many, and might possibly produce some unpleasant feelings in the minds of those who believe in the utility and propriety of these meetings, were it not distinctly stated, that the remarks of the author apply to Camp-meetings in the Northern States, and not to the policy of any particular denomination of Christians in conducting them. From an intimate acquaintance with the writer of the article, and a free interchange of thought on that subject, we are satisfied that his object in the communication is to do good, instead of raising an opposition to any measure which might tend to the advancement of the Redeemer's kingdom. In admitting the article to our columns, we are not to be understood as endorsing the views of its author, much less, as wishing to impugn the sincerity or discernment of those who advocate "Camp-meetings." Yet the question of their general utility might be profitably discussed, provided that discussion were conducted temperately, with good feeling, and a desire to elicit truth. It is to be taken for granted that all good Christians desire the advancement of the cause of truth, and that in the use of the best means; and that every lover of Christ will be willing to abandon his present or former policy, provided his brother can show him a more excellent way.

The Rev. George T. Simmons has been driven from the city of Mobile, Alabama, for preaching on the subject of slavery. It would not be surprising if this circumstance should do more to advance anti-Slavery sentiments in Alabama, than could have been done by his remaining there. The news of the manner in which he was compelled to leave the state, will of course be a subject of general remark there; and good men will see the workings of the system and the spirit of slavery, in a light which will lead them to pass upon both a sentence of the most unqualified condemnation. Verily the friends of the "ancient and patriarchal Institution" are brought into a serious dilemma! If they tolerate the liberty of speech, it is bad for their system—if they resort to summary and tyrannical measures, it is worse, and threatens the speedier demolition of their fabric, which has neither justice nor equity for its basis. The restoration to liberty of the captive, is as certain as the work of benevolence shall be successful, or the promise of God fulfilled.

IMPORTANT RENUNCIATIONS.—It is stated that Rev. M. H. Smith, late pastor of the Universalist society in Salem, Mass., has renounced his former sentiments and united with the Congregationalists in that vicinity. Mr. Smith is said to have been a prominent man in that denomination. He is expected to publish his reasons for his change of views.

In addition to the above, we see by an article in the New York Evangelist, the Rev. Mr. Whittaker, Pastor of the Universalist congregation in Duane Street, (N. Y.,) has given notice to his congregation that he can no longer advocate a doctrine which has no tendency to promote practical piety in its hearers. Mr. W. claims to have arrived at this conclusion, after a deep and thorough investigation of the claims and effects of Universalism, and thinks he has been led by the spirit of God to the conclusion that the scriptures teach no such doctrine, but that it is a "cunningly devised fable," "calculated to harden the heart, darken the mind, and induce mankind to wander from the paths of righteousness and peace." His address to his flock is very pathetic, though brief and simple.—May all Universalists examine this subject with care, and in the spirit of supplication, that God would direct them into all truth; then, if Mr. W. is not mistaken, they would arrive at the same conclusion.

It will be remembered that the Seventh-day Baptist General Conference, commences its session at the Meeting House of the First S. D. B. Church, in Hopkinton, R. I., on the fourth day of the week, before the second Sabbath in September. The Missionary Society will commence its session on the first day of the week, previous to the commencement of the Conference.—There are a number of other Societies whose anniversaries are to take place during the same week. It is desirable that every delegate should attend promptly and seasonably, and it is particularly desirable, that throughout the whole denomination there should be constant and devout prayer, that the blessing of God may attend the labors and decisions of that body at its coming session.

The House of Assembly, of Rhode Island, have decided not to have its sessions opened with prayer, upon the alleged ground,

1st. That it would do violence to the Constitution—as well as,

2d. To the consciences of some of its members,—besides,

3d. Being a union of church and state.

Now we ask permission to suggest as a remedy for this difficulty,

1st. To alter the Constitution so as to admit of prayer in that body. OR,

2d. That members be elected in future, possessed of consciences not likely to sustain injury by prayer. OR,

3d. To disprove the statement of Dr. Franklin: That "If a sparrow cannot fall without the notice of God: an empire cannot rise without his aid."

Olive Branch.—The first number of the fifth volume of this paper has reached us in an enlarged form, and an entire new dress. The mechanical execution is excellent. We wish the publisher a patronage fully adequate to sustain him.

CAMP-MEETINGS.

It is with pain that I employ my pen, even for a single moment, to censure in the least degree, any efforts of the friends of the Redeemer which are designed to promote the piety of his disciples, and to lead wandering sinners to his cross. That both of these desirable results often attend those continuous and thronged religious convocations which are convened in the sylvan retreat, I am ready to admit, yea more—I will suppose that they always do. But however it may be at the South, where commodious houses of public worship are not as frequent as they are here, and the means of religious instruction are not as abundant, and the population is comparatively sparse, and where the Camp-meeting grounds are arranged for permanency of use for successive years; I am inclined to the belief that in New England and New York, those sections of our country where I have personally observed the influence of Camp-meetings, their ill results far overbalance the good which they accomplish.

As some of the reasons for entertaining this opinion, I will specify the following:

1. At these meetings more than any other, those powerful excitements are experienced, which those who are the subjects of them, consider as the special and sanctifying operations of the Holy Spirit, but which the unbiased and intelligent understand to be the overaction of the nervous system. I refer to those instances where the whole frame becomes relaxed, and the individual falls apparently lifeless. Now this is not a pretence; a powerful influence is really felt—the influence of a nervous paroxysm on the human constitution. The one who supposes himself "blessed" with it, but as I should say, suffers under it—sincerely attributes it to the work of the Spirit. He does not intend any deception. But some may harshly judge that he does, and such minds receive injury. Those also who regard these effects as the productions of supernatural influence, are injured; for they desire and expect to experience them, and every facility is at hand to secure them from disappointment. But it is another class chiefly who suffer. I allude to those who are disposed to doubt the reality of experimental religion, and who do not have confidence in the agency of the Holy Spirit in the regeneration of the sinner, and in the advancement of the sanctification of the renewed. Such are tempted to say: "this shows to us that religion is all a farce." All revival influences, though ever so genuine, they are ready to class with "this having the power." Thus they are confirmed in infidelity. Also, many look on with amazement, and though they cannot exactly determine what all this means, yet they yield to the impression that if they ever fully "enjoy religion," they must have something like this; thus they are prepared to seize on false hopes, and to be led astray by a thousand false impressions.

2. The boisterous rudeness to which a Camp-meeting gives occasion among the impenitent, is another of its effects. "Hurrah for the Camp-meeting!" is the spirit of hundreds. This spirit they exhibit as they pass to the meeting and from it, and sometimes on the borders of the Camp-ground itself. The noise which they hear from the meeting, joined with the idea that they are "out in the woods," excites within them a determination to make a noise in their way. Hence it often occurs, that young men who will behave decently at a ball, and keep sober at an old fashioned Fourth-of-July celebration, will become excessively rude at a Camp-meeting. For this they are culpable; but still the fact cannot be concealed, that they are strongly excited to this conduct, by the excitements which they witness.

3. The fact that females of loose character, take special care to be present at Camp-meetings, day and night, needs simply to be stated; and I conclude that no friend of "moral reform" will press me farther for reasons why I disapprove of these meetings. The presence of persons of this character, and the assurance felt previously among libertines that they will be present, and the location of the meeting, together with some other circumstances not necessary now to mention, must be taken into view collectively, that a right estimate may be made of this part of my argument.

I will name one other reason.

4. The desecration of the Sabbath which the Camp-meeting directly occasions.

Notice is sometimes sent to a number of congregations, that the Camp-meeting which will be holden at a certain place, and commence at a specified time, "will continue over the Sabbath!"

From motives of curiosity, many youth, and others of more experience too, will be drawn from their stated places of worship, and from the instruction of their pastors, and from their places as teachers or pupils in the Sabbath School. Great numbers will, on that Sabbath, attend the meeting from the distance of from 5 to 15 or 20 miles, for the sake of the ride. If their thoughtful friends remonstrate, O, they are going to the meeting! and this plea is a salvo to conscience, while they spend the day in riding and other amusements. Such scenes pain every pious heart. It must be borne in mind that those who are intensely engaged in the exercises of the meeting, do not know of the Sabbath desecration that distresses the sober minded of that vicinity, who are so circumstanced that they cannot avoid seeing it. Those brethren who sustain Camp-meetings, do it that the kingdom of Christ may be promoted. If they see that on the whole the opposite kingdom is advanced by these meetings, they certainly will abandon them. I publicly ask them to determine that they shall not be continued over the Sabbath. I make this request in behalf of the cause of morality and religion. I have expressed myself freely, and will hold myself pledged to reply to any strictures upon this article, which may come under my observation, if they are candidly written and are accompanied with the real name of the writer. I have written under the impression that it generally requires many months of arduous toil, to recover a community in Western New York from the demoralizing influences of a Camp-meeting. If I can be relieved from this unpleasant reflection, that friend, or those friends who will aid in the work, shall receive my warmest gratitude. J. R. JOHNSON,

CONTENTMENT.

Contentment is that state of mind in the possession of which, a person is easy in any circumstance or condition when it is not in his power to effect a change in his fortune. It produces happiness when all other sources fail, and it always yields a great amount of pure enjoyment. Without it, riches are a burden—society becomes irksome, and every prospect of happiness in this world becomes futile. With it, every thing is easy—wealth proves truly a blessing, and the associations of life produce a high gratification. It brings peace in affliction, and happiness to the cottage of the indigent.—It does not produce sloth among mankind, neither does it produce that easiness or satisfaction which makes a person sit down in penury and dream his life away, without making any exertion to improve his condition. Contentment is not a being of the fancy which roams in the regions of space, and fixes his throne in the poet's brain. It does not reside in the palaces of kings, nor take its abode in the camp of the conqueror. It seeks not high stations; nor is it found in the crowds of cities. But it is a reality, it is natural wealth—a rich treasure. It is a jewel that is found in the vale, in the highlands, in the desert, and in the fruitful country. It is a treasure that all who desire it, may possess. The rich can purchase it, the poor can obtain it, and the humble are sure to find it. It costs nothing but the erection of a mansion for its reception, and the cultivation of an affection for its company. In a word, it is that spirit of the mind which makes us satisfied in prosperity and adversity, and which gives us mildness of temper under provocations, and composure in affliction. P.

INTELLIGENCE.

FOREIGN.

From the N. York Spectator.

BRITISH QUEEN—TWENTY-SIX DAYS LATER FROM ENGLAND.

The Steam-ship British Queen, Captain Roberts, arrived this morning from London, via Portsmouth, after a passage of sixteen days and twelve hours.

Our London papers are to the first of July, and Liverpool to the 30th of June, both inclusive. We are indebted to Henry Smith, Esq., one of the agents of the 'Queen,' and who returned in her, for files of English papers to the latest dates.

While we have had warm weather in this city, and generally very light winds, we are informed by a passenger that this noble ship has performed the passage against a continued succession of strong head-winds and sea, without any intermission—such weather as is very unusual at this season of the year. By reference to the log it will be seen that her steaming has been very uniform, furnishing incontestible proof of her superior qualities.

The steam-ship President was nearly ready, and was to make her trial trip on the 12th of July, and would positively sail from Liverpool on the 1st of August for New York. She is the chef d'œuvre of naval architecture, and altogether a magnificent vessel.

ATTEMPT TO ASSASSINATE THE QUEEN AND PRINCE ALBERT.

An attempt was made to assassinate the Queen and Prince Albert on the 10th, by a young man named Oxford. He took his stand on Constitution Hill, up which the Queen's carriage passed, on its way to Hyde Park, and as it came abreast of him fired deliberately twice, the first time at the Prince and the second at the Queen—neither of the balls taking effect. He was immediately seized, and committed for trial on the charge of high treason. Papers of a treasonable character were found at his lodgings, indicating the existence of a secret society under the name of "Young England," the objects and purposes of which were supposed to be of a most nefarious character. His trial was to take place on the 9th of July.

Courvoisier, the valet of Lord William Russell, was found guilty of his lordship's murder, and afterward made a full confession of the fact.

Ministers were victorious on Lord Stanley's Irish registration bill, June 19th, an essential amendment moved by Lord Morpeth having been carried by a majority of seven. Subsequently, however, ministers were defeated on another amendment by a majority of 4, and the bill was going slowly through committee, in the face of the most determined opposition. At the date of our latest paper it was still in committee, considerably modified, however, in its progress.

The king of Prussia actually died on the 7th of June.

The Canada government bill was read a third time in the House of Commons on the 12th of June. It seems to have met with little opposition. It had its second reading in the House of Lords on the 30th of June, although strenuously opposed by the Duke of Wellington, Lord Gosford, Lord Brougham and others.

The papers of course teem with addresses to the Queen and her husband, from Parliament, and all sorts of public bodies, lay and clerical, on their happy escape.—The impression seems to be that Oxford is insane.

June 22.

Mr. F. Kelly obtained leave to bring in a bill for abolishing the punishment of death except for murder and high treason. Lord John Russell did not oppose it, but said he would not pledge himself to support the bill in all its stages.

The clergy reserve bill had not yet passed the House of Commons. Lord John Russell was to move on Monday, June 30, to go into committee on the bill, when he said he should propose an important alteration; but on Monday he postponed his motion to Thursday or Friday, and did not state what the alteration was to be.

The "interesting situation" of Queen Victoria appears to be no longer a question. The official Globe alludes to it with becoming reverence, as an authenticated fact, in speaking of the attempt to shoot her Majesty.

FOREIGN FLOUR.

The bill authorizing the importation of foreign Flour into Ireland was rejected 90 to 79.

ALGIERS.

The London Morning Herald of July 1, gives the following as the substance of the latest advices from Algiers:

The despatches are satisfactory, inasmuch as they stop the accumulation of sinister rumors which were propagated on Saturday and Sunday at Paris, relative to the Algerine colony. Though the whole of these reports, which then went so far as to destroy half the French army, and to leave Marshall Vallee a prisoner in the hands of Abd-el-Kader, are not true, yet there is too much reason to believe that African affairs wear a very bad aspect, and that the rear-guard of the marshal's army has been cut to pieces, and all the crops in the neighborhood of Algiers destroyed by fire. The misfortune which has occurred to the rear-guard has taken place on the southern side of the Col de Teniah, where the French had, after the capture of Medeath, to sustain a similar struggle, and where General Berthenceze, in 1831, sustained a severe defeat.

It appears that Marshal Vallee imagined that he had blocked up the army of the Emir, but he unexpectedly found several of the mountain passes in the hands of the enemy. In order to avoid fighting at a disadvantage, the marshal thought proper to change his ground, and decamping in the middle of the night succeeded in withdrawing the bulk of his force without alarming the Arab host. The rear-guard, composed of 800 men, was not so lucky, and the moment it had cleared the summit of the Col. and had begun to descend the fastnesses of the mountain in the direction of Medeah, it was assailed by a corps of 2,000 Arabs, who fell on it with equal audacity and fury. The Arabs and the French fought hand to hand, the bayonet proving a weak defense against the fierce stabs of the yatachan. In vain the French soldiers tried to form solid masses, and repulse by discipline the wild attacks of their assailants.

The Arabs got between the files, overpowering and slaying every thing before them. The French valor at length prevailed, and the little corps was enabled to present a solid front to its enemy. The Arabs attacked three times, but were each time repulsed. The French then got two mountain guns to act, which kept the foe at a more respectful distance, and finally the rear-guard joined the main body, after sustaining a loss of 140 dead and 300 wounded; in fact, half its number. The marshal is severely censured for not coming to the relief of his rear-guard, as the firing was heard distinctly at his head quarters. He alleges, as an excuse, that he had taken every precaution against the Arabs, and that he supposed the firing proceeded not from any serious attack, but from that useless love of display which is consequent on mountain warfare. These excuses will not serve his turn at Paris, where his conduct is loudly condemned by all classes. In addition to this military disaster, the colonists have again severely suffered in the vicinity of Algiers, and a party of Arab marauders have again appeared in the plain, burning the crops on the ground, and carrying off any property they can lay hands on.

A large meeting of merchants, manufacturers and traders was held at Birmingham, June 29, to consider the present depressed state of trade, and the means of remedy, at which the following resolutions, &c. were adopted:

DEPLORABLE STATE OF TRADE AT BIRMINGHAM.

BIRMINGHAM, Tuesday.

A meeting of the merchants and manufacturers of this town was held yesterday evening at the Town-hall, to take into consideration the present unexampled and depressed state of trade here, and to adopt such remedial measures as might be suggested and agreed upon, James James, Esq. was in the chair.

The following were the resolutions agreed upon

"1. That, under existing circumstances, the amount of the circulating medium is mainly determined by the amount of the issues of paper by the Bank of England.

2. That experience furnishes decisive proof that, with an amount of Bank of England notes in circulation of about twenty two millions sterling, the productive classes can be fully employed, and the vast mercantile operations of the country be conducted with ease and safety, taxation made productive, and be cheerfully borne by the people; but, on the contrary, that when the issues of that establisment are in course of material contradiction, a scene of ruin and distress ensues of such a direful character, as to threaten even the subversion of society.

3. That the same experience shows that the Bank of England cannot at all times keep a sufficient amount of its notes in circulation while it is compelled to supply gold for exportation for commercial or specultive purposes; that the exportation of gold may be occasionally necessary and beneficial, and may occur while the general balance of trade is in favor of the country; and, therefore, that the obligation imposed on the Bank to contract its issues for the purpose of stopping such exportation, is highly impolitic, and most injurious in its operation; deranging the trade of the country and of the world, and placing the entire community at the mercy of circumstances otherwise not of the slightest possible importance.

4. That the resources of the country are great, affording ample means for the supply of a safe and efficient currency; that under such a currency its immense transactions may be conducted with ease and security; and that, therefore, whenever the directors of the Bank are called upon to contract its issues below the sum of twenty millions sterling, it becomes the duty of Government to provide the Bank, pro tempore, with an adequate substitute for its notes, or for gold, in the shape of government notes, to be issued by the Bank (on demand) in payment of its own notes, and be reissued from time to time, if required, as often as returned for taxes or other payments, so that the aggregate amount of Bank and Government notes in circulation shall not at any time fall below the sum of twenty millions sterling.

5. That the business of the country cannot be conducted without the aid of the private and joint-stock banks, and that depriving them of the right of issuing notes under proper ragulations will increase the embarrassments of the community at large, but more especially of the agricultural classes, and will tend very materially to reduce the current income of government.

6. That this meeting earnestly disavows any wish or intention to promote the interests of any one part of the community to the injury of another, its only object being the just protection both of property and labor and the general good of all classes.

7. That the following gentlemen, viz. the chairman, secretaries, and treasurer; T. Bolton, Chas. Shaw, W. Chance, P. Muntz, H. Van Wart, Esquires, Messrs. William Matthews, T. C. Salt, F. W. Harrold, and S. A. Goddard, be appointed a committe, for the purpose of communicating with the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the Right Hon. Sir Robert Peel, and such other Members of Parliament as they may see fit, and generally to take such steps as they think proper to promote the above or any other measure, which shall render it obligatory upon the Government to exercise its power when requisite to supply any efficient and adequate currency.

8. That the committees do immediately communicate these resolutions to the large landed proprietors in this and adjoining counties, and the proper parties in Liverpool, Manchester, Glasgow, Sheffield, and other large commercial and manufacturing towns, and request their active co-operation in carrying the same into effect, and farther, that they be instructed to prepare petitions to both Houses of Parliament, embodying these resolutions, to be presented at such time as they may think proper, and that the members of the borough and the county be requested to support the same.

9. Resolved, That a subsubscription be opened for the purpose of effecting the objects of these resolutions; that Mr. Charles Geach be appointed treasurer, and Mr. S. Buckley secretary; and that landed propietors, gentlemen, professional men, bankers, merchants, manufacurers, tradesmen, and all disposed to contribute to the said object, be and are hereby respectfully requested to transmit their subscriptions to their respective bankers, for account of the treasurer.

A notice has been issued from the Birmingham Branch Bank to the following effect:—

"Notice is hereby given that in consequence of difficulties which have arisen in connection with the London agency of this establishment, and which will be most satisfactorily explained to the shareholders, the bank has been compelled to suspend its operations for a few days, until proper arrangements are made for the payment of its notes and the resumption of its general transactions.

"ALEXANDER GRAHAM,
"Manager of the Birmingham Branch.

SUMMARY.

A Methodist meeting house was destroyed at Shrewsbury, York Co., Pa., on the 8th inst., in a violent storm which occurred there and which threw the inhabitants into consternation and horror. Several houses were destroyed—many unroofed—several families were buried under the roof of one building, all of whom were more or less injured, and one killed. One horse was also killed. This was in the night which added to the horrors of the scene.

It is said there are a number of unworthy and dissolute persons in Texas, who are trying to pass themselves off as Baptist ministers.

There has been licensed in Boston, this season, fifty taverns, seventy-five victualling houses, and one hundred and eighty-two retailers of intoxicating drinks.

Liberal.—More than sixteen hundred dollars is said to have been contributed by the members of the Rev. Dr. Hawes Congregation, in Hartford, (Conn.,) within the last few days. This is an extra collection and not expected to interfere with the annual contribution during the coming autumn, and is therefore very liberal, especially in such hard times. They seem to remember that money is necessary to carry forward benevolent enterprises in hard times, as well as in seasons of prosperity. Many professors avail themselves of the hardships of the times, for the purpose of inventing excuses for their stated support of the institutions of the day.

Large Ship.—The Trafalgar of 120 guns, the largest ship in the British Navy, is soon to be launched from Woolwich dock yard. Her construction is different from any ship. Her stern is circular, on which to mount fighting guns. Her burden 3000 tons.

Wheat which grows to the height of 3 feet nine inches, has been discovered in a wild state, in Refugio co., Texas, on the waters of Mission Bay. A kind of wild oats has also been discovered in the same country.

Capt. Ross, the Arctic navigator, obtained soundings in the middle of the Atlantic, with a line 2,000 fathoms or about 3 miles in length. This is supposed to be the greatest depth ever reached by a sounding line.

Treasury Law.—The payments at the Custom House are required to be made one-fourth in specie, and three-fourths in its equivalent, or Treasury notes.

Post Notes of the denomination of $50 have been issued by the Secretary of the Treasury, and are circulated in New York and elsewhere.

The President of the U. S., has signified to Congress the necessity of issuing Treasury notes to the amount of nine and a half millions of dollars.

Louisiana Election.—Complete returns have been received from the 1st and 2d districts. In the 1st, E. D. White, (Whig,) is elected by a majority of 2045 votes. In the 2nd, Dawson, (Adm.,) by a majority of 13 votes. In the 3d, both parties are sanguine that they have elected their respective candidates, though returns thus far are quite partial.

Hon. Mr. Pringle, collector of the port of Charleston, (S. C.,) died a few days since. He had discharged the duties of that office for more than twenty years, to general satisfaction.

From four to five thousand persons are said to have left Pittsburgh, Pa., within a year past for want of employment.

FROM BUENOS AYRES AND MONTEVIDEO.

By the barque Caledonia, at Salem, we have our files of the Buenos Ayres British Packet to the 20th of May. The blockade still continued; up to the 20th, it had continued 785 days.

An issue of copper coinage of the value of two rials each, was made at Buenos Ayres on the 1st of May.

A despatch from Col. Compose to Gen. Echague, dated Victoria, 7th of May, states that on the previous day he gained a victory over 150 of Gen. Lavalle's (invading army, killing 30, including three officers, and taking 4 prisoners. The defeated force was commanded by Santiago Orono.

The exchange of ratifications of the Treaty between England and the Argentine Confederation for the abolition of the slave trade, took place at Buenos Ayres, May 16th.

It appears that the imports into Buenos Ayres during the year 1839, were in value 20,728,845 dollars 6 rials currency, and 173,670 dollars 6 rials in specie. The exports in the same period were in value 8,591,058 dollars 7 rials currency, and 75,173 dollars 4 rials in specie, and that the duties on these imports and exports have amonted to nearly two millions of dollars currency, and this at a time too when the ports of the Province of Buenos Ayres have been in a state of strict blockade.—New-York Express.

Joseph Bonaparte.—The National Gazette furnishes the following intelligence of this illustrious man:

We regret to learn that the Count de Survilliers (Joseph Napoleon, ex-king of Spain) was dangerously ill, although hopes were entertained of his recovery. No one has been permitted to see the Count except on two occasions, Prince Louis Napoleon, his nephew, who is unremitting in his inquiries and has sent his own private physician to be in attendance at the Count's residence. There seems to be no doubt in the minds of the medical attendants that the recent events in France respecting the ashes of Napoleon, coupled with the continued proscription of the entire family, of which the Count is the head, and the unaccountable error of Gen. Bartrand in disposing of the arms of the late Emperor contrary to the intention of that sovereign and the wishes of Joseph, have had the effect of producing this sudden and alarming indisposition.—So says the London papers.

Drought.—The N. H. Courier says never since the settlement of Concord, has there been so pinching a drought as is now felt in this place and in this part of the State. Every thing feels it and droops beneath its power. Rye, wheat and oats are well nigh ruined, while grass is burning in the fields almost to a crisp. Corn, too, suffers greatly. Indeed every thing suffers for the want of rain.

The Drought again.—Our own vicinity seems to have been unusually denied the great blessing of reviving showers of rain, which seem to have so copiously fallen in other places. While the southern part of our county has been drenched with powerful rains, the earth in this region has lain parched snd dry, and most of the crops have suffered for the want of it. For a number of weeks we have had no rain that has penetrated the earth, until Friday. A heavy shower came over this village and extended itself over this region generally; the rain fell in great abundance, since which time the earth has seemed to wear a different aspect. The shower was attended with violent thunder and lightning; one house in this village was struck; and a tree also in front of another house; but no particular injury sustained by any person in consequence thereof.—Amsterdam Intel.

The Burning Mountain.—This coal mine, which we have frequently noticed, and which took fire about eighteen months since, continues burning with renewed force.—There are now three distinct craters, varying in diameter from thirty to seventy five feet, and each at a depth of from 15 to 20 feet below the surface. The heat from the craters is extremely intense, from which issues immense volumes of smoke, and the smell of sulphur is any thing but ageeable. The rumbling noise would make a visitor think of earthquakes, and his examination would consequently be made with a very careful step. The vegetation for a great distance round has been completely destroyed; and its seared appearance gives a desolate, and adds to the terrific character of the work of destruction. We cannot conjecture when the fire will stop, or how it may be quenched by the management of the proprietors; but it is an extraordinary phenomenon, and as such is well worth a visit from the scientific and curious.—Pottsville Emporium.

Forgery.—A German Jew by the name of M. PROLER, who has been doing business as a blacking-maker, embarked last week for Hamburgh, and when outside of the Hook, sent back a letter to his creditors, saying that he carried off $100,000 of their money. The secret of his wealth leaked out yesterday, when Mr. J. Hallet, of McDougal street, and Mr. Ross, of Maiden Lane, deposed at the Police Office, that they had discounted notes for Proler, to which the signatures were forged. The rascal will in all probability effect his escape.—N. Y. American.

Hydrophobia.—It is stated in the Centreville, Md. Sentinel, of Friday last, that Mr. Edward W. Price, while walking over his farm in Spaniard's Neck, on Thursday morning, and while in the act of getting over the fence, was seized by a cat, supposed to be rabid, and considerably lacerated above the knee, before he could disengage himself from it. He immediately had the parts cut out by Dr. R. Goldsborough, Sen'r. Several rabid dogs have been killed in and about that neighborhood recently, and others said to have been bitten, are at large, to the imminent danger of the citizens.

Patrick Henry.—When the celebrated Patrick Henry of Virginia, was near the close of life and in feeble health, he laid his hand on the Bible, and addressing an old friend, who was with him 'Here is a book,' said he, 'worth more than all others ever printed; yet it is my misfortune never to have read it with proper attention and feeling till lately!' About the same time he wrote his daughter, 'I hear it is said the Deists have claimed me! The thought gives me far more pain than the appellation of Tory!—For I consider religion of infinitely higher importance than politics; and I find much cause to reproach myself that I have lived so long and given no decided and public proof of my being a Christian.'

Extract from a letter received by a gentleman in this city, dated

MADEIRA, June 2d.

Hurricane in Madeira.—On the 22d and 24th ultimo, the south side of the Island, and more particularly the neighborhood of the town, was visited by a violent hurricane from the northeast, which has caused considerable damage to houses, trees, &c.—An immense number of cottages have lost their roofs entirely, and tiles were flying about like hail stones in the streets of the city. The destruction amongst the trees corridors, satadas, etc., is deplorable, and the injury done in the vineyards must cause the common vintage to fall much short of what was anticipated.—Phil. Gaz.

Congress adjourned on the 21st inst., after a very proctracted session; yet, perhaps some think the public business has not been done.

Notice.

The South-Western S. D. Baptist Association will hold its second annual session with the church in New Salem, Harrison Co., Va., commencing on the fifth day of the week before the fourth Sabbath in August next. A full delegation, and punctual attendance is requested.

THE ROYAL FESTIVAL.

BY MRS. E. J. EAMES.

The Emperor Louis of Germany having banished his brother, Prince Rudolph, from the Empire, the unfortunate man fled to England, where he died in poverty and neglect. During a season of festivity, the Exile's child returned privately, and presented himself before Louis in the garb of a suppliant and mourner.

In the palace-halls of Heidelberg a Royal Feast was spread,
And from sparkling cups of sculptured gold the wine flowed rich and red;
Bright clustering roses wreathed each shaft of the marble colonnades,
And soft lamps shed a glittering glow through the silvery-green arcades;
Gay banners from the painted walls in 'broidered folds waved free
To the thrilling sounds of harp and horn, and the cymbal's minstrelsy.

But a sudden pause in the dancers' ring—the vial's chords are stilled;
The festal bowl so lately drained is left uncrowned—unfilled;
Bright, lovely cheeks with tears are wet—the noblest brows are flushed,
And o'er that haughty monarch's face the burning blood has rushed;
Leader and prince and gallant knight in silent awe make place
For a fair-haired boy in sables clad, who craves the royal grace.

What was there in the pale, pale cheek—the blue eye, sad and dim—
The faint, sweet voice—that caused the King to shake in every limb?
'Twas the look and music-tone of her who had been his boyhood's star—
'Twas the noble form and brow of him whom he had banished far—
'Twas that outcast brother's orphan who stood before him now
In the strength of injured innocence, the eloquence of wo!

He took the pale child in his arms and bathed his head with tears—
Oh, that hour was mighty to atone for the wrongs of buried years!—
No more, I ween, that fair boy roamed from his ancestral halls,
While louder rang the peals of mirth along the bannered walls,
And costlier was the banquet spread, and the goblet foamed more bright,
And the hearts of all were glad that met at the Royal Feast that night.

Utica, June, 1840.

MISCELLANEOUS.

From the Dial.

THE RELIGION OF BEAUTY.

The devout mind is a lover of nature. Where there is beauty it feels at home. It has not then to shut the windows of the senses, and take refuge from the world within its own thoughts to find eternal life. Beauty never limits us, never degrades us. We are free spirits when with nature. The outward scenery of our life, when we feel it to be beautiful, is always commensurate with the grandeur of our inward ideal aspirations; it reflects encouragingly the heart's highest, brightest dreams; it does not contradict the soul's convictions of a higher life; it tells us that we are safe in believing the thought which to us seems noblest. If we have no sense of beauty, the world is nothing more than a place to keep us in. But when the skies and woods reveal their loveliness, then nature seems a glorious picture, of which our own inmost soul is the painter, and our own loves and longings, the subject. It is the apt accompaniment to the silent song of the beholder's heart.

The greatest blessing, which could be bestowed on the weary multitude, would be to give them the sense of beauty; to open their eyes for them, and let them see how richly we are here surrounded, what a glorious temple we inhabit, how every part of it is eloquent of God. The love of nature grows with the growth of the soul. Religion makes man sensible to beauty; and beauty in its turn disposes to religion.—Beauty is the revelation of the soul to the senses. In all this outward beauty,—these soft swells and curves of the landscape, which seem to be the earth's smile;—this inexhaustible variety of form and colors and motion, not promiscuous, but woven together in as natural a harmony as the thoughts in a poem; this mysterious hieroglyphic of the flowers; this running alphabet of tangled vine and bending grass studded with golden paints; this all-embracing perspective of distance rounding altogether into one rain-bow colored sphere, so perfect that the senses and the soul roam abroad over it unsated, feeling the presence and perfection of the whole in each part; this perfect accord of sights, sounds, motions, and fragrance, all tuned to one harmony, out of which runs melodies inexhaustible of every mood and measure;—in all this, man first feels that God is without him, as well as within him, that nature too is holy; and can he bear to find himself the sole exception?

Does not the season, then, does not nature, does not the spontaneous impulse of an open heart, which has held such sublime worship through its senses, more than justify an attempt to show how the religious sentiments may be nourished by a cultivation of the sense of duty?

This should be a part of our religious education. The heart pines and sickens, or grows hard and contracted and unbelieving, when it cannot have beauty. The love of nature ends in the love of God. It is impossible to feel beauty, and not feel there is a spirit there.

The sensualist, the materialist, the worshipper of chance, is cheated of his doubts, the moment this mystery overtakes him in his walks. This surrounding presence of beautiful nature keeps the soul buoyed up for ever in its element of freedom, where its action is cheerful, healthful, and unwearied; where duty becomes lovely, and the call to worship, either by prayer or self-sacrifice, is music to it. He, in whom this sense is open, is put, as it were, in a magnetic communication with a life like his own, which flows in around him, go where he may. In nature we forget our loneliness. In nature we feel the same Spirit, who made it and pervades it, holding us up also. Through the open sense of beauty, all we see preaches and prophesies to us. Without it, when no such sensibility exists, how hard a task is faith! how hard to feel that God is here! how unlovely looks religion! As without the air, the body could not breathe; so without beauty, the heart and religious nature seem to want an element to live in. Beauty is the moral atmosphere. The close, unseemly school-house, in which our infancy was cramped,—of how much natural faith did it not rob us! In how unlovely a garb did we first see Knowledge and Virtue! How uninteresting seemed Truth, how unfriendly looked Instruction; with what mean associations were the names of God and Wisdom connected in our memory! What a violation of nature's peace seemed Duty! what an intrusion upon the mind's rights! What rebellion has been nurtured within us by the ugly confinements to which artificial life and education have accustomed us! How insensible and cold it has made us to the expressive features of God's works, always around us, always inviting us to high, refreshing converse!

I hold, then, that without a cultivation of the sense of beauty, chiefly to be drunken from the open fountains of nature, there can be no healthy and sound moral developement. The man so educated lacks something most essential. He is one-sided, not of a piece with nature; and however correct, however much master of himself, he will be uninteresting, unencouraging, and uninviting. To the student of ancient history, the warm-hearted, graceful Greek, all alive to nature, who made beauty almost his religion, is a most refreshing object, than the cold, formal Jew. And here around us, resist it as we may, our hearts are always drawn towards the open, graceful children of impulse, in preference to the stiff, insensible patterns of virtue. The latter may be very unexceptionable, but at the same time very unreal. The former, though purposely and carelessly they play through life, yet have trusted themselves to nature, and been ravished by her beauty, and nature will not let them become very bad.

Consider a few of the practical effects upon the whole character of a growing love of beauty in the young mind.

It disposes to order. It gives birth in the mind to an instinct of propriety. It suggests imperceptibly, it inclines gently but irresistibly, to the fit action, to the word in season. The beauty which we see and feel plants its seeds in us. Gazing with delight on nature, our will imperceptibly becomes attuned to the same harmony. The sense of beauty is attended with a certain reverence; we dare not mar what looks so perfect. This sense, too, has a something like conscience contained in it; we feel bound to do and be ourselves something worthy of the beauty we are permitted to admire. This feeling while it makes alive and quickens, yet is eminently conservative, in the best sense. He, who has it, is always interested on the side of order, and of all dear and hallowed associations. He, who wants it, is as destructive as a Goth. The presence of beauty, like that of nature, as soon as we feel it all, overcomes us with respect, and a certain sensitive dread of all violence, mischief, or discord. The beautiful ideal piece of architecture bears no mark of wanton pen-knife. The handsome school-room makes the children neat. The instinct of obedience, of conciliation, of decorum, reverence and harmony, flows into the soul with beauty. The calm spirit of the landscape takes possession of the humble, yet soul-exalted admirer. Its harmony compels the jangling chords within himself into smoother undulations. Therefore, "walk out," like Isaac, "at even tide to meditate," and let nature, with her divine stillness, take possession of thee. She shall give thee back to thyself better, more spiritual, more sensible of thy relationship with all things, and that in wronging any, thou but woundest thyself.

Another grace of character, which the sense of beauty gives the mind, is freedom—the freedom of fond obedience, not of loose desire. The man, whose eye and soul are open to the beauty there is around him, sees every where encouragement. To him the touch of nature's hand is warm and genial. The air does not seem to pinch him, as it does most narrow-minded ones, who can see no good in any thing but gain; to whose utilitarian vision most that is natural looks hostile. He is not contracted into himself by cautious fear and suspicions, afraid to let his words flow freely, or his face relax in confidence, or his limbs move gracefully, or his actions come out whole and hearty. He trusts nature for he has kissed her loveliness; he knows that she smiles encouragement to him. Now think what it is that makes virtue so much shunned. Partly, our depravity, if you please. But partly, also, her numerous ungraceful specimens. For it is the instinctive expectation of all minds, that what is excellent shall also be beautiful, lovely, natural, and free. Most of the piety we see about us, is more or less the product of restraint and fear. It stands there in spectral contrast with nature. Approve it we may; but we cannot love it. It does not bear the divine stamp; it chills, not converts. The love of nature makes in us an ideal of moral beauty, of an elevation of character which shall look free and lovely, something that shall take its place naturally and as matter of course in the centre of nature, as the life of Jesus did.

Again, the love of beauty awakens higher aspirations in us. He, who has felt the beauty of a summer like this, has drunk in an infinite restlessness, a yearning to be perfect, and by obedience free. He can never more rest contented with what he is. And here is the place, to attempt some account of the true significance of beauty, and of what is its office to the soul.

Beauty always suggests the thought of the perfect. The smallest beautiful object is as infinite as the whole world of stars above us. So we feel it. Everything beautiful is emblematic of something spiritual. Itself limited, its meanings and suggestions are infinite. In it we seem to see all in one. Each beautiful thing, each dew-drop, each leaf, each true work of painter's, poet's, or musician's art, seems an epitome of the creation. Is it not God revealed thro' the senses? Is not every beautiful thing a divine hint thrown out to us? Does not the soul begin to dream of its own boundless capacities, when it has felt beauty? Does not immortality then, for the first time, cease to be a name, a doctrine, and become a present experience? When the leaves fall in autumn, they turn golden as they drop. The cold wind tells us of coming winter and death: but they tell it in music. All is significant of decay; but the deep, still, harmonious beauty surpasses all felt in summer or spring before. We look on it, and feel that it cannot die. The Eternal speaks to us from the midst of decay. We feel a melancholy; but it is a sweet, religious melancholy, lifting us in imagination above death—since above the grave of the summer so much real beauty lingers.

The beautiful, then, is the spiritual aspect of nature. By cherishing a delicate sensibility to it, we make nature preach us a constant lesson of faith; we find all around an illustration of the life of the spirit. We surround ourselves with a constant cheerful exhortation to duty. We render duty lovely and inviting. We find the soul's deep inexpressible thoughts written around us in the skies, the far blue hills, and swelling waters.

But then to this desirable result one stern condition must be observed. If the sense of beauty disposes to purity of heart; so equally purity of heart is all that can keep the sense of beauty open. All influences work mutually. "One hand must wash the other," said the poet. The world is loveliest to him, who looks out on it through pure eyes.

Sweet is the pleasure,
Itself cannot spoil!
Is not true leisure
One with true toil!

Thou that wouldst taste it,
Still do thy best;
Use it, not waste it,
Else 'tis no rest.

Wouldst behold beauty
Near thee! all round!
Only hath duty
Such a sight found

Rest is not quitting
The busy career;
Rest is the fitting
Of self to its sphere.

'Tis the brook's motion,
Clear without strife,
Fleeing to ocean
After its life.

Deeper devotion
Nowhere hath knelt;
Fuller emotion
Heart never felt.

'Tis loving and serving
The Highest and Best!
'Tis ONWARD! unswerving,
And that is true rest.

D.

FOR PARENTS.

TRAIN UP A CHILD.

Nothing is easier than to repeat a proverb, and nothing more difficult than carrying it into execution. We can all advise each other how to bring up children, but utterly fail in carrying out our own precepts into practice. When we look into our police reports—in the list of accidents and offences—in the dire calamities and suicides which, unhappily, too frequently occur in our large cities,—we are convinced there are many radical defects in precept and example—in our system and discipline—in our laws and their administration.

Sufferings, of some kind or other, in health, in mind, or in fortune, seem to fall to the lot of every man, no matter how circumstanced or conditioned, and ills of life appear to be providentially distributed among all classes—proving how artificial is all rank and distinction in the estimate of human woe!

We frequently see a rich man, who has accumulated wealth by honest industry, afflicted with extravagant and dissipated sons—or what is worse, an honorable and exemplary father cursed with a dishonest child, who tarnishes by his crimes, a name always respected, and brings down to the grave, in sorrow, the gray hairs of a pure and upright life. This is really an affliction, because, more or less, society at large suffers. It is hard to reform those who have grown up in vicious propensities; yet the vices of mature age should admonish us to guard the young shoots from equal blight and destruction. A rich man should bring up his son, as the poor man does, to work and labor for himself. Early, active and steady employment is the secret to bring up children well. No matter at what occupation—no matter how laborious, as long as the mind is employed—so long as attention is directed to proper objects of business, bad examples and bad company will be avoided. Five or six years of a young man's time thus closely occupied, will confirm him in habits of industry; and his own resources of mind and body, his own industry and enterprise, will advance him honorably and prosperously in life. A rich father should always help a child when he proves his ability and inclination to help himself, and not sooner. We have no nobility, nor titled families, nor aristocratic distinctions; yet how frequently do we find an indulgent, rich father, who, from humble life, has raised himself in the world, indulging him in extravagance and idle habits, giving him money to spend in gaiety and fashion, at the race-course, the hotel, or the billiard-room, under the delusion that he will never want, and that he must inherit an ample fortune. What is the result? Idleness begets vice—dissipation follows, and loss of health, of fortune, and character is the inevitable result. A rich man, instead of giving his son a few hundred now and then, for what are called his contingent expenses, and under the fallacious idea that he must make an appearance like a gentleman, should say to him, 'for every thousand dollars which you earn by enterprise and industry, I will add a thousand safely invested for you, to be used at that advanced period of life when you know the value of money, and are entitled to ease and comfort.' The very facility which young men have of obtaining money, leads them into ruinous extravagance; and when from design or accident, their means are checked, they resort to crime, to furnish them the sources of enjoyment.

FOR THE FARMER.

INJURIOUS EFFECT OF WEEDS.

The question has been asked, how it was possible for China and Japan, with the ordinary products of agriculture, to furnish bread for a population, equaling, according to the late census, about 300 persons to a square mile. The answer is to be found in the care with which every foot of ground is cultivated; in the fact that few animals are kept, either for labor or food; and more perhaps than any thing else, in the entire freedom of the crops from every thing that can reduce their quantity or quality. Not a weed of any kind is to be found in the fields, and the most positive enactments and most assiduous attentions are directed to keeping the country free from them.

Few are aware how much weeds, or grasses, growing in a grain crop, detract from its value, by lessening the product.—A vigorous root of charlock or thistle will draw from the earth the nutriment that would have given fullness to half a dozen ears of wheat; and where these or any other foreign substance is permitted in a growing crop, that is sure to suffer in proportion to the quantity of the foul material present. Weeds injure a crop in two ways: by the room they occupy, to the exclusion of the valuable plants, and by the nutriment of which they rob the growing crop. We have seen fields in which the wheat maintained a dubious struggle with the red root, charlock, or thistle; and where the stem and the ear both showed how much they needed to be relieved from such crowding and unwelcome neighbors. On the best cultivated farms of England or Belgium, not a plant or weed of any description can be found in a growing crop, and in some years the Earl of Leicester has offered a reward, but without success, for the smallest or any weed that could be found in hundreds of acres of his turneps, or his wheat.

In this country, but few experiments have been made to show the difference of product between clean and foul fields, but several are recorded in Sinclair's Code of Agriculture, some of which we shall give to call the attention of farmers to this point, and show that the labor expended in clearing fields or crops from weeds, is far from being lost, as many would seem, from their negligence in the matter, to suppose.

"1. Wheat. Seven acres of light gravelly land were fallowed, and sown broad cast; one acre was measured off, and not a weed was pulled out of it; the other six were carefully weeded. The unweeded acre produced 18 bushels; the six weeded acres 135 bushels, or 22 1-2 bushels per acre; which is 4 1-2 bushels, or one-fourth of the whole, in favor of weeding.

"2. Barley. A six acre field was sown with barley, in fine tilth, and well manured. The weeding, owing to a great abundance of charlock, cost 12s. per acre. The produce of an unweeded acre, was only 13 bushels; of the weeded, 28. Difference in favor of the weeding, 15 bushels per acre, besides the land being so much cleaner for succeeding crops.

"3. Oats. Six acres were sown with oats; one acre ploughed but once and unmanured, produce only 17 bushels. Another six acres ploughed three times, manured, and weeded, produced 37 bushels per acre. This experiment proves that oats require good management, and will pay for it, as well as other crops. Ten bushels of the increased produce may be fairly attributed to the weeding, and the other ten to the manure."

It is admitted that the labor and expense of weeding a crop, is considerable; but if the difference be such as is here stated, and there is no reason to doubt it, as it is abundantly corroborated by other experiments, then it should be more generally and promptly attended to than it is. If our farmers could raise 4 1-2 bushels of wheat, 15 of barley, or 10 of oats, additional to their usual crop per acre, the effect would at once be felt in every department of labor in our country. No one can travel through our country before harvest time, without being convinced that millions of acres might have their products increased in as great a ratio as the above, by entire freedom from weeds. Farmers would be gratified could they have their lands tax free; but experience shows, that to have them weed free, would be of far greater importance to them.

GILES M. LANGWORTHY, [illegible]
AUGUSTUS L. SAUNDERS, M. D., Lecturer on Chemistry.

Ladies Department:
MRS. L. M. CARPENTER, [illegible]

This Institution is located in the pleasant [illegible] village of De Ruyter. Its buildings are [illegible] and commodious. Study rooms of which there are a large number, are furnished with chairs, tables, bedsteads, and stoves, and rented to gentlemen at one shilling per week, or [illegible] for each student, the rooms being large enough to accommodate two. Good board is afforded at one dollar and twenty five cents per week, including washing or lodging. One shilling extra is charged to those who require both.

The institution is furnished with a [illegible] Philosophical and chemical apparatus. It is also furnished with a valuable Library. A scientific society connected with the Institution is furnished with a choice collection of Minerals and Curiosities.

About twenty-one thousand dollars has already been expended on the De Ruyter Institute for the purpose of facilitating the student in his pursuit of scientific knowledge.

It is the object of those to whom the management of the Institute is entrusted, to make the expense of acquiring a knowledge of the sciences, as light as possible.

And the public may be assured that a strict attention will be paid to the moral cultivation of the student; and the trustees and teachers will spare no reasonable pains to render the time spent at the De Ruyter Institute, as agreeable and profitable to the student as circumstances will admit.

Young gentlemen and ladies wishing to engage in the pursuit of science, are respectfully invited to spend a term or two, at the De Ruyter Institute and satisfy themselves in regard to its merit.

The year is divided into three terms, of fourteen weeks each. The first term commenced on the twelfth day of September; The second term on the second day of January; and the third term on the eighth day of May.

VANITY OF EARTH'S TREASURES.

How fleeting are all the poor phantoms of earth;
How transient the life of proud man;
They are born,—one brief moment they revel in mirth,
And lo! they have finished their span.

As the sunbeam that smiles 'twixt the storm-driven clouds,
Flying swiftly o'er mountain and plain,
Imparts to each sport which the darkness enshrouds,
A gleam, then speeds onward again;

So hope, still deceitful and fleeing away,
A moment illumines the gloom,
Involving frail man's dark and perilous day,
From the nursery down to the tomb.

As the moonlight, that steals through the forests deep shade,
With gentle and silvery ray;
Delusive and fleeting the grasp doth evade,
That would snatch it in rapture away;

As the bee in the flower, or the thorn with the rose,
Is certain to wound with success,
More fatal and deep as more ardent and close,
The prize to our bosom we press;

So pleasure illusive decoys by its smile,
But we clasp it with eager desire,
And find 'tis but moonshine we sought all the while,
Or wounded, or stung we retire.

Wealth makes itself wings, and flies mocking away,
Deserting its votaries blind,
Or man himself dies, though base mammon should stay,
And leaves all his treasures behind.

Like the sun-driven dew, or the wind-scattered mist,
He passes in silence away;
And called by a power he would vainly resist,
The summons is forced to obey.

Though earth's jewels tarnish or waste in a trice,
A rich gem there is to be won;
It came from above,—'tis the pearl of great price,
Outshining, outlasting the sun.

'Twill purchase a glorious dwelling in Heaven,
'Tis faith in the dear Saviour's blood,—
And a sanctified heart, which to all will be given,
If humbly entreated from God.

RELIGIOUS.

CHRISTIAN LIBERALITY.

BY DR. NEVINS.

In my opinion there is nothing which lays the Church more open to infidel attack and contempt, than its parsimony to the cause of Christ. Professors of religion in general, give nothing in comparison to what they ought to give. Some literally give nothing, or somewhere in that immediate neighborhood. I shall not inquire whether such persons are really Christian men. One might almost question whether they are human.

I have used the word give; I must correct my language. Deliver up, I ought to say, when speaking of Christians who have so often acknowledged themselves as not their own, but themselves and their's to be the Lord's. Not a cent, or not much more, will some of these deliver up of all that their Lord has given them in trust. What stewards we Christians are! We act as if we were undisputed owners and sovereign proprietors of all; when we know, and if pressed, acknowledge, it is no such thing. The infidels know that we profess to be but stewards, and that, in our devotional hours, we write on every thing we have, "This is the Lord's;" and they naturally expect to see some correspondence between our profession and practice; and when they perceive that in this instance it is but bare profession, and that we do not mean any thing by it, they are very apt to conclude that this is true of our religion generally. Moreover, these shrewd characters see common humanity constraining men of the world to greater liberality than the love of Christ constrains his reputed disciples to exercise; and that, though they hear Christians continually saying that there is no principle which has such power to carry men out to deeds and sacrifices of benevolence as the love of Christ. What must they conclude, from this?—Either that there is no such principle, or that Christians do not feel the force of it in the least.

Again. Infidels hear us speak of giving, as lending to the Lord. Now, they don't believe any such thing; but since we do, they are astonished that we do not lend more liberally to such a pay-master, and on such security. They are in the habit of lending liberally, and they wonder that Christians do not. They hear us also repeating and admiring that sentiment, "It is more blessed to give than to receive."—Must they not think us insincere in our commendations of this sentiment, or else that we have very faint aspirations after the more blessed part, when they look on and see with how much more complacency and good humor we receive a great deal, than give a little.

But about the parsimony of Christians. I do not hesitate to say, having well considered the import of my words, that men are not so mean (I must use the word) to any cause as Christians, in general, are to Christ's cause. They give more sparingly to it than to any other. Just think of the American Bible Society receiving scarcely one hundred thousand dollars a year from these United States, to give the Bible to the country and to the world. There is one fact for you. More is often given to carry a political election in a single limited district; and some professors of religion will give more to promote such an object than to help on the conversion of the world. I should not wonder if this article were read by some who have done so this very year.

Many persons never give until they have done every thing else; and when any pressure occurs, it is the first thing they stop doing. They go on spending, not only for the necessaries and comforts, but even for luxuries, never minding the pressure.—They only stop giving; commencing retrenchment with their donations, and generally ending it with them. They are liberal still for every thing, but charity. You could never suppose, to look at their dress, equipage, furniture, table, &c., that the times were any way hard. No, they forget that, till they are called on to give; then they feel the pressure of the times.

The manner in which some persons give, is worthy of very commendatory notice.—They say, when applied to, "Well, I suppose I must give you something." Mark the word must, where will ought to be; and give where contribute, or strictly speaking, yield up, should have been; and you—give you. It is no such thing. The man is no beggar. He is not asking any thing for himself. He has himself given to the same object; and more than money—his time and thought, his cares and efforts.—Nay, perhaps has given his own person to the service which he asks others to aid by their pecuniary contributions. Christians, so called, talk of giving to support missionaries, as if they laid the missionaries under the same obligations to them. Preposterous! How it sounds to hear a British Christian indulge such a remark in reference to the richly-gifted, and profoundly learned Martyn, who, when he might have shone at home, went into the sickly East to hold up the light of life in those dark places! to call men who give themselves to the work of the Lord, and to labor and die for their fellow men, the protegees, beneficiaries, and obligated dependants of us who live and luxuriate at home, is really too bad; men who, when the alternative is to go or send, consent to the weightier branch of the alternative, and go; that they should be looked upon as inferior to us, who choose the lighter part of the alternative, and only send! I say it is too bad. "I must give you something!" Really!

I do not wonder, for my part, that God does not give "the kingdom and dominion, and the greatness of the kingdom under the whole heaven," to the present generation of saints. Their souls are not sufficiently expanded to receive it. It will require a race of Christians of great hearts to take possession of the world in the name of Jesus—Christians who shall be constrained by his love, and who shall feel the full force of the consideration presented in 2 Cor. viii. 9. Many Christians now think they feel it; but is it feeling the force of that consideration for a man, who has an income of some thousands a year, to give a few surplus dollars annually to support missionaries, or to circulate the Bible?—I do not say, that because Christ impoverished himself, therefore all his followers ought literally to do the same; but I say they ought to come nearer to it than they do. If, being rich, they should not become poor as he did, yet surely they ought to be more free with their riches. If the master gave his whole principal, certainly the disciples might give their interest. That would not be too closely imitating him.—If he emptied himself, they at least might forego further accumulation. They need not become poor; but why should they be so solicitous to become more rich? That is being as unlike the model as possible.

HIDINGS OF GOD'S FACE.

God hides himself even from the souls of his people. You could not have anticipated this; for are not his chosen, the people of his love, said to dwell in the secret place of the Most High? 'The secret of the Lord is with them that fear him.' Intimate is their communion with God, clearer than that of others their understanding of his will and purposes; dwelling in the inner shrine of the temple, they have nearer visions, closer audience, more divine and dazzling revelations; and yet oftentimes, their sun goes down when it is yet day,—a sudden cloud covers them, a strangeness comes over them, and the singular spectacle is exhibited of children groping in darkness after a father who has withdrawn himself, and who is the same kind of father still! To whom on earth would God reveal himself, if not to the members of Christ's mystical body?—Where would light fall, if not on the Goshen of his chosen ones? And yet oft o'er that fair and blessed land, came an alienation and a darkness when the cloud of the pillar, radiant with light and love, was eagerly expected. Yes! sometimes when God's own saints have risen at break of day, and got up on their high places, and reared their votive altars, and placed them in the attitude of receiving the first beams of the Sun of Righteousness, the morning hath not broken, the stars have disappeared, and the sun not risen, or risen begirt with the clouds and haloes of wrath! To describe the fearful estrangement consequent on the temporary withdrawal of God's countenance, is what we may not attempt. Perhaps you yourselves have seen instances of such an alienation. You have seen a soul under its father's frown, losing all sense of peace, all hope of glory, all feeling of divine love, forgetting all its past sweet communings and aspirations after immortal life, esteeming its conversion a delusion, its by-gone deliverances a dream, remembering nought but its sense of sin and dread of sin.

"You have heard the strong cry of such a soul's agony; you may have seen the bitter tears wherewith such a God-forsaken spirit has moistened its midnight pillow: you may have heard of a mighty poet, of whom the world was not worthy, and who had known God before, as his true children only know him, and who yet for long years awoke each morning to think of God as an enemy, and lay down each night to dream visions of eternal fire! And oh! when we think of such cases,—and they occur every day,—how forcibly are the words impressed upon us, "Verily, thou art a God that hidest thyself even from thine own people, though thou art their God and their Savior."—Gilfillan.

"ASHAMED OF JESUS."

I see myself covered with the wounds which sin has made, and my whole nature under the wasting of a deep moral disease. Shall I, then, be "ashamed of Jesus," the only Physician who can bind up these wounds and restore health to this diseased nature?

I see myself a stranger, passing through an earthly pilgrimage to the home of the deathless spirit. Shall I be ashamed of the only Guide to an eternity of holy rest and of unending felicity?

I see myself in the midst of dangers, and feel ofttimes uncertain in regard to a final escape. Shall I be ashamed of the only Protector in whom I may trust; of Him who alone can lead through these doubts and dangers up to the fruition of God?

I feel myself surrounded with the darkness of spiritual night. After every meteor glare has shut its feverish light, shall I then be ashamed of that constant pole star that beams graciously on my path, pointing me to the brightness and glory of an eternal day?

I feel the influence of temptation from a depraved heart, and find myself obliged to strive daily for the mastery. Shall I, then, be ashamed of him who alone can afford me grace for the seasons of conflict with self, and enable me over them all to come off more than victorious?

I long for purer joys and holier pleasure. Shall I then be ashamed of the Author of those joys, of Him, the only one who can fit sinful nature for those services which afford constant transports of unmingled delight?

Finally, I see myself by nature far from God with no comforting hope that in my own strength I shall ever reach his blessed, glorious abode. And can I then be ashamed of that kind Deliverer who comes to aid me on in my return? Or can I be ashamed of Him who would lead me up to the throne of God, and there plead for my forgiveness? Of Him whose infinite worthiness alone can transcend my own vileness, and whose unbounded grace alone can present me faultless in the presence of the Father?

No, Oh my soul! Think on thy disease, thy pilgrimage, thy dangers, thy dark path, thy tempting lusts, thy longing after holy joys, thine utter helplessness, and then glory thou in Jesus, thy hope, thy Savior.—He will enlighten, defend, sustain and guide, until thou awake in his glorious likeness, to adore his kindness and mercy in the kingdom of God. EUSTA.

A DEAF AND DUMB BOY'S THOUGHTS ON PRAYER.

Written by a pupil in the West of England Institution for the Deaf and Dumb.

It is thy command, O God, that I should pray. Prayer drives away the evils of my mind, and makes me capable of receiving thy goodness; and my helplessness tells me I must pray for support and shelter; my ignorance and doubt tell me, I must pray for light and courage; and the dangers that surround me, and the crafts of my spirit's foe tell me, with great force, that I must pray for protection and guidance. O, my God! thou knowest when the false man told me prayer was vain because thou art unchangeable, that my heart was fainting from thee, because I lost my hope in thee. I was filled with despair, because I thought thou wast unapproachable by me; and I was unhappy, because I believed thou didst reject my cry unto thee; but, O God of my salvation! I will glorify thee for ever, because thou didst direct our minds to thy words of truth and of life, and I see there that thou dost desire us to pray, and thou dost promise to answer our petitions, thro' Jesus Christ. O, my Father! I am poor, and can give no alms to my brethren; but I pray thee to pour thy riches upon them; I am sick and cannot go to thy sanctuary, but I may on my bed pray for thy blessing and thy love. I am ignorant and cannot instruct my fellow creatures; but I can pray that thy Spirit may rest on them, and guide them; and in my supplications unto thee, O God, I am ever cherished and supported by thy promises. When my long attached friend comes to me, I have pleasure to converse with him; and I rejoice to pass my eyes over his countenance; but soon I am weary of spending my time causelessly and unimproved, and I desire to leave him, (but not in rudeness,) because I wish to be engaged in my business; but thou, O my Father! knowest that I always delight to commune with thee in my lone and silent heart. I am never full of thee. I am never weary of thee. I am always desiring thee. I hunger with strong hope and affection for thee, and I thirst for thy grace and spirit. I see a well of pure water. It is valuable to men for health and comfort; but I see no pipes to take the water to men's dwellings; the good water is there; but it is neglected, it would refresh men, but they do not seek it; and I think about this good well and I say it is like the rich blessings of my father's kingdom, and I say, prayer is the means to convey His great mercies to men.

THE MORALITY OF THE BIBLE.—It were no overbold opinion, that, if the Bible were not the word of God, and could be proved to be not the word of God, it would nevertheless be the most precious of books, and immeasurably more for a land than the finest productions of literature and philosophy. We always recur with great delight to the testimony of a Deist, who, after publicly laboring to disprove Christianity, and to bring scripture into contempt, as a forgery, was found instructing his child from the pages of the New Testament. When taxed with the flagrant inconsistency, his only reply was, that it was necessary to teach the child morality, and that nowhere was there to be found such morality, as in the Bible. We thank the Deist for his confession.—Whatever our scorn of a man who could be guilty of so foul a dishonesty, seeking to sweep from the earth a volume to which, all the while, himself recurred for the principles of education, we thank him for his testimony, that the morality of scripture is a morality not elsewhere to be found; so that, if there were no Bible, there would be comparatively no source of instruction in duties and virtues, whose neglect and decline would dislocate the happiness of human society. The Deist was right.—Deny or disprove the divine origin of scripture, and nevertheless you must keep the volume as a kind of text book of morality, if indeed you would not wish the banishment from our homes of all that is lovely and sacred, and the breaking up, through the lawlessness of ungoverned passions, of the quiet and beauty which are yet round our families.—Rev. H. Melville.

THINKING ON GOD.—A friend once told me, that, amongst other symptoms of high nervous excitement, he had been painfully harrassed by the want of sleep. To such a degree had this proceeded, that if, in the course of the day, any occasion led him to his bed-chamber, the sight of his bed made him shudder at the idea of the restless and wretched hours he had to pass upon it. In this case it was recommended to him to endeavor, when he lay down at night, to fix his thoughts on something at the same time vast and simple, such as the wide expanse of the ocean, or the cloudless vault of heaven,—that the little hurried and disturbed images that flitted before his mind might be charmed away, or hushed to rest, by the calming influences of one absorbing thought. Though not at all a religious man at the time, this advice suggested to his mind, that if an object at once vast and simple was to be selected, none could serve the purpose so well as that of God. He resolved then to make the trial, and to think of him. The result exceeded his most sanguine hopes: in thinking of God, he fell asleep. Night after night he resorted to the same expedient. The process became delightful; so much so, that he used to long for the usual hour of retiring, that he might fall asleep, as he termed it, in God. What began as a mere physical operation, grew, by imperceptible degrees, into a gracious influence. The same God who was his repose at night, was in all his thoughts by day.—And at the time this person spoke to me, God, as revealed in the Gospel of his Son, was "all his salvation, and all his desire." So various are the means, and so inscrutable are the ways, by which God can "fetch home again his banished."—Rev. H. Woodward.

THE BIBLE.—The Bible must be the invention either of good men or angels; bad men or devils; or of God. It could not be the invention of good men or angels, for they neither would nor could make a book, and tell lies all the time they were writing it, saying, "Thus saith the Lord," when it was their own invention. It could not be the invention of bad men or devils, for they would not make a book, which commands all duty, forbids all sin, and condemns their souls to all eternity. The conclusion, therefore, must be drawn, that "All Scripture is given by inspiration of God."

SUFFICIENT GRACE.—The journey I have to take; the race I have to run; the warfare I have to accomplish; the duties I have to perform; the trials I have to bear; all these are not only above my natural powers, but even above the grace I possess, without fresh and constant supplies of the Spirit of Jesus Christ. But he cries, "My grace is sufficient for thee, for my strength is made perfect in weakness." Surely, therefore, shall one say, "In the Lord have I righteousness and strength."—Jay.

DAILY FOOD.—Let no day pass without inwardly digesting some portion of Scripture; it will prove a guardian angel to you, and be the means of chasing away many an evil spirit from you.—Marsh.

TRIBUTE

BY [illegible]

To the memory of the Rev. Gilbert Livingston Smith, who died a few weeks after leaving the Theological Seminary at Princeton, in the autumn of 1835.

"Blest are the pure in heart!" So saith the voice
That cannot err. And thou didst [illegible]
That hallowed blessing, as a pearl of [illegible]
Even from thine early years. God's spirit made
Thy breast its casket. Beautified [illegible]
The world might covet, [illegible]
The cross of Christ, and to his right [illegible]
Conform'd thine own.

How well ist thou how to teach
The [illegible] and pure—[illegible]
The pride of learning, to array [illegible]
In sweet humility—and choose his path
Who sought and saved the lost.

But not long [illegible]
All [illegible] pleasures [illegible]
Were not for thee. The sudden [illegible]

A MOTHER'S [illegible].—The plague broke out in a little Italian village. [illegible] house the children were taken first. The parents watched over them, but only [illegible] the disease they could not check. The whole family died. On the opposite side of the way, lived the family of a poor laborer, who was absent the whole week, only coming home on Saturday night to bring his scanty earnings. His wife felt herself attacked by the fever in the night. In the morning she was much worse, and before night the plague-spot showed itself. She thought of the terrible fate of her neighbors. She knew she must die, but, as she looked upon her dear boys, she resolved not to communicate death to them. She therefore locked the children into the room, and snatched her bed-clothes, lest they should keep the contagion behind her, and left the house. She even denied herself the sad pleasure of a last embrace. O think of the [illegible] which enabled her to conquer her feelings, and leave home and all she loved to die! Her eldest child saw her from the window. "Good bye, mother," said he, with his tenderest tone, for he wondered why his mother left them so strangely.

"Good bye, mother," repeated the youngest child, stretching his little hand out of the window. The mother paused. Her heart was drawn towards her children, and she was on the point of rushing back. She struggled hard, while the tears rolled down her cheeks, at the sight of her helpless babes. At length she turned from them. The children continued to cry "Good bye, mother!" The sounds sent a thrill of anguish to her heart, but she pressed on to the house of those who were to bury her. In two days she [illegible], recommending her husband and children to their [illegible] with her dying breath.

O [illegible] children.

THE REGRET.

O! call my sister back to me,
I cannot play alone—
The summer comes with flower and bee
Where is my sister gone?
O! while my sister with me [illegible],
Would I had loved her more!

[illegible] DYING.—Sister Ellen is dying! O, I wish I had never quarreled with her! Think she will forgive me? I would give any thing in the world if I had never quarreled with her!

These feeling words were uttered by a little girl a few days since, when her sister was dying. Susan had always been considered a kind child; and the depth of her feelings, now that her sister was dying, showed that she was affectionate. But now, as she felt how much she loved her sister, she felt too that she had not always treated her kindly. Ellen had been taken ill a few days before with a disease of the brain, which deprived her of her reason the most of the time. A few moments before she breathed her last, reason returned, and Susan had the invaluable privilege of asking her forgiveness for having been unkind to her.

I shall not soon lose the impression made on my mind by the words of Susan, nor forget the deep regret she manifested for her ill treatment of her sister.

May not this simple incident, simple as it is, teach my youthful readers a lesson? You have a brother or sister whom you love. Perhaps sometimes you have been selfish, or unkind to them, or even quarreled with them. If that brother or sister should die, think you would not regret, like Susan, that you had behaved in this manner? Besides, it is a sin against God.—S. S. Messenger.

HOW TO BE LOVED.—One evening Maria's father related in her presence an anecdote of a little daughter of Dr. Doddridge, which pleased Maria extremely.—When this child, about six years old, was asked what made every body love her? she [illegible] "I don't know, indeed, papa, unless it is because I love every body." The beautiful simplicity of this reply struck Maria forcibly. "If this is all that is necessary to be loved," thought Maria, "I will try to make every body love me." Her father [illegible] a remark of John Newton, [illegible] considered the world to be divided into two great masses, one of happiness and the other of misery, and it was [illegible] to take as much as possible from the heap of misery, and add it to that of happiness. [illegible] thought Maria, [illegible] to try to make [illegible] Instead of thinking all the time about myself I will ask every [illegible] for some body else. [illegible] that this is the best [illegible] said [illegible] daughter.

[illegible] Father, I said a [illegible] I want my eyes to look at God." Many children, when praying, keep looking about them, and [illegible] whatever is in the room [illegible] will keep playing with [illegible] But my dear [illegible]

FOR THE CHRISTIAN.

[illegible]

Will you [illegible] that you will keep back from [illegible] what is strictly his own? Will you [illegible] God and pawn his [illegible] and his talents, [illegible] with the world? Will you [illegible] him what [illegible] be given with merit [illegible] words of [illegible] Ye are not your own; ye [illegible] We want you [illegible] the spirits of the just want you, [illegible] the holy angels want you, and the [illegible] the Son and the Holy Ghost want you; all but the devil and ruined souls want you to leave off defrauding the Almighty, and give Him his own, yourselves, [illegible] by redemption. I must give God the body, I must give God [illegible] I give him the body, if I clothe [illegible] [illegible] the understanding [illegible] when the will is reduced [illegible] with the divine will, [illegible] This is [illegible] present ourselves [illegible] that we may consecrate unreservedly every thing to thy service, and [illegible]

YOUNG CONVERTS.—When a young soldier has enlisted into an army, how carefully and thoroughly he is drilled, and prepared for active duty! So it should be with young converts to Christ. They need counsel and instruction. Older Christians should speak to them, show them their duty, engage them in immediate active service, see that proper books are put into their hands; invite them to pray in the social circle and the prayer meeting; work with them, and by all proper means bring them forward to serve Him whom they profess to love and follow.

CONSTANT SUPPLIES OF GRACE.—The acts of breathing which I performed yesterday will not keep me alive to-day; I must continue to breathe afresh every moment, or animal life ceases. In like manner, yesterday's grace and spiritual strength must be renewed, and the Holy Ghost must continue to breathe on my soul from moment to moment, in order to my enjoying the consolations, and my working the works of God.—Toplady.

THE GREATEST MAN.—The greatest man is he who chooses the right with invincible resolution; who resists the sorest temptations from within and without; who bears the heaviest burdens cheerfully; who is calmest in storms and most fearless under menaces and frowns; whose reliance on truth, on virtue, on God, is most unfaltering.—Channing.

What wings are to a bird, oil to wheels, or a loadstone to the needle, such is Christ to the soul of the believer; he gives speed to his devotion, activity to his obedience, and draws him nearer and nearer to God.—Mason.

THE CONVERSION OF THE CHURCH.

We hear a great deal now-a-days about the conversion of the world. It is in almost every christian's mouth; and we cannot be too diligent to promote the thing.—It ought to have our daily thoughts, prayers, and efforts. It deserves our hearts. It is the great object of Christianity. But there is another community besides the world, which I think needs to undergo a measure of the same process that the world so much needs. It is the Church. While the conversion of the world is made so prominent, I think we ought not to overlook the conversion of the Church, especially since this comes first in order.

Every thing, we know, begins at the house of God, both in judgment and mercy. But what do I mean by the conversion of the Church? Is not the church converted already? Suppose I admit that; may she not need a new conversion? Regeneration is but once, but conversion may be many times. Peter had been converted when Christ said to him, "and when thou art converted strengthen thy brethren."—There is no doubt the Church might be converted again, and that without any injury to her.

But why do I think the church needs conversion? I might give several reasons, but I will assign only one. It is founded on Matthew xviii. 3: "Except ye be converted and become as little children." Here we see the object of conversion is to make the subjects of it as little children, and hence St. John addresses the primitive Christians as little children. Now my reason for thinking the church needs conversion, is that there does not seem to be much of the little child about the church of the present day. There is a great deal more of the "old man" about it I am afraid. I think if John were living now, he would not be apt to address the members of the church generally, as "little children." No, indeed. I question whether, if he were even addressing an assembly of ministers and officers of many of our churches, he would not be apt to apply other terms than "little children" as a preface to his exhortation "love one another," which I am sure he would not forget.

Little children are humble, but humility ~~is not~~ a remarkable characteristic of the church of the present day. I don't think that the scholars of either of the schools have got the lesson of lowliness very perfectly from their Master, I fear, if the Master were to come in upon us now, he would be likely to chide many in both the schools. Why two schools? There is but one Master.

How confiding little children are, and how ready to believe on the bare word of one in whom they have reason to feel confidence, and, especially if he be a father!—But not so the church. "Thus saith the Lord" does not satisfy her sons now. They must have better reasons for believing than that. They must hear first what he has to say, and then see if they can get a confirmation of it from any other quarter before they will believe it. How unceremoniously many of these children treat some of the things which their Father very evidently says, because they do not strike them as in accordance with reason, justice, and common sense.

How docile the little child is! Mary, who sat at Jesus' feet and heard his word, was such a child. Never a why or a how asked she him. I cannot say so much of the church of our day. Simplicity also characterizes little children. How open and artless they are—how free from guile. Such was Nathaniel. Whether this trait of character be conspicous in the church now, let the reader say.

Little children are moreover characterized by love, and their charity "thinketh no evil." How unsuspicious they are! But too much of the charity of the present day, so far from thinking no evil thinketh no good. It suspects every body. It "hopeth" nothing. Indeed love, and her sister peace, which used to lead the graces, are become as wall-flowers with many: into such neglect they have fallen. They seem to be quite out of the question with many. Some good men seem to think that contending for the faith is the end of the commandment and the fulfilling of the law. But it is not; it is a duty, an important duty—one too little regarded by many—one never to be sneered at, as by some it is.—I acknowledge, some treat it as if it were nothing. I only say that it is not every thing. There is walking in love and following peace, which, as well as contending for the faith, are unrepealed laws of Christ's house. I believe they can all be done, and that each is best done, when the others are not neglected. I am sure truth never lost any thing by being spoken in love. I am of opinion that a principal reason why we are not more of one mind, is that we are not more of one heart. How soon they who feel heart to heart, begin to see eye to eye! The way to think alike, is first to feel alike; and if the feeling be love, the thought will be truth. I wish therefore, for the sake of sound doctrine, that the brethren could love one another. What if we see error in each other to condemn, can we not find any thing to love? I would the experiment might be made. Let us not cease to contend for the faith—not merely for its own sake, but for love's sake, for "faith worketh by love." But, in the conflict, let us be careful to shield love. It is a victory for truth, scarcely worth gaining, if charity be left bleeding on the field of battle.

You see why I think the church needs converting. It is to bring her back to humility, and simplicity, and love. I wish she would attend to this matter. She need not relax her efforts for the world. She has time enough to turn a few reflex acts on herself. The object of the church is to make the world like herself. But let her in the mean time make herself more like what the world ought to be. It is scarcely desirable that the world should be as the church in general now is. Let her become a better model for the world's imitation.—Her voice is heard for Christ; but let her "hold forth the word of life" in her conduct as well as her voice. Let her light shine. Let her good works be manifest. Let her heaven-breathed spirit, breathe abroad the same spirit.

The work of the conversion of the world goes on slowly, but it makes as much progress as the work of the conversion of the church does. No more sinners are converted. The world will continue to lie in wickedness, while the "ways of Zion mourn" as they do. Does any one wonder that iniquity abounds, when the love of so many has waxed cold? We are sending the light of truth abroad, when we have but little of the warmth at home.

We are often asked what we are doing for the conversion of the world. We ought to be doing a good deal—all we can. But I would ask, what we are doing for the conversion of the church? What to promote holiness nearer home, among our fellow Christians and in our own hearts? Let us not forget the world, but at the same time let us remember Zion.—Nevins.

EARTH AND HEAVEN.

Conceive a man to be standing on the margin of this green world; and that, when he looked towards it, he saw abundance smiling upon every field, and all the blessings which earth can afford scattered in profusion throughout every family, and the light of the sun sweetly resting upon all the pleasant habitations, and the joys of human companionship brightening many a happy circle of society—conceive this to be the general character of the scene upon one side of his contemplation; and that on the other, beyond the verge of the goodly planet on which he was situated, he could descry nothing but a dark and fathomless unknown. Think you that he would bid a voluntary adieu to all the brightness and all the beauty that were before him upon earth, and commit himself to the frightful solitude away from it. Would he leave its peopled dwelling-places, and become a solitary wanderer through the fields of nonentity? If space offered him nothing but a wilderness, would he for it abandon the home-bred scenes of life and of cheerfulness that lay so near, and exerted such a power of urgency to detain him? Would not he cling to the regions of sense, and of life, and of society? and shrink away from the desolation that was beyond it; would not he be glad to keep his firm footing on the territory of this world, and to take shelter under the silver canopy that was stretched over it?

But, if during the time of his contemplation, some happy island of the blest had floated by; and there had burst upon his senses the light of its surpassing glories, and its sounds of sweeter melody; and he clearly saw, that there a purer beauty rested upon every field, and a more heartfelt joy spread itself among all the families; and he could discern there a peace, and a piety, and a benevolence, which put a moral gladness into every bosom, and united the whole society in one rejoicing sympathy with each other, and with the beneficent Father of them all. Could he further see that pain and morality were there unknown; and above all, that signals of welcome were hung out, and an avenue of communication was made for him; perceive you not, that what was before the wilderness, would become the land of invitation; and that now the world would be the wilderness? What unpeopled space could not do, can be done by space teeming with beatific scenes and beatific society. And let the existing tendencies of the heart be what they may to the scene that is near and visibly around us, still if another stood revealed to the prospect of man, either through the channel of his senses—then, without violence done to the constitution of his moral nature, may he die unto the present world, and live to the lovlier world that stands in the distance away from it.—Chalmers.

IF YOU CAN'T HEAL MY CHILD, YOU CAN'T FORGIVE MY SINS.—An aged Romanist was awakened to read the Bible, and was convinced of the papal imposture. The priest called upon him, warned him, and threatened to withhold the pardon of the church. He made them claim the same power that Christ gave his apostles, and then presenting before them a poor decrepid child, requesting them to exercise the healing power, and he would then give them credit for power to pardon. An awful dilemma! As they stood, incapable and confounded, he drove them out of his house, saying, If you can't heal my child, you can't forgive my sins.—Evangelist.

THREE FOUNTAINS.—The Romanists have a story that when St. Paul was beheaded, the head, as it fell, made three bounds, and strange to relate, three fountains, equidistant, with various tasting waters, gushed up immediately from each spot which it touched, all in a straight line. A writer in the Catholic Advocate has recently visited the fountains, finds it even so, and could elicit no natural explanation of the fact—and this is enlightened Popery, in the nineteenth century. Well said that same apostle, that it was a system of "lying wonders."—Ib.

The promises of God are given; they cannot be purchased, bartered, or merited, and the smallest mercy is beyond our reach in any way but the free goodness of God.

Take away from the Bible the atonement of Christ, and what is left is dark as night, and cold and dreary, and desolate as winter.

A SERIOUS INQUIRY.—Why is it that we find some professors in their fields or shops at five o'clock on a week day, and in bed at seven, upon the Sabbath?

UNITY OF THE CHURCH.

In a former number we remarked that there existed among true Christians, a general "union of views" in respect to the great and leading truths of Christianity. It must be confessed that many who claim to be christians, are so sadly deficient in respect to a proper knowledge of the doctrine of Christ, as to afford little or no evidence of their discipleship. It is equally true, that those who assent to the truth of the Christian doctrine, evince the very opposite of the mind and spirit which were in Christ, who was made in respect to infirmities in all points like his brethren, whose nature he assumed that they might be conformed in all things to him who is their Head.

Among genuine Christians there is a tendency to an increased union of views and feelings. This is the result of making Jesus Christ "the same yesterday, to-day, and forever" the end of their conversation. This object is also greatly promoted by a frequent interchange of sentiments on the great things of the kingdom of Christ. Strangers and foreigners find themselves not only really united in Christ, but happily and increasingly united in him while they dwell on the story of his dying love, and contemplate the bliss, which, "as heirs together of the grace of life" they shall enjoy in Heaven. As those who have similar interests to promote in this world, and who are bound together by the ties of affection, generally think alike, and the more so on account of this affection; so the love of Christ and the members of his militant body, have a constant and powerful tendency to harmonize the views of true Christians in reference to all the truth which is revealed in the oracles of God, and to cement them together in the bonds of holy affection. This great object shall be fully accomplished in the perfect union of his believers in Heaven. But,

The union of views among the disciples of Christ is not only a high privilege, but an imperative duty. We ask if there can be any doubt respecting the duty of the members of Christ's household, to labor on earth to accomplish the objects for which he humbled himself, and even laid down his life? And will not the spirit of Christ, which Christians measurably possess, lead them to devote their talents and influence to the furtherance of that object which their Master once died, but now lives to secure? If it be not duty for the members of the church of God to be united in this sense, what can be the import of the scriptures which require the church to be "perfectly joined together in the same mind, and in the same judgment," to speak the same things and to walk by the same rule?" There can be no ambiguity in this requirement. It is taken for granted that Christians, by virtue of their union with Christ, love one another; now they are commanded to entertain the same views of the same important truths, to be "perfectly," (not partially) "joined together in the same mind, and in the same judgement." It is not only possible, therefore, for Christians to be thus agreed in matters of faith, but most manifestly their duty to entertain the same views of revealed truth, as well as to cherish a kind and fraternal affection for each other. If the scriptures are true, it requires no greater effort for one to believe them than for another, and if the facts therein revealed are brought to the comprehension of the humblest capacity, then there can be no good excuse for the unbelief of those possessed of more brilliant parts. Any number of students who might solve a problem in mathematics, though they may never have seen each other, would bring out the same answer, for figures will speak true. So when the gospel is fully believed, and rightly believed, the faith of all believers will correspond perfectly.

Were a teacher to give the same lesson in mathematics to a class of learners, and require a solution, could he, if he possessed a proper knowledge of the science, pronounce the task of his pupils well done when there might exist the greatest diversity in their answers? and would there not be an entire agreement in the results of the labors of all who had truly solved the problem? So true faith directed to the same object, acting on the same evidences and producing the same results, will unite its possessors, in judgment as well as in affection.

Compliance with this duty is therefore not only possible, but practicable, and in the same ratio as the true faith is extended, the body of Christ will be more and more united in their heads and hearts; and in proportion to their union will Zion be beautiful and powerful.

WORLD'S CONVENTION.

In our last number we gave some account of the World's Convention assembled in London, (Eng.) The "woman question" was introduced on the first day of the meeting. The leading members of the society of Friends took ground against it, and on motion of George Stacy, formerly clerk of their yearly meeting, it was resolved almost unanimously, that "the ladies be received with all respect, but not as delegates." Messrs. Garrison, Rogers and Remond, having arrived after the decision of this question, declined taking their seats in the Convention. Mr. Birney introduced the subject of American Slavery. His speech is highly extoled by the London Journals. Much important information was presented by the French members, relative to French slavery,—they express strong hope of a speedy extinction of the evil. The Chairman on taking the Chair the second morning, said: "He hoped he should not be violating the conscientious scruples of any one, if he requested that they might be allowed to sit a minute or two in silence before the business of the meeting commenced. It was shortly afterwards announced, that it was the intention of those who wished to join in devotion before the commencement of the meeting, to meet in the adjoining room for that purpose, at half past nine."

Prof. Adams, late from India, read a statement of facts which was deeply interesting, in reference to the present state of slavery in British India. Mr. D'Instaut, a native of Hayti, laid before the convention an account of the causes which led to the freedom of Hayti. Mr. W. Alexander addressed the convention on the subject of slavery in the colonies of Holland, and Sweden. Dr. Bowring called the attention of the convention to the state of slavery in Mahommedan countries. Dr. Madden brought before the convention the subject of Spanish slavery. Dr. Rolph brought under the notice of the convention, in an able speech, the state of the colored population of Canada. Rev. C. Stovel read a very interesting paper on the slavery of red Indians, on the north west coast of North America.

The following subjects among others were discussed: "The essential sinfulness of slavery, and its direct opposition to the spirit and precepts of Christianity." "The advantages of free over slave labor." "The results of emancipation in the British Colonies." "Free cotton in India." "Disuse of slave-labor produce." "Slavery in Texas."

The meeting was of great interest and importance, and was composed of more than four hundred delegates assembled from various parts of the world.

The Convention commenced its session on the 12th of June and closed on the 23rd.

We publish to-day the reply of the Rev. S. B. Yarrington, of the M. E. Church, to the article in our last, on Camp-Meetings. Of the merits of the question at issue we have nothing to say. We are willing to open our columns to a brief and fair discussion of any subject, whereby the cause of truth and holiness may be advanced, if it is conducted with candor, and in a spirit characteristic of the gospel. The cause of truth will suffer by personalities and sarcasms; while candor, and a proper deference for the opinions of others will advance it. We could wish that a desire to elicit truth would characterize all religious controversies, and a desire to embrace it, all who controvert. We say with reference to the present article, as to the former, that "in admitting it to our columns we are not to be understood as endorsing the views of its author." It is true that we did not have the same views of the article of the Rev. J. R. J. that our correspondent has, nor did we draw the same inference. We however do not pretend to decide. The question is between our correspondents, who shall receive even-handed justice from us.

CORRESPONDENCE.

For the Register.

MESSRS. EDITORS—It is with pleasure I "employ my pen" in vindication of a means of grace, recently assailed in your columns by Rev. J. R. Johnson, of this village. Your correspondent seems willing to suppose that, at Camp-Meetings, the saint is edified and the sinner converted. This admission makes unreasonable all his reasons against public sylvan devotion; unless it be shown that such worship is the direct occasion of the loss of souls; and also that the souls destroyed are more numerous than those that are saved in consequence of the meeting. A prudent logician, one might presume, would shrink, in modesty, from such a task!

Another concession, (or what resembles it) equally fatal to the cause in which the Rev. assailant is embarked, is that, in the Southern States, Camp-Meetings are more favorably circumstanced, and therefore may be beneficial. This assertion, however, should not pass without examination. Who needs to be informed how the slaves at the South watch for liberty; and what embarrassment, consequently, they must be, whether present or absent, to a Meeting in the grove? Who does not know that the whites themselves, bred up in indolence, and nursed on the downy lap of ease, are far more dissipated, riotous, and of course unmanageable, than the same race at the North? But I will furnish a key to unlock the mystery of the wonderful exception made in behalf of the South. In that quarter, PRESBYTERIANS THEMSELVES SUSTAIN THESE SAME MEETINGS: Yes, THEY FIRST INTRODUCED THEM!

Thus much in regard to the preamble. Now for the 'four reasons.'

1. In substance, 'Camp-meeting excitements are nervous, exorbitant, delusive, miserable, and tend to infidelity.'

There is nothing peculiar in Camp-meeting excitements. The very same are witnessed elsewhere, even at common prayer-meetings, especially in times of revival. Unless, therefore, Rev. J. R. J. impugns all religious excitements, this argument, by proving too much, proves nothing to the purpose. But if he is hostile to all excitement in religion, then I reply, Physician, heal thyself! His own Church have far out-done the Methodists in promoting excitements; though, it is true, of late there has been a wonderful abatement; whereas, the Methodists are resolved, by the grace of God, to persevere till the world is converted to righteousness!

"But Infidelity grows out of such meetings." This assertion is all vapor, which the sun of truth will dissipate in a moment. Scores of Infidels have been reclaimed unto the faith of God's elect at Camp-meetings. As to the nature of these reviled exercises, which are witnessed less or more at all meetings during great religious reformations, and among different denominations, not excepting even THE PRESBYTERIANS, that is another and a very grave inquiry. If brother J. R. J. is desirous of information on this subject, let him resort to a very worthy clergyman and lady of this place, who, I am credibly informed (to adopt his own language) "have had the power."

He can then repair to other Baptists, both clergy and laymen; and, in fine, to some clerical and private members of his own church, who are not ignorant of this matter, and if he please sit at their feet and receive instruction. But, possibly, he may esteem himself, even now, infinitely wiser than those whom his first argument considers so biased and unintelligent, or foolish, and, consequently, so deluded as to be incapable of discriminating between their own nervous, over-wrought feelings, and the special and sanctifying operations of the Holy Spirit!—So that all one can reasonably expect from the unbiassed and intelligent opponent of Camp-meetings, is, that he put on bowels of mercies toward those poor miserable subjects of delusion, who are building on false hopes themselves; and, by their exa[illegible] inciting others to do the same! [illegible] they suffer so much from tho[illegible] excitements, WHAT FRIEN[illegible] MANITY CAN REFRA[illegible] TEARS IN BEHOLD[illegible] WRETCHED OBJECTS [illegible] serious—What more of yo[illegible] ent would the veriest infid[illegible] that which he so generously [illegible] soul of religion? Give the [illegible] and he liberally replies, "Ha[illegible] and welcome!" For well he know[illegible] delity is safe in the hands of dead m[illegible]

2. It is assumed as a second argument against Camp-meetings, that they occasion boisterous rudeness among the impenitent. "Young men who would be quite decent at a Ball, or an old-fashioned Fourth-of-July Celebration," being strongly excited by the excitements they witness, will be excessively rude at a Camp-meeting. Excellent apologist for a parcel of super-excellent young men! WHO HAVE IMMORTALIZED THEMSELVES, AND THEIR ADVOCATE TOO, BY THE EXCITED HORROR THEY FELT WHEN WITNESSING THE FRIGHTFUL VAGARIES OF CAMP-MEETING WORSHIPERS! WHICH EXCITED THE HORROR THEY LUSTILY MANIFESTED, when at a distance from the meeting, and for a very few moments, BY IMITATING THE YELLS OF DEMONS, AND THE HOWLINGS OF THE DAMNED IN DESPAIR!

3. As a third objection, we are told that a Camp-ground is the rendezvous of "females of loose character and of libertines;" where there are circumstances (left in the dark by your wise informant) inviting them to the practice of debauchery! Messrs. Editors! what think you of this sweeping accusation? Unaccompanied by a single affidavit—will not the judicious regard it as a reckless thrust at the reputation of the patrons of Camp-meetings of whatever name, sex, or dignity?

4. The final objection against these meetings, is, "They are the direct occasion of the desecration of the Sabbath." And then comes the grand impediment not called a "reason," yet some will imagine a greater one than the "four" together; "The Pastor is deprived of his congregation and of his Sunday School, both teachers and pupils." Alackaday! that people should be so fond of new things as to desert a Pastor, so zealous and faithful, so unbiased and intelligent, and who has the good of their souls so much at heart, for the purpose of listening to the boisterous preaching of the unintelligent at a Camp Meeting, and of seeing the miserable, deluded creatures in the altar and elsewhere, "fall apparently lifeless" under the "powerful excitement of a nervous paroxysm;" all the time dreaming that it is "the special and sanctifying operation of the Holy-Spirit" which they so intensely feel!

But behold the cap of the climax! The Sabbath positively, shall no longer be desecrated, in consequence of the obnoxious Camp Meetings. "I publicly ask them to determine that they shall not be continued over the Sabbath." Very well. Such assumption of authority shall not pass unrewarded.

Bring the crown, and the purple robe, blazing with gems of honor, and immediately invest the most worthy.—LET THE TELEGRAPHS OF THE NATION, RAPID AS LIGHTNING, CONVEY THE JOYFUL TIDINGS, THAT THE PRESENT LOOSE AND DEMORALIZING GOVERNMENT IN CHURCH AND STATE IS DISSOLVED; AND MONARCHY OF DIVINE RIGHT, SECULAR AND ECCLESIASTICAL, IS ESTABLISHED IN THE LAND OF WASHINGTON!

S. B. YARRINGTON,
Pastor of the M. E. Church on Truxton Circuit.
De Ruyter, July 31, 1840.

The population of Providence is 32,042, in 1830, it was 16,832, in 1820, 11,767.

The population of the city of Utica is 12,675, in 1835 it was 10,019.

The Army of the U. S. contains 12,577 men. The total number of militia is about 1,400,000.

Heavy Damages.—Mr. McKenney has obtained a verdict of $5,323, against Neil, Moores & Co., stage proprietors at Columbus, O., for damages occasioned by the upsetting of a coach while in charge of a driver who was incapable of taking charge of the horses.

The Camden and Amboy train of cars lately ran over a woman who lay upon the road, in a state of beastly intoxication.

The steamboat Coriscan was lately sunk on her way from New Orleans to St. Louis, near Memphis, having on board $300,000 belonging to a colony of German emigrants bound to Peoria. It is supposed that the money would be recovered by raising the boat.

A perfect Albino has been discovered by the marshal taking the census in Queens county. Its parents are negroes. The child is three years old, perfectly white, with hair white and crisped like wool.

The board of Inspectors of Auburn State Prison have adopted the following resolution: "Resolved, That the Agent procure five hundred volumes of Harper's School District Library, for the use of the convicts in the prison." This is regarded as an important movement towards the moral elevation of the prisoners.

The Oswego Palladium says: five women and two children, composing part of a pleasure party from French Creek, Jefferson Co., were drowned by the upsetting of the boat. The men, seven in number, swam ashore.

Bills of indictment for malicious mischief, have been found by the Grand Jury against Captain Roe and Hancox, of the De Witt Clinton and Napoleon, and against Mr. Lewis the pilot of the Napoleon.

The Washington Intelligencer states that three hundred and forty four bushels of documents and papers, were sent from the Washington Post Office on the last day of the session of Congress.

At the annual commencement of Union College, the first degree of the Arts was confered on one hundred and five young men; and the second, on twenty-five.

Capt. Talcott, of the U. S. Engineers, Prof. Renwick, of Columbia College, and Prof. Cleaveland, of Ohio, have been appointed by the President, commissioners to explore and survey the North Eastern Boundary, under the act of Congress which appropriated $25,000 for the purpose.

The steam-boat Chester, collapsed two of her flues about 20 miles above New Orleans, killing the mate and three other persons. Four others were severely scalded.

There is living in the town of Fall River, a female, seventeen years of age who is a widow. She was fourteen when married, and has a son two years old, or more.

T. B. Hudson, Esq., and A. B. Chamber, Esq., of St. Louis, exchanged three shots at 40 paces distant with rifles, on Bloody Island, in order to settle honorably, a political dispute. The shots were without effect. After the third shot the friends interposed and affected a reconciliation.

A prisoner on Blackwell Island was recently shot, in attempting to make his escape by swimming across East River.

New York Police.—Justin Matthews was ordered to pay two dollars for being drunk. "Is that the law?" asked Justin. "It is," replied his worship. "Then," remarked Justin, "I don't wonder why you grant so many tavern licenses."

Those Horses.—Mr. Edward Dyer, auctioneer, at Washington, advertises that on the 7th of August he will sell, by auction, the two Arabian horses presented by the Sultan of Muscat to the President of the United States.

Major General Scott was at Buffalo on Monday, and was to review the troops at the barracks in that city the next day.

It is estimated by the Connecticut Courant, that upward of seventy factories have ceased operations in New England, and that at least one fourth of the population of the United States are now out of employment.

A shark was caught in the Delaware, by a party who had been to Pea Shore, on Tuesday; it weighed near two hundred and fifty pounds, and was about ten feet long.

Steamboat Burnt.—The steamer American, Capt. Caldwell, was burnt to the water's edge on the 10th instant, at Rea's wood yard. The passengers and crew were all saved. Nothing was saved from the boat.—N. O. Bee.

Steamboat Disaster.—We are informed that the steamboat Reserve, ran against a snag at 12 o'clock last night, abuot 40 miles above the city. She sank immediately, and it is supposed that her cargo, which is very valuable, will be totally lost.—Mobile Register July 18.

Distressing.—Much sickness is said to prevail all along the Tennessee river.—Many farmers had deserted their farms and gone to the mountains, and the crops in the river bottoms were "drowned out."

Mills Burnt.—The mills owned by H. W. Potter, at Arnold's Hollow, Yates co. were destroyed by fire on Sunday evening last. The friction of the machinery of the smut mill is supposed to have been the cause of the fire. Loss not estimated.—Insurance $6,400.

Fire.—The dwelling house attached to the Sandy Hook Light House, and occupied by Mr. Brewer, was, on last Sunday week, burned to the ground. The Monmouth Inquirer says the fire had made considerable progress when first discovered. The furniture of Mr. Brewer was chiefly saved. The light house sustained some trifling damage.

A new printing machine has just been put into operation in Philadelphia, which prints 2500 cards per hour, with a deep, clear and beautiful impression. It was built by Stewart, the machinist, for Mr. Adams, card manufacturer and printer.

Naval.—The U. S. frigate Macedonian, and sloops of war Levant and Erie, sailed on the 11th instant from Pensacola, bound to Boston.

We learn from the Journal of Commerce that Mr. Davenport has got his electro-magnetic machine so far improved, that it will drive a printing press. A small paper called the Magnet, designed to diffuse information in regard to electro-magnetism, is printed by it. This is turning lightning to a useful purpose.

Very Late from Monrovia, Africa.—The United States schooner Grampus, Lieut. John S. Paine, commander, arrived at Boston on Tuesday, from a cruise off the African coast, last from Monrovia, which place she left on the 5th of June. The Grampus touched at St. Thomas, and left that port the 8th inst. She has not lost a man during the cruise. We have not yet received our letters or papers from Africa.—N. Y. Spectator.

From South America.—By an arrival at Philadelphia, advices a little later, to the 4th of June, have been received from Montevideo. According to these, another battle was fought on the 10th of May, between the forces of Echague and those of Lavelle, in which the former had the worst of it,—although neither party sustained any great loss. Lavelle has now sustained himself something like a year within the Argentine territory, and his strength has greatly increased by accessions from the discontented Buenos Ayreans. Oribe seems to "have gone into retiracy," for of late we hear nothing of him, and Rivera appears to be in quiet possession of the government of Montevideo.—Spectator.

Anecdote of Old Age.—One of the census-takers employed in Cincinnati, has found in his progress a man who tells him that his grandmother, who died since last census, at the age of 107, within four or five years of her death had her sight restored in a remarkable degree, an entire and ample head of hair, and a full set of teeth renewed to her, all of which remained till the day of her death. "In this case," the gentleman remarks, "the vis animi must have co-existed to a remarkable degree, for she was able to walk two miles to church until within two weeks of her death. It may be added that up to the day of her death, there appeared to be no perceptible failure of the power of life. Her residence was in Greene County. My informant is a man of strict veracity, and says that witnesses enough can be found, to satisfy the most incredulous of the truth of this story." Thus far he has not found a centennarian.—Courier.

The Sac and Fox Indians, and the Winnebagoes.—We learn from Prairie Du Chien, that sixteen chiefs of the Sac and Fox tribe of Indians, among whom was old Keokuck, were waiting at that place for the coming in of the chiefs of the Winnebagoes, to enter into an amicable treaty between the respective tribes. About twenty chiefs of the latter tribe had arrived, but they declined acting until the arrival of two more of the principal chiefs, whose families and relations had suffered most in the conflict which took place last winter. The Sacs offer to pay the Winnebagoes $3000, by way of remuneration for the carnage which occurred, but the Winnebagoes it is said demand $12,000.

A destructive hail storm passed over the towns of Bloomfield, Canton and Simsbury, in this county, on Sunday morning last. We learn that hail stones fell as large as hazlenuts, and that the damage done to buildings and vegetation is very great. In some houses, from one to two hundred panes of glass were broken.—Hartford Courant.

Fatal Accident.—In repairing a scow at the Saratoga Lake on Saturday, while a portion was elevated for the purpose, it fell and crushed one of the workmen, Mr. Elias Baker, aged 52. Ever part of his body except the head, was literally mashed, causing instant death.

From the Boston Post of Monday.

THE BRITANNIA.

On her arrival at Halifax, the whole population lined the wharves and greeted her with repeated huzzas and shouts. The Admiral commanding the English frigate Winchester, had her splendidly dressed in colors and fired a salute, which has never been done before to a private steamer.—From the Governor, Sir Colin Campbell, and the other authorities, Mr. Cunard received every attention during his brief stay at Halifax, we are informed by the editor of the Evening Gazette, who was present. As the Britannia entered our harbor and approached the city, she was saluted from Cunard wharf, East Boston Point, long wharf South Boston, and from the cutter Hamilton, lying in the stream brilliantly illuminated, as was also the Maverick House. The Band on board the Columbus struck up "God save the Queen," on the Britannia's passing her. She hauled into her berth, at Cunard wharf, East Boston, about 10 o'clock, where she was received with loud and continued huzzas, amid a splendid display of fire-works. The pleasure of our citizens was very great in welcoming this noble ship to their shores, and the immense multitudes which passed over to East Boston, and crowded to the wharves, evinced a degree of interest we have seldom seen excelled here. The Grand Fete to be given Mr. Cunard, to-morrow, at East Boston, will be a splendid compliment—one worthy of the liberal hospitality of the Bostonians.

A schooner came in contact with the Britannia just as she entered the narrows, on Saturday evening, which carried away her bowsprit and did considerable injury to the bow and wheel-house of the Britannia.

The Britannia will leave this city on the 1st of August, 1840, for Liverpool, touching at Halifax.

The Britannia is 230 feet long, by 32 feet between the paddle boxes. Her forecastle is four feet above the main deck.

Fire at Syracuse.—We learn from the Syracuse Signal that a fire broke out early last Thursday morning, in the old wooden buildings on the tow path, west of the Clinton street bridge, occupied by some twenty-five or thirty Irish familes, and before the flames were extinguished, they destroyed the buildings in which they originated, the adjacent joiner's shop, with all its tools and contents, a soap and candle factory, the lumber yard of Messrs. Reynolds & Co., and the Eagle Tavern and out-buildings. The loss of property had not been ascertained.

Remarkable Instance of Canine Sagacity.—A gentleman of property had a mastiff of great size, very watchful, and, altogether, a fine intelligent animal. Though often let out to range about, he was in general chained up during the day in a wooden house, constructed for his comfort and shelter. On a certain day, when let out, he was observed to attach himself particularly to his master; and when the servant, as usual, came to tie him up, he clung so to his master's feet—showed such anger when they attempted to force him away, and altogether was so particular in his manner, that the gentleman desired him to be left as he was, and with him he continued the whole day; and when night came on, still he staid by him, and on going towards his bedroom, the dog resolutely, and for the first time in his life, went up along with him, and rushing into the room, took refuge under the bed, from whence neither blows nor caressess could draw him. In the middle of the night a man burst into the room, and, dagger in hand, attempted to stab the sleeping gentleman; but the dog darted at the robber's neck, fastened his fangs in him, and so kept him down that his master had time to call for assistance and secure the ruffian, who turned out to be the coachman, and who afterwards confessed, that seeing his master receive a large sum of money, he and the groom conspired together to rob and murder him—and that they plotted their whole scheme leaning over the roof of the dog's house!—Dublin Magazine.

Riot in Philadelphia.—On Monday morning, about nine o'clock as the workmen were going to commence their labors on the Philadelphia and Trenton railroad track, in Kensington district, near Master street, they were attacked by a body of citizens, and compelled to desist. Finding it impossible to resume, the authorities of the city were consulted, and they despatched about one hundred police officers to the ground, who, when they arrived, attempted to protect the laborers engaged on the road, from the violence of the mob. But the mob, having recruited their forces in the meantime, renewed the attack, and a general fight ensued; the workmen were driven from the track, and several of the police seriously injured. After the police were beaten, the mob retired until evening, when they renewed their riotous proceedings, by setting fire to a public house, owned by Mr. Nagle, the President of the rail road company, in which several of the police had assembled to partake of a supper. The house was burned to the ground.

The Industry of Massachusetts.—According to an official report made to the Legislature, it appears that the product of the great branches of manufacturing industry in Massachusetts, during the year ending in April, 1837, was $91,700,000; of which sum the principal items were, cotton fabrics, $17,409,000; woollen fabrics, $10,399,000; and fisheries, $7,592,000. If to the products of manufacturing industry, be added the earnings of navigation and agriculture, it is estimated that the whole annual product of the industry of Massachusetts, exceeds $100,000,000; which divided by 700,000, the population of the State, gives $140 as the average value of the annual labor of each man, woman and child in the community. The whole value of the industry of the cotton growing country of the Southern States, with a population of 2,500,000, is equal to $100,000,000; and the annual value of the labor of each man, woman and child in the slaveholding states, is estimated at only $40.

A Magnificent Plant.—We find in one of our late English papers, the following description of a splendid botanical curiosity:—

"There is at this time a splendid specimen of Cereus speciosissima in the store of T. Short, Esq., of Martin, near Doncaster, covering 98 square feet of trellis, on which is grafted that beautiful plant Epiphyllune speciosum, which covers 18 square feet of trellis, and is covered with 390 blossoms; it is one sheet of red pink, and considered one of the largest specimens in England. On the same plant is grafted twelve other species of Cacti."

Martyrs.—According to the calculation of some, about 200,000 Christian Protestants suffered death, in seven years, under Pope Julian; no less than 100,000 were massacred by the French in the space of three months; Waldenses who perished amounted to 1,000,000; within thirty years the Jesuits destroyed 900,000; under the Duke of Alve, 36,000 were executed by the hang-man, 150,000 by the Irish massacred, besides the vast multitude of whom the world could never be particularly informed who were postscribed, starved, burned, assassinated, chained to the gallies for life, or immured within the walls of the Bastile, or others of their Church or state prisons. According to some, the whole number of persons massacred since the rise of Papacy, including the space of 1,400 years, amounts to 50,000,000!

THE SACRIFICE.

BY MRS. M. L. GARDNER.

It was a golden morning;
The sun shone bright upon Chaldea's plain,
As from his watery bed he rose and hastened
On his errand through the skies, casting his Beams on human joys, and lighting up the Scenes of earth in splendor.

But when he reached the mountain's top,
He veiled his face in clouds, to see the young,
The beautiful, the guiltless, urging his Way beside his aged father, bearing
In his young arms the fatal wood, toward
Moriah's dizzy height, himself the sacrifice!
In all the innocence of youth, in all
The pure simplicity of nature, how
His sweet face beamed as his mild eye looked Upward, and in touching pathos, asked, "Where Is the lamb, my father!"

"God will provide one,"
Was the prompt reply. Ah me! did not the Patriarch's arm grow weak, his eye grow dim,
And his whole frame seem paralyzed, as on
The wood he bound his only boy!

The glittering steel gleamed high, and
The fierce blaze commenced its dreadful work, when,
Throned in light, arrayed in vestments glittering
Like the moon upon a fleecy cloud of
Azure brightness, an angel form was seen,
Crying, in accents sweet as seraph's tone,
And soft as music on the placid lake,
"Thou man of God, forbear!"

Can fancy form more finished
Happiness, bliss more exquisite, rapture
More divine, than that which glowed in Abraham's
Soul, as he looked up, and saw the heavenly
Vision? as he unbound his beauteous
Boy, with fond parental love and holy
Transport, bade him rise and live!

MISCELLANEOUS.

TEMPERANCE AMONG THE CATHOLICS.—The efforts made by Father Matthew in the cause of temperance, have given a new impulse to the work in this country. We have already noticed the movement among the Catholics in Lowell, and also at Philadelphia, and other parts of Pennsylvania.—The following is an extract of a pastoral letter of Bishop Patrick, of Philadelphia, "to the clergy and laity" of the Diocese, dated June 24th.—New York Obs.

In harmony with these views, several of our most zealous clergymen have proposed to establish a society similar to that which has been established by the zeal of an humble Priest in Ireland, with a pledge of total abstinence from all intoxicating liquors. The end and object of this association being the extirpation of vice, it is deemed expedient that its members should not confine themselves to the renouncing of any special drink, which may more frequently be the cause of intoxication, but of all that can intoxicate, so as to leave to the weak no occasion of temptation. In a spirit of generous devotedness, thousands of most temperate habits, have joined the Irish Association, to encourage others by their example, and to afford to all the facility of practicing without shame that total abstinence, which to some is absolutely necessary. In the same devoted spirit several of our venerable brethren, whose exemplary piety and zeal console and sustain us in our arduous charge, have come forward, anxious to redeem from the thraldom of perverse customs and inveterate habits, the weak and the unfortunate, who struggle with this infatuating passion. We cannot but applaud the zeal, from which this proposition has sprung, and express publicly in strong terms, our approbation of every effort, that our venerable brethren may make in various congregations committed to their charge.—Whether on that plan or such a plan as in their prudence may be found suitable to the local circumstances, and may finally lead to the result desired by all—the total extirpation of the vice of intemperance.

THE CATACOMBS OF PARIS.

These immense excavations extend under a considerable part of the capital, and they have no doubt furnished its building materials since the earliest times. They are no longer worked, because the streets and many of the houses having been undermined, the surface of the ground as well as buildings occasionally fell in, and the government felt it necessary to check the farther progress of the evil. Pillars have been constructed in the most exposed situations, and as it is some time since I have heard of any accident, I presume there are no farther apprehensions. The entrance is secured; and admittance is obtained with some difficulty! for in Europe the public authorities are more careful of life than we are, and persons having been separated from the guides have become lost and perished in this vast field of the dead. What end can be more frightful!—To wander in this immense charnel-house, surrounded by the most revolting emblems of mortality, to perish in the midst of departed generations, is terrible indeed. The bones are all arranged with horrible symmetry. Pillar after pillar, and wall after wall, of arms and legs and ribs, hedge in the visitor, and form a narrow path, along which he follows the guide in impressive silence. And as the torches, which are carried, and which alone light up these regions impenetrable to-day, shed their feeble and flickering rays upon these sad memorials of humanity, the scene is painful beyond description. And then come the columns of skulls, and you may almost fancy, as the fitful light strikes them, that they are grinning upon you with diabolical malice. The whole cavern resembles the Valley of the Shadow of Death, so powerfully described by the prophet, rendered still more strange by the display of a kind of taste in the arrangement of the materials. I breathed freer when the portal of this great tomb closed behind me.—Hon. Mr. Cass in Democratic Review.

THE FATE OF MEN OF TALENT.—Homer was a beggar; Plutus turned a mill; Terence was a slave; Boethius died in jail; Paul Borghese had fourteen trades and died with them all; Tasso was often distressed for five shillings; Bentinoglio was refused admittance into a hospital he had himself erected; Cervantes died of hunger; Camoens, the celebrated writer of the Lusiad, ended his days, it is said, in an alms-house, and at any rate was supported by a faithful black servant, who begged in the streets of Lisbon for the only man in Portugal on whom God had bestowed those talents which have a tendency to exalt the spirit of a downward age; and Faugelas left his body to the surgeons to pay his debts as far it would go.

In England, Bacon lived a life of meanness and distress; Sir Walter Raleigh died on a scaffold; Spencer, the charming Spencer, died forsaken and in want; the death of Collins was caused through neglect, it producing mental derangement:

"Each lovely scene shall thee restore,
For thee the tear be duly shed;
Beloved till life can charm no more,
And mourned though pity's self be dead!"

Milton sold his copyright of Paradise Lost for fourteen pounds, at three payments, and finished his life in obscurity; Dryden lived in poverty and died in distress; Otway died prematurely and through hunger; Lee died in the streets; Steele lived a life of perfect warfare with the bailiffs; the Vicar of Wakefield was sold for a trifle, to save Goldsmith from the gripe of the law; Fielding lies in a burying ground of the English factory at Lisbon, without a stone to mark the spot; Savage died in prison at Bristol, where he was confined for a debt of eight pounds; Chatterton, the child of genius and misfortune, destroyed himself; John Kates died of a broken heart, occasioned it is said, by the merciless manner in which his works were received.

AN ANECDOTE FOR MAN-WORSHIPPERS.—Patrick Henry's biographer, gives the following incident. When Mr. Henry was verging towards three score and ten years, the political aspect of affairs, induced him to forego the comforts of his retirement, and to be presented as a candidate, for the house of delegates. On the day of the election, as soon as he appeared on the ground, he was surrounded by the admiring and adoring crowd, and whithersoever he moved, a concourse follow d him. A preacher whose piety was wounded, by this homage paid to a mortal, asked the people aloud—Why they thus followed Mr. Henry? Mr. Henry, said he, is not a God!—No, said Mr. Henry, deeply affected, both by the scene, and by the remark, "no my friend, I am but a poor worm of the dust; as fleeting and unsubstantial, as the shadow of the cloud that flies over your fields and is remembered no more." The tone with which this was uttered, and the look which accompanied it, affected every heart, and silenced every voice. Envy and opposition were disarmed, by humility; the recollection of his past services, rushed upon every memory, and he read his history in their swimming eyes. Here was an affecting illustration, of the principle, that he that humbleth himself shall be exalted.

TRY.—"Let a man sit down at the foot of a great mountain," says Dr. Johnson, "to contemplate its greatness, and he will be ready to say, I can never go over it, the attempt is futile. Yet, on the second thought, he concludes the task can be performed, not by one mighty leap, but by successive steps, and by the simple process of putting one foot before the other."

Again: "The chief art," says Locke, "is to attempt but a little at a time. The wildest excursions of the mind are made by short flights frequently repeated. The most lofty fabrics are formed by the accumulation of propositions."

Drops of water constitute the ocean.—Sands make a mountain, and rocks are not worn away by sudden force, but by the continual droppings.

The more free mercies are, the more acceptible they should be to us, and we should be more thankful for them to God.

A noble heart, like the sun, shows its greatest countenance in its lowest estate.

The number of females in Portugal is 827,947. The whole population is 3,223,474.

FOR THE FARMER.

From the Mercury.

No apology can be necessary for calling the attention of the readers of the Mercury, particularly those of this county, to the subject of Cattle, and the necessity of adopting the best breeds introduced from abroad into our pastures and dairies. It costs but little more to keep a breed of cattle that will weigh from seven to ten hundred at two years old, than it does to keep a kind that must be kept till they are three or four before they will reach the same weight. Size, beauty, quickness of motion, rapidity in fattening, and great milken qualities, are rarely found combined in the same animal, or the same breed, and one of the reasons, (perhaps the greatest,) is the attention of the breeder of cattle to a single excellence, by which the other valuable properties are lost sight of, and perhaps destroyed. It is unquestionably true, that every perfection in cattle, whether it be one of form and quality of flesh, of disposition to fatten or yield milk, can be promoted and retained solely by the breeder's devoted attention to his particular object; and if one object be allowed a paramount importance in the breeder's estimation and practice, other objects will suffer in proportion as they are neglected. But it does not hence follow, that a breed of cattle may not be produced, which shall combine the greatest number and greatest degree of good qualities which can be compatible with uniform excellence, and in the opinion of the best judges and breeders of cattle both at home and abroad, the point of uniform goodness in all the qualities, designed to make cattle valuable, has been nearer approached in the "Improved Short Horns," than any other breed.

In our remarks on the subject of cattle, we shall avail ourselves of the best authorities on the subject within our reach, and owing to the enterprising spirit and good sense of citizens of our own and other states, we are not without as fine specimens of the best improved breeds as can be shown abroad, to direct the opinion and inform the judgment; but in comparing the several breeds, we must look abroad for estimates founded on actual experiments, and as a writer on cattle, none stands higher than the Rev. Mr. Berry, who by his skill in selecting and judgment in breeding, has raised the Short Horn to its present proud pre-eminence.

It will not be necessary here to trace the history of the several breeds from which the Short Horns in their improved state, descended: Those who wish for information on this topic, are referred to the 4th volume of the Genesee Farmer; to British Husbandry, British Cattle; or the masterly treatises of the Rev. Mr. Berry. It is enough to state here, that Mr. Colling is considered as the founder of the improved Short Horns—that this improvement was principally effected by means of his celebrated bull Hubback—and in the language of Mr. Berry, "As we have at present no superior horse on the turf which does not boast the blood of the Godolphin Arabian, so it may be asserted that we have no superior Short Horns which do not claim descent nearly or remotely from Hubback."

In consequence of Mr. Colling's health failing him, his herd of cattle went into the hands of Rev. Mr. Berry. He found on investigating the subject, that he had a herd of cattle rather ungainly in size, and milkers would give large quantities, but inferior in quality: these defects he resolved to alter. This he succeeded in doing, by a cross with the Galloway, a breed with deep massive bodies, good milkers, however small in quantity, but very rich in quality, and short legs, and well calculated to bring the Teeswater cattle nearer the ground, and add weight, firmness and hardness. In breeding his cattle, the great object of Mr. Berry was to retain the many good qualities of the Teeswater. He was much favored by circumstances in promoting his object, which was to take one cross and the breed and the Teeswater, the only course, by the way, in which crossing can be successfully adopted. To breed from the produce of a cross directly among themselves, will lead directly to the results which have induced many persons without due consideration, to believe conclusive against crossing but to take one cross and the return, and adhere to one breed, will, in the course of a few generations, stamp a variety with sufficient certainty.

The principle of crossing here laid down we consider of very great consequences, as it is the only one by which a good quality can be introduced and made permanent in the variety. It is the only one by which the excellence, be it from maturity or milken, can be rendered habitual in the breed, and become, instead of an accidental quality, a part of the constitution, and typical of the race. Attention here can perpetuate any desirable quality to the greatest extent, and the experiments of Mr. Culley, Mr. Berry, Mr. Whitaker, Mr. Smith, and others in England, have demonstrated the soundness of the theory. Early maturity and aptitude to fatten, were the grand object of the early breeders of the short horns, and on these points they succeed to a perfection which left nothing to be desired. Early maturity is the distinguishing characteristic of the Short Horns and their capacity to continue growing, and at the same time, attaining an unexampled ripeness of condition at an early age, has excited the wonder and obtained the approbation of all not blinded by unworthy prejudices. To illustrate this property of early maturity, and show the great advantages gained by adopting a breed affording such results, we shall give from Mr. Berry a few instances of animals fitted for the butcher, their age and weight.

"A steer, bred by Col. Cook, (of Oustan near Doncaster,) fed on potatoes and straw, was slaughtered when two years and twenty-two days old; His quarters weighed 684 lbs."

"Mr. John Rennie produced at the East Lothian agricultural meeting, a steer aged two years and four months, whose four quarters weighed 1308 lbs. Also, a steer aged three years and six months, whose quarters weighed 1459 lbs. and the tallow 241 lbs. The same gentleman also exhibited a steer, between 18 and 20 months old, the quarters of which weighed 1044 lbs."

"Mr. Robertson, near Berwick, produced at the Agricultural Society meeting, the following cattle fed on turnips:

A steer three years and a half old, four quarters, 1898 lbs.; tallow 295 lbs.

A steer three years and ten months old, four quarters 1840 lbs.; tallow 294 lbs.

An ox four years and a half old, four quarters 1990 lbs.; tallow 324.

Mr. Smith entered for a sweep-stakes, a twin heifer, calved in April, to be shown in June, when she would be two years old.—She was fed through the winter on turnips and hay, with 400 lbs. oil cake, and was turned out to grass in May. On the 23d of July, she weighed 872 lbs. having gained in 30 weeks 480 lbs."

These instances will demonstrate their peculiar character of fattening early; and that they may be made to combine the qualities hitherto considered incompatible with good feeders and good milkers, the experiment of Mr. Berry clearly shows. It was found, as the qualities of the unimproved Durham cattle became developed, that by a too exclusive regard to form and propensities to fatten early and easily, the important one of good milking had been neglected; and that in this respect, they were inferior to some other varieties of English cattle.—The qualities of form and fattening, had become habitual; the object now was to engraft on these properties of good milkers which was successfully made by the cross Mr. Berry made with the Galloways. In this improvement, which was completely successful, Mr. Berry took the lead, which has made a very great improvement in the improved Short Horns.

We regard the establishment of these principles in regard to crossing, (and they have been adopted with the beautiful little Devons, and our own native breed of cattle,) which has resulted in excellent cross, well worthy the attention of the dairy-men, and as proving most conclusively the engrafting of any desirable quality, and then rendering it constitutional and permanent. As a proof that the improved Short Horns are not inferior in dairy properties, we give the following statement from the work on "Cattle," published by the Society for the diffusion of Useful Knowledge. The experiment was made by Mr. Calvert of Sandsike, on the milk of a cow put by itself, and an accurate account of the butter produced weekly, kept by, for the time stated. Each week gave as follows:—9, 12, 11, 19, 21, 18, 17, 16, 15, 15, 15, 16, 17, 16, 15, 14, 14, 15, 15, 15, 17, 16, 15, 11, 13, 12, 12, 11, 10, 9, 8, 7; Total, 458 lbs. of butter in 32 weeks. She averaged 25 quarts a day for 20 weeks; the greatest, 33 quarts a day. The pasture was by no means of a superior quality. This instance of diary excellence is pronounced not a singular one, in the work alluded to; but we believe, all will allow, that such products cannot be found any where except among the very best cattle. Instances of great yield, both of milk and butter for a single week, are on record in this country, from the improved and common kind of cows: but we have met with no accounts properly authenticated, equal to the above, the season included.

Some farmers in England have asserted, and the opinion has been advanced in this country, that the short horns are not fit for work. The correctness of this may well be doubted. We know of no instance when the improved stock have been used as oxen; they command too high a price as bulls, to be condemned to the yoke: but instances have occurred in which the bulls have been worked on the farm, and as was to have been expected from their disposition, proved perfectly docile and manageable.—To the above objection an English writer replies:—"They work admirably, but surely cattle which are fit to go as profitably to the butcher at two years old, as any other breed at 3 or 4, ought never, as a general rule, to be placed in the yoke. No beast, in the present advanced state of breeding, ought upon a system which arose out of the necessity of obtaining compensation by work for the loss attending a tardy maturity."

The color of the Short Horns, the improved variety, is red or white, or a mixture of the two combining in endless variety, and producing very frequently a fine effect. The imported bull that was exhibited last fall before the Agricultural Society of this county, by Doct. Smith, of North Canaan, was decidedly the best bull, I think, I ever saw. His form, marks of color and docility of appearance, resembles the full bloods of the improved species—therefore, we have no reason to doubt, but that, he is a thorough bred Herd Book animal, and should be patronized by every farmer who may avail himself of an opportunity. His stock unquestionably will be good for the dairy, and stands unrivaled in America.—The white, it is very probable, they obtained from an early cross with a white or wild breed from the Tees; and whenever this color shows itself, it is accompanied with a red line, more or less on the extremity of the ear—a distinctive character of the wild cattle. No pure improved Short Horns are found of any colors but those above named. This should be remembered; for there are Short Horns of the improved kind, black, pied, or black and white, blue and dun, and of all shades, and there can be no doubt, that multitudes of these inferior animals, or crosses with them, are finding their way to market as the pure improved Short Horns.

If the improved Short Horns are to be extensively introduced into this country, it will be in the same way, and for the same reason, that all our improvements are adopted. It will not be in consequence of any abstract or theoretical reasoning on their merits, but because they are found on experience, to be more profitable than any other stock. They are what may be called an artificial breed; it is already one of the largest in the world; and possesses one advantage which no other breed possesses in an equal degree, which is this; that great numbers of skilful and experienced persons have, for a long series of years, not only adopted this breed in preference to any others, but have selected out of itself, the animals that they deemed of superior quality, to breed from them alone; so that now it may be called a picked or chosen race, from which all beasts having any imperfection, have been carefully excluded.

The man who introduces this valuable bred of cattle into any neighborhood of farmers, is a benefactor to the community, and should be regarded as such. Prejudice may decry, and ignorance may sneer; but we know that the good sense of farmers will not always slumber; and in the approval of the intelligent, and the certainty of ultimate profit, he may find his reward.

THE RIGHT SPIRIT IN RELIGIOUS DISCUSSION.

In all discussion this is requisite, but in religious discussion there is the most urgent demand for it. Let this spirit be habitually cherished, and it will be manifested; it will flow out naturally when its developement is needed. Religious controversy, (in the common usage of that word,) I dislike; but calm religious discussion, I love.

We speak about the advancement of the church in holiness. One of the strongest indications which can be furnished, is, not a studied reserve on subjects on which religious people differ, nor the treatment of those subjects in such a style as to come to no decision, or if any thing is definitely said, to be sure and half unsay it as soon as possible; but a frank and candid comparison of views on topics concerning which we entertain different opinions.—The inquiry should ever be in our hearts—What doth our Master require?

A father having occasion to leave home, left certain directions for his affectionate children. During his absence they entertained different opinions about the meaning of what he had said. They did not quarrel; O no! not they; but they discussed the matter to know precisely what their father had said, and what he meant, for they were all anxious to please him. I need not dwell upon the application; christians are children of one family.

In religious discussion great care should be taken not to impeach the motives of those from whom we differ. In this particular ministers should be especially on their guard, for if they accuse each other of wrong motives, for example, of grasping at ecclesiastical power, they furnish the irreligious with a weapon, the strokes of which the church will feel.

But with proper care, ministers may publicly discuss questions about those doctrines and measures wherever they do not agree, so as not only to save the people from the impression that 'the ministers quarrel,' but so as to make all feel—the ministers are anxious to know what the Lord Jesus Christ requires them and the members of their churches to do for the promotion of his kingdom. THE DUTY OF PRAYER.

Manner in which Prayer ought to be made.

We are to pray with an apprehension of the majesty of God, and a due sense of his glorious attributes. He is clothed with majesty and decked with light, as with a garment. He rideth upon the wings of the winds, and his angels he maketh as a flame of fire. Before him angels bow, saints adore, and the pillars of heaven quake. The greatest solemnity and deepest reverence, therefore, become all his worshipers. We are to come before him as a spirit, infinite, unchangeable, eternal, and self-existent. Impressed with a sense of our own nothingness and his transcendent excellence, having high and reverential thoughts of him and low and abasing thoughts of ourselves we are to address the Throne of Grace. We ought to consider him as omnipresent and omniscent, to whom our secret thoughts and the principle whence our action flow, are better known than they can be to ourselves. He is infinitely holy, and of course must be displeased with that worship which proceeds from a conscience defiled with sin, or is performed in an unholy, irreverent manner. Thus the prophet says, addressing himself to God, Thou art of purer eyes than to behold evil and canst not look on iniquity; that is, thou canst not behold it without the utmost detestation, and therefore, if we regard it in our hearts, he will not hear our prayers.

2. Our supplications are to be offered to Heaven with the deepest humility or affecting sense of our own unworthiness. A deep sense of unworthiness naturally flows from high and reverential thoughts of the Divine excellence and greatness. If we have any right views, either of God or of ourselves, we shall feel infinitely below him. He is in Heaven, we are on the earth. The most exalted, intelligent creatures worship him with the greatest humility.—The seraphim are represented as covering their faces with their wings, when in the divine presence, as if unworthy to behold his glory, or to be employed in his service.

3. Faith must likewise accompany our prayers to the mercy seat. Faith in the blood of the Redeemer is necessary to the acceptance of our prayers. Whatsoever is not of faith is sin. Faith seems to be essential to our keeping up a daily intercourse with the Father of our spirits. The principle will lead us to commit ourselves and all our concerns into a Savior's hands, depending on his merits and mediation for the supply of all our wants, viewing him as having purchased and as being authorized to apply all the benefits of the covenant of grace, which are the subject matter of our supplications to him. Thus we are instructed by the apostle Paul in respect to the manner of our prayers. I will, therefore, that men pray every where, lifting up holy hands without wrath and doubting. It is the will of God, that all men, all persons of every age, class and stations in life, attend statedly and constantly upon the duty of prayer. And they are to pray from holy motives, and to have no angry, unforgiving or vindictive passions. All malice, ill-will, and hatred, are in themselves unfit and sinful, and the duty cannot be properly performed, while they are indulged.

4. It will again be obvious to reflect, that we must attend upon the duty with diligence and sincerity. We are not to intermit or be unsteady in it, though worldly mindedness, or a pretense of urgent temporal business. God is to have our first thoughts, best services and choicest reflection, as being infinitely worthy of all our love, homage, adoration, gratitude and praise. Prayer to him is therefore a duty incumbent on all, high and low, rich and poor, and must be performed with sincerity and constancy. Every day, without suffering any wilful transactions to hinder, morning and evening should our voice ascend to our heavenly Father, for his smiles on our persons, our labors, our friends, the church, our nation and the whole world of mankind. It is as needful as our daily food, & we cannot be the friends of God, while we live in the allowed and habitual neglect of it. "Ye are my friends, if ye do whatsoever I command you." But we are commanded to pray, and therefore cannot customarily omit it, and be the friends of God. Some will pray occasionally when under Divine chastisements, bereaved of dear comforts and sorely afflicted; but in their prosperity they neglect and forget God. May the Lord help us all to obey the Divine command, and pray without ceasing, and in every thing give thanks. RICHARD PARKS.

DIVINE PROVIDENCE.

From the bosom of poverty and obscurity, in which I drew my first breath and spent my earliest years, I have raised myself to a state of opulence, and some degree of celebrity in the world. A constant good fortune has attended me through every period of my life to my presnt advanced age, and my descendants may be desirous of learning what were the means of which I made use, and which, thanks to the assisting hand of Providence, have proved so eminently successful.

And here let me with all humility acknowledge, that to Divine Providence I am indebted for the felicity I have hitherto enjoyed. It is that power alone which has furnished me with the means I have employed, and that has crowned me with success. My faith in this respect leads me to hope, though I cannot count upon it, that the Divine goodness will still be exercised toward me, either by prolonging the duration of happiness to the close of life, or by giving me fortitude to support any melancholy reverse which may happen to me as to so many others. My future fortune is known but to Him in whose hand is our destiny, and can make our very afflictions subservient to our benefit.

The young reader would do well to pay attention to the history of the man, who by his industry, perseverance, and economy, arrived to riches and honor. He is the first American philosopher. It is true that every man is not born with a genius like Franklin, bvt every man may and ought to be honest and industrious in his station.—Life of Franklin.

VALUE OF A SINGLE SAINT.—One saint is more valued by God than the whole world of the wicked. God is the God of all creatures, but peculiarly the God of Abraham, and of his seed: one Abraham is more deeply rooted in his heart, than all the world; and he doth more entitle himself the God of Abraham, than the God of the whole world; in that style he speaks to Isaac, "I am the God of Abraham, thy father," much more the God of Israel—the God of the whole Church, of which Abraham was but a member, though the father of the faithful, and a feoffee of the covenant. God hath a greater value for one sincere soul, than for a whole city; he saves a Lot and burns a Sodom; he drowns a world, and reserves a Noah. He secures his jewels, while he flings away the pebbles.—Rev S. Charnock.

PROPOSED INSCRIPTION TO VOLTAIRE.

An English gentleman being in Paris, when a subscription was circulated by a number of the Philosophers of the Voltaire school, for the purpose of erecting a statue to the memory of their oracle, put a stop to the whole proceeding by writing the following

INSCRIPTION FOR AN INTENDED MONUMENT OF VOLTAIRE.

Behold VOLTAIRE! deserving of a stone,
Who in Poetry was great,
In History little,
Still less in Philosophy, and
In Religion
Nothing at all.
His judgment precipitate,
His dishonesty extreme.
Loose women smiled upon him,
The half learned applauded him,
And the profane patronized him;
Though he spared neither God nor man,
A junto of Atheists,
Who call themselves philosophers,
Scraped some money together,
And raised this stone to his memory.

NEW YEAR'S EVE.

BY ALFRED TENNYSON.

If you're waking call me early, call me early mother dear,
For I would see the sun rise upon the glad New Year.
It is the last New Year that I shall ever see;
Then ye may lay me low i' the mould, and think no more of me.

To-night I saw the sun set; he sat and left behind
The good old year, the dear old time, and all my peace of mind;
And the New Year's coming up, mother, but I shall never see
The May upon the blackthorn, the leaf upon the tree.

Last May we made a crown of flowers: we had a merry day;
Beneath the hawthorn on the green, they made me queen of May;
And we danced about the May-pole, and in the hazle copse,
Till Charlese's wain came out above the tall white chimney-tops.

There's not a flower on all the hills: the frost is on the pane:
I only wish to live till the snow-drops come again:
I wish the snow would melt and the sun come out on high—
I long to see a flower so before the day I die.

The building Rook 'ill caw from the windy, tall elm tree,
And the tuneful Plover pipe along the fallow lea,
And the Swallow 'ill come back again with the summer o'er the wave;
But I shall lie alone, Mother, within the mouldering grave.

Upon the chancel-casement, and upon that grave of mine,
In the early, early morning the summer sun 'ill shine,
Before the red cock crows from the farm upon the hill,
When you are warm asleep, Mother, and all the world is still.

When the flowers come again, Mother, beneath the waning light,
Ye'll never see me more in the long gray fields at night;
When frrom the dry dark world the summer airs blow cool,
On the oat-grass and the sword-grass and bullrush in the pool,

Ye'll bury me, my Mother, just beneath the hawthorn shade,
And ye 'il come sometimes and see me where I am lowly laid.
I shall not forget ye, Mother, I shall hear ye when ye pass,
With your feet above my head in the long and pleasant grass.

I have been wild and wayward, but ye 'll forgive me now;
Ye 'll kiss me, my own Mother, upon my cheek and brow;
Nay—Nay, ye must not weep, nor let your grief be wild,
Ye should not fret for me, Mother, ye have another child.

If I can I'll come again, Mother, from out my resting place;
Though ye 'll not see me, Mother, I shall look upon your face;
Though I cannot speak a word, I'll hearken what you say;
And be often—often, with you, when ye think I'm far away,

Good night, good night, when I have said good night forever more,
And ye see me carried out from the threshhold of the door;
Don't let Effie come to see me till my grave is growing green;
She 'll be a better child to you than I have ever been.

She 'll find my garden tools upon the granary floor:
Let her take 'em: they are hers: I shall never garden more;
But tell her, when I 'm gone to train the rose-bush that I set
About the parlor window, and the box of mignonette.

Good night, sweet mother; call me when it begins to dawn;
All night I lay awake, but I fall asleep at morn;
But I would see the sun rise upon the glad New Year;
So if you 're waking call me, call me early, mother dear.

HARRIET'S SABBATH.

"I am sure that I keep the Sabbath," said Harriet to herself, as she looked down into the street beneath her window, where several boys were sliding upon the ice.—"There are these wicked boys, now, playing as if it were a week day. Agnes," she continued, addressing an older sister, "don't you think that I have kept this Sabbath holy?"

Agnes laid aside the books which had been open before her, and drew the little girl into her lap, as she said:

"First tell me how you have spent the day, my dear."

"Well, when I first awoke this morning, I said my prayers and dressed, and then it was time for breakfast. After that I studied my Sabbath School lesson until it was time to go, and our Sarah came into the dining room while I was there, and she said she never saw any little girl so careful to keep Sunday holy. She said that at Mrs. Jay's where she used to live, the children were romping and playing about all day, and never thought of reading the Bible."

"But," said Agnes, "perhaps those children have never been taught to do any better. But you have parents who try themselves to do right, and who teach you that the Sabbath is God's own day, and should therefore be spent in his service.—If you wished to play they would not allow you to do so." Harriet felt quite sorry to hear this. She had been proud all the day in the thought that she was better than Mrs. Jay's children, but the remarks of her sister seemed to place things in a new light.

"I am sure, Agnes, I should not play if they did allow it. But I will tell you the rest. From Sabbath School I went to church, and when I came home I read in the Bible, until it was time to go again in the afternoon, except the few minutes for dinner. Then, you know, that since meeting, this afternoon, I have been finding verses about angels; that is our Bible lesson for to-morrow, and I was determined to get more than any of the other girls. I have bit my tongue ever so many times when it was going to say something funny, and when George asked me how far it was to Washington, I told him I had rather talk of it some other day. And I feel very happy because I know that I have tried to be good."

"Yes," said Agnes "you have tried, and I am glad that you have told me all about it. But does God look upon the outward conduct, or upon the heart?"

"Upon the heart, certainly," answered Harriet.

"And can you tell me if he has been in all your thoughts to-day?" asked Agnes gently.

Harriet's countenance suddenly fell.

"No," said she, "I have thought of a great many things to-day, and I know that they were not serious ones. Now I will tell you truly, Agnes, why I like to go to church—but don't look at me, it seems as if your eyes could see into my heart. I like to think of all manner of things which might happen. Sometimes I do not hear a word the minister is saying. I get to thinking about beautiful things, which I should like to have, and you can't think how delightful it is."

"Yes I can," said Agnes, "because I sometimes do so myself."

"You?" cried Harriet, starting up with surprise. "Well, I declare, I can scarcely believe it!"

"I don't mean that I do so on the Sabbath," said Agnes.

"Oh, don't you? Well, is it very wrong?"

"I don't think it well to indulge in it at any time, but it becomes decidedly sinful on the Sabbath."

"I am sorry for it," said Harriet.—"What shall I do, then? If I don't think of such things, I shall have my head full of some other nonsense."

"You should listen to the sermon."

"Oh dear! It is as full of long, hard words as can be! I can't understand preaching."

"If you try to understand and listen attentively to every word, you will find that you will soon be able to comprehend almost all."

Harriet shook her head doubtfully.—There was a silence of several minutes.—At last Harriet said,

"Agnes,"—

"Well, my dear."

"I think I have broken every Sabbath of my life, just with sinful thoughts."

"I am afraid that we might all say so," said Agnes seriously. "I know that the more anxious I am to do, and to feel as I ought, the more evil thoughts seem to spring up in my heart. But papa says, that this is because our very watchfulness makes us to see what had escaped our notice."

"Is there no way, then," said Harriet mournfully, "to keep God's day perfectly holy?"

"We cannot do it in our own strength certainly, but we can tell our heavenly Father how weak and sinful we are, and entreat his help when we find our hearts leading us astray. He who commanded us to remember the day to keep it holy, has also taught us how to pray."—Youth's Companion.

FOR THE MINISTER.

MINISTERS OF THE GOSPEL AT THE LAST DAY.

Dear brethren, our office is no ordinary one. We are embassadors from the King of kings and Lord of lords to a revolted world. Never had men committed to them an embassy of such deep and everlasting moment. No work ever undertaken by mortals was so important, so solemn, or connected with such amazing consequences. Among all the thousands to whom we preach, not one but what will take an impression from us that will never wear out. The fate of millions through succeeding generations depends on our faithfulness. Heaven and hell will forever ring with recited memorials of our ministry. And oh! our own responsibilty. There is for us no middle destiny. Our stake is for a higher throne of glory, or for a deeper hell. For, to say nothing of the souls committed to our care, our work leads to the altar. Our home is by the side of the Shekinah. We have daily to go where Nadab and Abihu went, and to transact with him who darted his lightning upon them. It is a solemn thing to stand so near the holy Lord God.

Let us beware how, by unhallowed fervors, we bring false fire before the Lord. Let us not fail to devote to our best powers, our unceasing application, consecrated by unremitting prayer. Any thing rather than careless preparations for the pulpit, and a sleepy performance of it. Forget your father, forget your mother, but forget not this infinite work of God. Soon we shall appear with our respective charges before the judgment seat of Christ. What a scene will then open between a pastor and his flock, when all his official conduct towards them shall be scrutinized, and all their treatment of him and his gospel shall be laid open; when it shall appear that an omnipresent eye followed him into his study every time he sat down to write a sermon, and traced every line upon his paper, and every motion of his heart; and followed him into the pulpit, and watched every kindling desire, every drowsy feeling, every wandering thought, every reach after fame. Ah! my dear brethren, when you hear on the right hand the songs of bursting praise that you ever had existence, and on the left hand behold a company of wretched spirits, sending forth their loud lament that you had not warned them with a stronger voice, will you not regret that all your sermons were not more impassioned, and all your prayers more agonizing? But what is this that I see? A horrid shape more deeply scarred with thunder than the rest, around which a thousand dreadful beings, with furious eyes and threatning gestures, are venting their raging curses? It is an unfaithful pastor who went down to hell with most of his congregation; and those around him are the wretched beings whom he has decoyed to death. My soul turns away, and cries, give me poverty, give me the curses of a wicked world, give me the martyr's stake, but, O my God, save me from unfaithfulness to thee and the souls of men.— Dr. Griffin.

FOR THE CHRISTIAN.

THE HEART

"Blessed are the pure in heart for they shall see God." The heart on which our Lord here pronounces a blessing, is an heart that is not only inclined to God, but to him only and to nothing else but in obedience and subordination to him. An heart that really loves God above all things else, and all other things only for his sake; an heart that is always flaming up to Heaven, in ardent and fervent desires to please and honor God in time, and to enjoy him forever; an heart that sanctifies the Lord of Hosts himself, making him its only fear and only dread, an heart that is never afraid of evil tidings, but is always fixed, trusting in the Lord; an heart that is continually rejoicing in the Lord, whether it hath or hath not any least duty to the greatest gain, and the greatest suffering before the least sin; an heart that is never shaken either by hopes or fears, but remains steadfast and immoveable as a rock, whether the sun shines or tempest beat on it; an heart that is sound in the faith, submissive to the will, obedient to the law, constant in the service, and zealous in the glory of God, but meek, and humble, and kind, and true, and gentle, and just, and charitable towards others; in short, an heart that exercises itself to have always a "conscience void of offense towards God and towards man."—Bishop Beveridge.

THE CHRISTIAN'S GAIN.—How delightful a thing it is to count, and not count but feel the Christian's gain—faith and fidelity, peace with God through Christ, a renewed will, increasing love, and a hope full of immortality! And how short is the time of our suffering! if upon the whole we do not suffer, and are not richly compensated, even here, in every condition, by the afore-named advantages. Go on, knowing whom you have chosen; and let neither your own weakness, nor the frowns of the world terrify you: Christ will have his grace exalted in opposition to all discouraging, unbelieving thoughts from the former and a faithful acceptance of it, and establishment in it, will make you victorious over the latter.—Rev. T. Adam, of Wintringham.

CALLS OF GOD.

God calls in health. He speaks to us when we are well, for he knows we need to be in full possession of all our powers to attend aright to the great concern. In health we read his calls on the printed page; hear them from the sacred desk; trace them in the wants of providence; feel them in our hearts.

And in sickness God calls. He awakens in us apprehensions of danger; turns our thoughts to the past; carries our imaginations to the future; lets us look into the grave; discloses the solemnity of the judgment; gives an earnest of eternal retributions.

God speaks in prosperity, when all is bright and cheering, reminds us that our sun may soon be obscured "and storms of sorrow fall."

And he speaks in adversity, when all is dark and gloomy, directs our thoughts to a better world, where sorrow and sighing flee away and tears are wiped from every eye.

God calls in youth, when the heart is tender, before the world has bound it in iron fetters, and before evil habits are fixed; he says, Remember thy Creator in the days of thy youth.

And in manhood God calls, impresses us with the importance of being ready for early death and urges the duty of spending the remainder of our days in his service.

And then in old age he calls; reminds us that our sands are nearly run, that soon the silver cord will be loosed and the golden bowl broken, probation ended; destiny fixed.

In seasons of revival God calls. When others are converted and enter the ark of safety, he leads us to think that now is the accepted time, now the day of salvation. He impresses us with the belief that one call will be the last, that there will be a last time; that we may refuse Christ and grieve the Spirit once too often, and he excites the apprehension that now may be our last opportunity, and that if we now neglect to secure an interest in Jesus Christ we may never have another offer of mercy.

Reader, will you listen to this call of God? It may be your last! Disregard it at your peril! Hear what God says: Therefore will I number you to the sword, and ye shall all bow down to the slaughter; because when I called ye did not answer; when I spake ye did not hear, but did evil before mine eyes, and did choose that wherein I delighted not. Isa. lxv. 12. Read also Prov. i, 24—33. W. J. M.

FOR THE STUDENT.

From the Cincinnati Observer

SUGGESTIONS TO STUDENTS

Upon you the obligation to elevate your moral being is imposed; to diffuse as you advance in your career the blessings of Christian education.—Bear the proud honor meekly, but yet in the spirit which must contend for the mastery with energy unceasing, with vigilance untiring.

The world will soon receive you from these hallowed seats; soon the protection of those who have watched your every step, and by timely caution saved you perhaps, under Providence, from ruin, will cease; your connection with them will indeed terminate, but we trust that through all time your hearts will acknowledge the debt their labors of love have imposed.

You will meet in the journey of life, as we all have met, inconstancy, disappointment, change; the visions of your early days you will find are but shadows resting at last upon the sober certainty, that man was born for other and higher purposes; and yet there is much to cherish in youthful attachment, and even in youthful anticipation, when both are controlled by appropriate motives.

The infancy of our being, reminds us of the primitive purity of man; and though in after years like our sinful progenitor, we are destined to feel the thorns of a moral wilderness, still it is cheering to look back upon a period of even comparative innocence for it is a pledge that there is a redeeming principle in the government of God, that can reclaim the wanderer, and restore him to the paradise he has lost.

Your destiny is to labor; no excellence can be attained but at the expense of toil; there is no royal path to greatness. Shrink not then from effort; "nulla dies sine linea," should be written upon every object that meets your vision; all nature is progressive—if you do not advance, you must fall back upon the common mass of indolence and sin, which hangs upon the rear of the passing generation, and leaves no trace on the record of your own day that an immortal spirit existed.

Above all, remember that he only is wise whose hope is planted firmly on the will of Heaven. Without this all-controlling sentiment you may live indeed, like Hume and Voltaire and Rosseau; but you must die at last as they died.

With it, you may stand at the sepulchre of time—

"The darkened universe defy
To quench your immortality,
Or shake your trust in God."

FOR THE SAILOR.

THEY ARE PRAYING FOR US ON SHORE.—In a dreadful gale of wind, some years ago, there was a ship whose master was in the habit of attending the Bethel meetings on the river Thames, and whose vessel was always open for these social exercises. The gale was so severe, and the ship so much injured by it, that she became quite ungovernable; the master gave up all for lost, as every human effort seemed in vain, and nothing but a watery grave awaited them. There were two little boys in this vessel; one cried very much, and said he should be drowned; the other said, "Dont, cry, Jack, I am not afraid—it is now 8 o'clock, and they are praying for us on board of some ship in the Thames; you know they always pray for us when we are at sea." The captain heard the remark; it seemed to encourage him; he, and all hands, used every exertion, and it pleased God to abate the severity of the gale, and in thirty-eight hours afterwards, they were safe moored in the river, when they hoisted the signal flag for prayer, and had a meeting for praise and thanksgiving for their great deliverance. A friend who was on board at the time, and spoke to the lads, said to the one who made the above remark, "Was it you Dick, that cried during the gale, and was afraid of being drowned?"—"No, it was Jack; I was not afraid; don't you always pray for our ship in London?"—"Yes; and didn't you pray?" "Yes; I did." "And what did you say, my lad?"—"I said, Oh Lord, save my master! Oh Lord, save the ship! Let Daniel's God save the ship!" "I trust you always pray." "Yes, ever since the prayer meeting was held on board our ship; I never get into my hammock without having first prayed; but Jack won't although I tell him he must."—Sailor's Magazine.

FOR THE BACKSLIDER.

Furnished by a Clergyman in the West.

ADMONITION TO BACKSLIDERS.

There is an interesting family, who were among the early settlers of this country.—The father and mother were active and efficient members of the Presbyterian Church in Pennsylvania. When they came to this region they forsook the sanctuary—opened a grog tavern, and devoted themselves to the world. Their children have grown up, and are now most devoted to the pleasures of sin. The ball room, the dancing school, and such places, are their chief delight; and the parents, Eli-like, do not restrain them. During a late revival, they were brought to reflection; and the mother, a few days since, told me with tears, "it was not always so. While we were regular at meeting, we had no difficulty with our children; they had no relish for these follies; but since we have forsaken God, we have no way to prevent it." She looks with anguish upon the influence which her apostasy has exerted upon a large family of children; several of whom are now well nigh beyond parental control.

It is appalling to see how many there are in this country, who are putting their light under a bushel. Four months ago there were rising of fifty members in this church, and just about as many old professors, within five miles, who had not joined; and many of whom were never suspected of being religious. Some had been exiles from God for fourteen years. Some were mourning over their desolation, and some were giving no signs of spiritual life. It is a question worthy of the serious consideration of eastern churches, "IF THE RELIGION OF NEARLY HALF THEIR MEMBERS WILL NOT BEAR TRANSPORTATION ACROSS LAKE ERIE, WHAT PROPORTION WILL BEAR IT ACROSS THE JORDAN OF DEATH?"—Pastor's Journal.

From the Olive Branch.

WISDOM'S VOICE.

"Unto you I call, and my voice is unto the son's of men."—Were we called to perform a reluctant duty, disagreeable in its nature, and repugnant to our feelings, how naturally we should inquire who it was that called—what claims he has upon our person and property—the object he has in calling us—whether in the end it would answer any valuable purpose, and then govern ourselves accordingly. If we could avert the cause, and turn a deaf ear we probably should.

In this case wisdom is personified, and she is addressing us individually and collectively. In the language that heads this article, "Unto you I call, and my voice is unto the sons of men." She calls us to make us happier and wiser; to lift us up out of the "miry clay" of difficulty, and set our feet in her way, "which is pleasantness, and her paths which are peace."—Wisdom is represented as viewing us headed and traveling to destruction and misery,—the "way of peace we have not known." In this dilemma she beckons to us to return to the path of the just, which shines brighter as we pursue its way; it calls to us in the character of a friend, by first inviting, then entreating, and afterwards threatning, as the case demands. We behold her comparing herself above riches and honor, altogether lovely and worthy of pursuit.—To a temple with seven magnificent pillars—to an altar with the wood prepared for the sacrifice—to a feast to which all are invited. "Length of days are in her right hand, and in her left hand riches and honor;" "her ways are ways of pleasantness and all her paths are peace." She calls upon all that pass by, not only to the wise and prudent, but she condescends to invite the simple, and those that lack understanding. The sons of men are invited and warned to choose none of the ways that lead down to death and the gates of hell.—She is friendly; she warns us from destruction to seek peace—not to wound us but to heal—not to destroy, but to save. She unrolls the consequences of courses, she points us to the haven of rest and repose, where we may ship much of our difficulty, and rid ourselves of much that embitters life. She is to us "better than weapons of war"—she is a defense and a wall round about us—she takes us by the hand, and

"Points the road,
That leads to wisdom's blest abode."

She is worth seeking. "Seek, and ye shall find" that she is altogether the way of peace and life, to them that take hold upon her, and happy will each one be that retaineth her.

But those who choose none of her ways are left to their own shame and destruction. Wisdom is represented as laughing at their calamities, and mocking when their fear cometh. To be wise to-day, even for this world, is necessary; and if neglecting to be wise shall have a bearing upon the future, how much more necessary, to "Be wise to-day; 'tis madness to defer."

The improvement in mercies best shows what end we had in praying for them.

God is careful to chasten his people's sins and supply their wants.—Venning.

THE CHRISTIAN PATRIOT.

How august a character is that of the Christian Patriot! but alas, how rare!—Men of commanding genius, and of vast literary acquirements can be found. We can also point out men who love the Church because they are placed in a sphere of honor and emolument within its bounds, and ample opportunities are afforded them to exercise their powers, and gratify their self-inflation—and there are others who love the kingdom of God, because their interests are identified with it, and who therefore are willing, in a time of peril, to join in defending it, and in a time of calamity, to unite in bewailing it. But who loves the church for its own sake?—only because it is the household of faith, and the Church of God, and the depository of that truth by which the future generations of the world are to be saved and blessed.—He who on these grounds alone prefers Jerusalem "above his chief joy," is a rarity indeed. How immeasurably does such a disciple and champion tower above all other believers! The readiness with which he confesses himself a son of Zion in her evil day, as well as in her prosperity—the patience with which he labors for her, thro' good report, as well as through evil report—the toil he undertakes—and the sacrifices which he imposes upon himself—the singleness of his aims, seeking only her restoration to purity and peace, and in the accomplishment of this object receiving his reward. These rare, but sterling qualities, mark him out as the rightful owner of a name, which none other dares to claim—which a monarch might exult to wear, but which few potentates have possessed—the Christian Patriot! How august! There is a breadth about his character; and a colossol strength and proportion about his virtues, which condemn the would-be greatness of other men. Place genius, and eloquence, and rank before him, how are they overshadowed!—their fires pale—they sink into utter insignificance, and become absolutely contemptible before the moral majesty of the Christian patriot—the unfaltering single hearted lover of the church of God and the spiritual welfare of mankind—the man who like Mordecai may be neglected or reviled or persecuted by men, but whom the King of heaven will eternally honor.—Wylie.

A PREVALENT MISTAKE.—The sentiment, that it matters not what a man believes, so that he is sincere, is as unscriptural as it is absurd. Sincerity of belief has no more effect in warding off evil in the spiritual, than in the natural kingdom. If the teachings and persuasions of a reputed chemist should prevail on you to believe that arsenic is harmless, would it therefore be harmless? Could you mix it with your bread, and you and your children eat it without injury to health or life! Oh no! Neither will the sincerity of your belief save you from the consequence of error in religious faith. Right belief—truth, God's truth, my brethren, is the only foundation on which you can safely rest your hopes.

But true belief is not a mere act of the understanding, it involves exercises of the heart; the emotions are purified, and love pervades the soul.—Rev. E. N. Kirk.

BUNYAN'S MAN IN DESPAIR.—I was once a fair and flourishing professor, both in my own eyes and also in the eyes of others: I was once, as I tho' fair for the celestial city, and had even joy at the tho'ts that I should get thither. I am now a man of despair. I left off to watch and be sober; I sinned against the light of the world, and the goodness of God; I have grieved the Spirit, and he is gone; I tempted the devil, and he is come to me; I have provoked God to anger, and he has left me; I have so hardened my heart that I cannot repent.

Is there no hope? The Son of the Blessed is very pitiful.

I have crucified him to myself afresh; I have despised his person; I have despised his righteousness; I have counted his blood an unholy thing; I have done despite to the spirit of grace: therefore I shut myself out from all the promises, and there now remains to me nothing but threatnings, dreadful threatnings of certain judgment and fiery indignation, which shall devour me as an adversary, God hath denied me repentance. His word gives me no encouragement to believe; yea himself hath shut me up in this iron cage; nor can all the men in the world let me out. Oh eternity! eternity! how shall I grapple with the misery that I must meet with in eternity.

Mr. Whitefield was once preaching at Exeter where a man was present who had loaded his pockets with stones in order to fling them at this eminently useful preacher. He heard his prayer with patience, but no sooner had he named his text, than the man pulled a stone out of his pocket and held it in his hand, waiting for a fair opportunity to throw it. But God sent a word to his heart, and the stone dropped from his hand. After the sermon, he went up to Mr. Whitefield and said, "Sir, I came here this day, with the intention of breaking your head, but God has given me a broken heart." The man proved to be a sound convert, and lived an ornament to the gospel. "Such power belongeth unto God."

PUNGENT REPLY.—To a young infidel who scoffed at Christianity, because of the misconduct of some professors, Dr. Mason said: "Did you ever know an uproar to be made, because an infidel went astray from the path of morality?" The infidel admitted that he had not. 'Then,' said the Doctor, 'don't you see that you admit that Christianity is a holy religion, by expecting its professors to be holy; and that you pay it the highest compliment in your power?'

He that swells in prosperity will shrink adversity.

"SEARCH THE SCRIPTURES."

Christians agree that the word of God is univocal, and perfectly harmonious in all its parts. They likewise agree, that the inspired writers, who lived in different ages, and wrote under different circumstances, are agreed in all the doctrines they teach; consequently a diversity of scriptural views cannot arise from ambiguity in the word of God. It is likewise true of the scriptures that they are so plain that "he that runs may read;" and they are fully able to make the man of God perfect, and thoroughly furnish him to all good works. If so, obscurity cannot be urged as an excuse for error. If, then, the cause of a diversity of sentiments does not arise from ambiguity or obscurity of the precepts inculcated, it follows, of necessity, that all persons who "search the scriptures," free from improper prejudice, will arrive at the same conclusions. Hence the difficulty is not with the scriptures, but with those who read them. Error, then, is inexcusable; and if the error imbibed relates to the fundamental doctrines or duties of religion, it must inevitably be accompanied with guilt.

Different views of the word of God may arise from the different manner in which it is read. Most persons are taught certain religious sentiments in early life by parents, or their teachers. All impressions thus received are held sacred, and are greatly strengthened with years. And by such the scriptures are, perhaps, more frequently resorted to for evidence to support preconceived opinions, than to learn what they teach. Such dictate rather than discover the sense, and adopt inferential proof when positive is wanting.

Another cause of error is, the contrariety of the scriptures to the natural or interested inclinations of many who read them. To such the language of the Savior is appropriate—"And this is the condemnation, that light is come into the world and men loved darkness rather than light, because their deeds were evil. For every one that doeth evil hateth the light, neither cometh to the light, lest his deeds should be reproved." The corruptions of the heart are opposed to the righteous principles of the gospel. The meekness, the humility that the scriptures teach, do not accord with the unsanctified affections of men. "The word of God is quick and powerful, and sharper than any two-edged sword, piercing even to the dividing asunder of soul and spirit, and of the joints and marrow, and is a discerner of the thoughts and intents of the heart." This exposing and condemning characteristic of the Bible renders it to many an unwelcome guest.

Want of systematic investigation prevents light from shining into the soul perfectly. But little can be accomplished, in any undertaking, without systematic effort. Disconnected reading will result in disconnected views, and these to error in judgment and life.

But, perhaps, the greatest difficulty of all, is reading by proxy; or, in trusting to others for information. The Bereans heard the word preached with all readiness, and then searched the scriptures daily to see if these things were so. But now many reverse the order. Few, comparatively, can give connected scripture proof for their faith and practice. If Protestants with the Bible in hand will read it through their minister, they must not censure Catholics who do the same. If an error in faith through needless ignorance results in disadvantage to the soul, the condemning sentence will be just. Until Christians "search the scriptures" with a desire to understand them, and live according to them, the church will be rent with factions, and the day will be deferred when there shall be no discord to mar the beauty of Zion.

SABBATH SCHOOLS—BIBLE CLASSES.

Having spent some of the happiest moments of our life in the Bible Class and Sabbath School; and knowing some of their advantages, we cannot urge them too strongly upon the attention of all the lovers of the Savior. Indeed, we are constrained to believe that all such must feel a deep interest in them. We know of no means that is better calculated to prepare the way for the successful preaching of the gospel. A taste for the scriptures is thereby created in those who are strangers to God, and an increasing love for them in the heart of the Christian. We are certain that the many hours of the Sabbath, which some professors are in the habit of spending uselessly, or sinfully, may be very profitably spent in preparing for the Bible Class. A more extended and correct knowledge of the scriptures can not so easily be obtained in any other way; and a more effectual means is not often found to bring thoughtless sinners to consider their ways and turn to the Savior.

Teachers ought to be specially careful in preparing to meet their classes. The interest that scholars feel depends very much on the interest of teachers, the nature of the instruction, and the manner in which it is imparted. If the melting love of the Savior moves the teacher's heart, it will move those that come under its influence. If the teacher is metaphysical and monotonous, his instructions will be tiresome and uninteresting to many. If he exercises a variety in style, and adapts instruction to the various capacities of his pupils, his labors will not be vain in the Lord.

We commend "Harriet's Sabbath," on our first page, to the attention of our juvenile readers. We also invite all to certain traits that characterize those who love the duties and devotions of the Sabbath.

1. They will "call the Sabbath a Delight, the Holy of the Lord, Honorable," and will refrain from doing their own pleasure on God's holy day.

2. They will be at the house of God, and in their seats at the hour appointed for worship.

3. Their eyes will be directed to him who declares the counsels of God's will; and their attention to the words of truth spoken.

4. They are strangers to listlessness and ennui in the house of God; and do not loiter around it before or after divine services.

5. The hallowed hours, whether at the house of God or at home, are spent in the religious exercises of meditation, reading, conversation, or praying.

6. They sweetly commune with their Savior, and find that great peace have they which love the law of God; and nothing shall offend them.

We extract the following from an article signed Samuel Marsh, in the "Union Herald," which purports to be an answer in part to a Seventh-day Baptist correspondent. Our object is not to interfere in the controversy, but to give a literal translation of the passages referred to.

TRANSLATION FROM THE GREEK.

"In the end of the (seventh day) Sabbath, (Greek Sabbaths) as it began to dawn towards the first day of the week." (Mat. xxviii; 1.) Literally, "first of Sabbaths," that is the "First (day) Sabbath;" the word (day) being necessarily understood. We find, literally, in substance the same, Mark xvi; 1, 2, 9, Luke xxiii; 56, and xxiv; 1. "The same day at evening, being (literally) the first of the Sabbaths"; or, "the first (day) Sabbath." (John xx; 1, 19.) "On the first (day) Sabbath, when the disciples came together to break bread." Acts xx; 7. "Upon the first (day) Sabbath, let every one"—1 Cor. xvi; 2."

LITERAL TRANSLATIONS.

In the end of (late in) the Sabbaths, as it began to dawn towards one of the Sabbaths. Mat. xxviii; 1. And when the Sabbath was past, Mary Magdalene, and Mary the mother of James, and Salome, bought spices, that they might come and anoint him. And very early in the morning of one of the Sabbaths, they came to the sepulchre at the rising of the sun. Mark xvi; 1, 2. When Jesus was risen, early on the first of the Sabbath, he appeared first to Mary Magdalene, out of whom he had cast seven devils; 9. And rested the Sabbath day according to the commandment. Luke xxiii; 56. Upon one of the Sabbaths, very early in the morning, they came to the sepulchre. xxiv; 1. Upon one of the Sabbath Mary Magdalene came early, while it was yet dark, to the sepulchre. Then the same day at evening being one of the Sabbaths, when the doors were shut where the disciples were assembled for fear of the Jews. John xx; 1, 19. On one of the Sabbaths when the disciples came together to break bread. Acts xx; 7. Upon one of the Sabbaths let each of you lay by himself. 1 Cor. xvi; 2.

We have received a manuscript copy of a review of a discourse preached in the S. D. Baptist meeting-house at Adams, by Rev. Mr. Mattison. The Review is from the pen of the Rev. E. S. Bailey. It contains a very lucid exposure of the fallacious arguments of Mr. M. It will be published in Pamphlet form by request of the church in Adams, and be ready for them by the last of the present month.

We insert this week the Circular and Corresponding Letters, and Report on the State of Religion of the Western Association. We trust it will be acceptable to our readers. The minutes are ready for distribution.

CIRCULAR LETTER.

The Elders and Brethren, delegates to the Western Seventh-Day Baptist Association, in session assembled; to the Churches composing the same, greeting:

DEARLY BELOVED—We feel called upon to express our devout gratitude to our Heavenly Parent for his kind providence in enabling us again, unitedly, to send you our Christian salutation.

Our hearts have been cheered by the harmony of sentiment and mutual interest manifest in your communications to us, as well as the fellowship of the spirit enjoyed during our interview. The additions to our churches and an increase of ministerial gifts among us, are indications that God is still mindful of us for good, for which we should render unceasing thanks, and be encouraged to look for better things yet to appear. We however feel constrained to lay before you the duty of a more entire and unreserved consecration to God. The want of this we are assured is an avenue to most of those reverses mentioned in some of your epistles, and contributes largely to, if it be not the fountain of those lethean streams that paralyze the efforts of individuals, churches, and associations. It is this which presents the body of Christ in such a distorted form and obscures that light which should shine with emblazoned glory, and fill the whole earth. The Macedonian cry so loud in our ears, the feeble state of many branches of our vine, the example of primitive saints, the promises of our blessed Redeemer, and the injunctions of Jehovah's word, urge on us individually, this duty.

We do feel, Dearly Beloved, that it is high time to awake and gird on the Heavenly armor, and to have inscribed on all that pertains to us, "Holiness to the Lord."

Suffer us then to renew our entreaties, that with you "Christ may be all in all." That henceforth you look on yourselves as not our own, but bought with a price, and whatever you do, be done to the honor and glory of God, accounting that all sacrifices of self, ease, honor and wealth, for this purpose is your richest gain and shall be your most cheerful service.

That such may be in you a growing spirit and happy inheritance, is our mutual prayer.

J. R. IRISH, Committee.

CORRESPONDING LETTER.

The Seventh-Day Baptist Western Association to the Seventh-Day Baptist General Conference, and our sister Associations, Greeting:

We are by the good providence of Almighty God, permitted again to assemble at our anniversary, and although in a remote part of our Association a general delegation is present.

We have received with pleasure a corresponding letter from the Central Association, but regret that they and the South Western Association were unable to send a delegate as was anticipated.

We have received no communication from the Eastern, but shall rejoice to receive from them, both a letter and delegation at our next session; as also from the other Associations.

We have appointed Brothers J. R. Irish and J. A. Langworthy delegates to the General Conference, and Br. J. H. Cochran a substitute for Br. Irish. Br. S. Coon is appointed a delegate to the South Western Association.

For our statistics, resolutions and acts, we refer you to our minutes in which you will notice that we approve, by a unanimous vote, of the article laid before us by the Conference at its last session, to become a part of its Constitution, and have repeated our instructions to our delegates to act accordingly. We would especially call your attention to a resolution on the subject of our benevolent institutions, with the hope of a cordial co-operation.

We rejoice to inform you that our attachment to the plan of Associations, increases by our acquaintance with it, and we trust as that plan becomes more matured and consolidated the happy fruits will be manifold. Our determination is to persevere in every laudable undertaking, and aim at higher attainments in grace and the knowledge of our Lord Jesus Christ, to whom be praise forever more. Now may the love of Christ unite you in the fellowship of the gospel, and harmony, for the promotion of every good work.

J. R. IRISH, Cor. Sec.

EXTRACTS FROM THE LETTERS OF THE CHURCHES.

First Alfred.—Sabbath, Covenant, and Church Meetings are well attended—Bible Classes are in a flourishing condition, and we believe a good degree of union exists among us.

Friendship.—As a church, we have not that cheering intelligence to write you that we could wish, however, a good degree of union exists throughout our body; also good attention is given to public worship, and the favorable circumstances under which we are placed, encourage us to believe that we shall yet see better days.

Bolivar.—We cannot convey the soul-cheering intelligence we could wish, yet we feel a desire to become more active in the cause in which we are enlisted, and earnestly solicit your prayers that there may be a bright and shining light in this candlestick of the Lord.

First Genesee.—Since the meeting of the past year, the Lord has in his mercy granted us a gracious refreshing: and we have been made to rejoice in the extent of the work which we humbly hope is not yet finished. We feel much satisfaction in stating that the work appears to be deep, and leads much to prayer, especially in our meetings for conference and prayer.

Hayfield.—The Lord has blest us the past year with seasons of refreshing from his presence—his children have been revived and encouraged to put their trust in the Lord. Some have found the pearl of great price, others have yielded to the claims of God's Holy law. Accessions have been made to the church of such as contribute much to its strength.

Clarence.—As a church, we think we can say that we are in union. Indeed we were never more so than at present, and the prospect of an increase in numbers is good. The cause of the Sabbath has advanced much during the past year, and is still progressing, though slowly.

Persia.—We feel that with us as a church, a spirit of apathy and indifference has too much taken the place of that fervor of spirit, and devotedness of life which should be exhibited in the professed followers of Christ. Notwithstanding our unfaithfulness, the Lord has been merciful unto us. Some few have been added to our numbers, and a degree of union is enjoyed among us.

Second Alfred.—The church is in a low state and has been for a long time. But notwithstanding the various trials through which we have passed, we still hope in God.

Hebron.—We have been in a state of apathy and coldness for a season, but we trust that of late we have been revived in the spirit of our minds.

Independence.—The cause of religion has not advanced with us the year past as we could wish. We have had some trials to pass through, still we have received many blessings from the hand of the Lord; and we as a body, still feel determined to trust in him and pursue the cause.

Amity.—Our trials and afflictions are not diminished, yet would we trust in the Lord.

Scio.—Low time of religion—no gospel preaching.

Second Genesee.—There is with us a good degree of union at present.

Third Genesee.—A tolerable degree of union is manifest in our church.

REPORT ON RELIGION

Your committee in looking upon the state of religion in this association as represented in the letters from the several churches, respectfully beg leave to remind you that while God has graciously given manifestations of his presence in most of the churches; that which appears necessary to have been done in the accomplishment of the will and the gracious purposes of God, in Christ Jesus, concerning us, admonishes us that we have come far short of giving to the world that manifestation of holiness and zeal required of us by our profession, and the continued mercies of our God towards us. When we consider that the christians course is onward and upward, and that we are not to be satisfied with a mere deliverance from contentions in the body, but are diligently to labor for, and earnestly expect, growth in the body, both in graces and numbers; we feel that it would not be right to represent the state of religion in this Association as flourishing, while we do not see in their returns that they lay hold on the promises, prevail with God, and receive the blessing. Some of the churches represent themselves thus; some are not going back apparently; and some have laid down their reins and opened themselves to the assaults of the enemy. Thus, brethren, in consideration of the light and power granted us, and the account we shall have to render before God, we are called upon to state that we believe it necessary to humble ourselves before him, and make a fresh consecration of all our powers in His service, and to His everlasting glory in Christ Jesus, our Lord and Redeemer—Amen.

AN OLD DEFINITION YET IN VOGUE.

"PLAGIARISM.—The act of purloining another man's literary work, or introducing passages from another man's writings and putting them off as one's own."

INTELLIGENCE.

SUMMARY.

Boston has a population of 83,979, Massachusetts 718,592.

It is estimated that there are 1,555 newspapers, magazines and other productions in the U. S.

A farmer in Northampton, Mass., gathered 200 quarts of strawberries from six acres of mowing land. They were sold for a shilling a quart.

Five of the gentlemen who were concerned in the bloodless duel on Bloody Island, near St. Louis, have been indicted.

Nineteen young gentleman received the title of A. B., and four A. M., at the late commencement of Hamilton College.

The Lieut. Governor of Upper Canada has changed the punishment of Livingston Palmer, convicted of High treason, from death to transportation for life.

Gov. Morton has offered $500 reward for the detection of the person who robbed, and attempted to murder Mr. George Rice, in the town of Springfield on the 20th ult.

Two lions have arrived at Philadelphia in the ship Russel, being presents from the Emperor of Morocco to the President of the U. S.

Rochester.—The population of Rochester is 20,129. Increase since 1835, 5,725.

New Haven has a population of 12,957.

The crimes for which Com. Elliott were suspended from his office, were these:

1. Of ordering passed midshipman Barton, when wounded, to be taken from the Constitution to the Shark.
2. Of the various allegations founded on the acceptance of a service of plate from his crew.
3. Of the various allegations founded on his having imported twenty three animals on board the Constitution.
4. Of inflicting twenty-four instead of twelve lashes upon three of his crew.
5. Of expending the public stores for his private purpose.

The President by reason of certain mitigating circumstances, has remitted that part of the punishment which deprived him of pay for two years.

Gov. Seward has offered $500 reward for the arrest of Orange Cole, the murderer of Barber Havens at Naples, Ontario co.

The population of Upper Canada is 450,000. Toronto has 13,000 inhabitants.

The two oldest persons in Brunswick, Me., are a single lady and an old bachelor, (brother and sister.) The former is 92, the latter, 90.

The amount received for tolls on the New-York State Canals, during the last week in July, is $46,797,08. In the month of July, $161,374,66.

The Connecticut Legislature has abolished capital punishment, and substituted imprisonment for life.

There are upwards of 1000 Jews in Baltimore. In Morocco there are 300,000 Jews. In Tunis, 200,000. Mr. Ewald, a German missionary, circulated 15,000 copies of the scriptures among them.

A Bell, at Mengon, near Ava, in Burmah, weighs more than 330,000 lbs. It is twenty inches thick, twenty feet high, and thirteen feet six inches in diameter.

Distinguished Emigrants.—The Buffalo Tattler mentions the departure from that place, for Wisconsin, of three distinguished Hungarians of noble birth, who have gone to Wisconsin to purchase a large tract of land, under the following circumstances, as related by the Tattler: a number of the nobility attempted to pass a certain law, and determined, if they could not, to abandon their country and hereditaty domains, and emigrant, in a body, to the new world. The attempt failed, and twenty of the most distinguished and liberal nobles of Hungary are about to emigrate with their families to Wisconsin. They sent of their number, a Count of the Empire, late a military officer, & Governor of a province, accompanied by two confidential friends, to select the locality, and make the purchase. "On his way," continues the Tattler, "he stayed several days at the United States Hotel, in this city, and will probably return early in the fall, and depart for Europe, when the whole number of emigrants will embark, so as to be here about the opening of navigation. This is an important movement, and an example that will undoubtedly be followed by others of the educated and other classes. The estates that they have are of immense value, but, we understand, are not liable to confiscation, and can be claimed by the heirs of the present owners, if they choose to go back to Hungary."

A Promising Youth.—Alexander J. Danforth, aged 18, who ran away from England at an early age, and since his arrival here has been in the prisons of several of the States, has had his car cropped in some place, confessed to thirteen burglaries committed by himself with others within a year past, after being used as a witness on a trial at a former term, was discharged on Monday from custody and set at liberty, owing to the absence of witnesses to convict him. No sooner free than he resumed his career of crime, and early the next morning entered the cabin of the Austrian bark Novianese, lying at the Albany Basin, and stole $2,50 from the pocket of the pantaloons of Capt. Casper Ciganach, in which he was detected and detained by John Bratis, the mate, when officer Denniston went and brought him to the police office, where he was committed to prison, saying he would never be caught putting his hand into such small business again.

The whole number of steamboat accidents, of a serious nature, which have occurred in the United States, since the introduction of steam navigation, is stated at 272, of which the following is a summary:

No. of vessels.		No. of lives lost.
103	explosions and collapses of boilers,	886
73	striking on snags and sawyers,	118
35	shipwrecks, gales, and collisions,	473
34	fires from various causes,	444
27	unascertained causes.

Albany.—"Fifty-seven years ago," said the venerable Gov. Morgan Lewis, setting a few days since in our counting room, "I sold this lot (the Exchange,) to James Bloodgood for $300. We were just out of the revolution, and I was glad to get so much for the property." The lot cost the Exchange Company, four years ago, $139,600. Such is the progress of things since our fathers were "just out of the revolution."—Albany Argus.

The Bottomless Lake.—A writer in the Troy (N. Y.) Mail, gives the following account of a remarkable pond in Sussex county, in the State of New York.

"White Lake is situated about one mile west of Paulins Kill, in the town of Stillwater. It is nearly circular, and about one-third of a mile in diameter. It has no visible inlet, but its outlet is a never-failing stream, of considerable magnitude. The name is derived from its appearance.—Viewed from a little distance, it seems of a milky whiteness except a few rods in the center, which, by the contrast, appears perfectly black. The appearance itself is singular enough, but the cause is still more remarkable.

From the center, or dark portion of the lake, at stated seasons, innumerable quantities of shells are thrown up, of various sizes and forms, but all perfectly white. These float to the shore, and are thrown out upon the beach, or sink into shallow water. Hundreds of bushels might be gathered from the shore after one of these periodical uprisings; and the whole soil for several rods, on every side of the lake, is composed of these shells, broken or decomposed by the action of the weather. In the centre of the lake the bottom has never been found, although it has been sounded to the depth of several hundred feet.

Where then is the grand deposite from which has been walling up since the memory of man, these countless myriads of untenanted shells? Is it possible that, though far remote at an elevation of several hundred feet above them, this bottomless well may, by some subterranean communication be connected with the grand shell marl deposite in the eastern part of the State?

Sea Serpent.—We were informed that this monster was seen a few days ago from Cohasset. A party of five or six persons, among whom was a sea captain of no inconsidrable experience, watched his motions for more than a half an hour, during a part of which time he approached within thirty rods of the shore. None of the party had the slightest doubt as to its nature. The head and a considerable part of the body was exposed to view; that part which was seen was supposed to be about sixty feet in length. The motion seemed to be caused by lateral fins, or the movement of the tail under water, and not by the undulations of the body as in land snakes. The humps on the back were observed, as they had been described by previous witnesses. We have this information from a source, removed from a suspicion of misrepresentation or exageration.—Boston Daily Advertiser.

Loss of the Steamboat North Carolina.—From J. Chapman Hugher, Esq. of South Carolina, who reached this city in the Norfolk steamboat, we learn the particulars of a fearful collision which occurred at sea on Saturday night last, between the steamboats Governor Dudley and North Carolina, and which resulted in the loss of the latter boat, together with the passengers' baggage, and the U. S. Mails for the South.—Providentially no lives were lost. These boats both belong to the Wilmington and Roanoke Rail Road Company, and at the time of the collision, which took place at sea, about 60 miles south of Wilmington, the North Carolina was running towards Charleston with the Northern passengers and mails, while the Governor Dudley was on her way towards Wilmington.

The collision took place about one o'clock, A. M. of Saturday night last, on a beautiful starlight night, with a perfectly calm sea. The boats were going at the rate of 12 or 14 miles an hour, and were seen by each other for a mile or two before they came together. How they managed to run into each other is not known; the captain of each boat was in his berth at the time—having stood his regular watch—and the mate of each had charge of his respective boat. In the collision which took place the Governor Dudley's bow struck the North Carolina between the ladies' and gentlemen's cabin. The shock was terrible, and its violence may be inferred from the fact that in ten minutes after it took place, the North Carolina had sunk to the water's edge.

The passengers of both boats were all in their berths at the time, and had barely time to escape with their lives. The great coolness and self-possession manifested on the trying occasion by the Captain of each boat, were doubtless the means of preventing any loss of life. The small boats were immediately manned, and the passengers of the North Carolina all conveyed in safety to the Governor Dudley. In about ten minutes after every one was transferred to the latter, the North Carolina, then down to the water's edge, keeled over. Among the passengers in the North Carolina were several members of Congress—one of whom Gen. Dawson, of Georgia lost fifteen thousand dollars in his trunk. Other passengers all lost considerable sums of money, and some were losers of their little all.—The Governor Dudley had a hole of about four feet square knocked in her bow, and at first leaked badly, but the aperture was in a measure closed with blankets, tarpaulins, &c. She laid by all night, and the next morning picked up two or three floating trunks which were all that were saved from the North Carolina—every thing else having gone to the bottom in her. The passengers of the North Carolina were all taken back in the Dudley to Wilmington, and while on their way thither some of the passengers of the latter generously raised a subscription to aid those who had lost their all in the sunken boat. The conduct of the Captains of the boats is spoken of in the highest terms of praise by the passengers.—Baltimore American.

Mysterious Death.—A young lady by the name of Jane Hawkins, died at Point Peter, in this town, on Sunday the 12th ult. under circumstances which gave grounds for strong suspicion that she had been poisoned. She was taken directly after eating a piece of sugar candy, which she said had been given her some days previous by a young man who was paying his addresses to her. She was on her way from this village to her father's residence, about three miles distant, and when about half way home her thirst was so exceruciating that she stopped at a brook to drink, which soon produced vomiting. She lay by the brook several hours until found by the school children on their way home.—Medical aid was resorted to, but to no purpose. After lingering under the most excruciating pain for six days she expired. A post mortem examination was resorted to, but the contents of the stomach produced no evidence of poison. The young man suspected of poisoning her was arrested, and after a thorough examination was acquitted. A large paper of arsenic was found in her trunk a few days previous to the time first mentioned, which she informed her sister had been given her to paint her face with. The affair still remains an unsolved mystery.—Lodi Freeman.

The following is the address of the two Houses of Parliment to the Queen, presented on the 12th June, on occasion of the attempt upon her life.

Most Gracious Sovereign,—We, your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and Commons, in Parliament assembled, beg leave humbly to approach your Majesty's Throne, to express our horror and indignation at the late atrocious and treasonable attempt against your Majesty's sacred Person, and our heartfelt congratulation to your Majesty, and to our country on your Majesty's happy preservation from so great a danger.

We desire to express to your Majesty the deep concern which we feel, at there having been found within your Majesty's dominions a person capable of so flagitious an act; and that we make it our earnest prayer to Almighty God, that he will preserve to us the blessings which we enjoy under your Majesty's just and mild government, and continue to watch over a life so justly dear to us.

John William Birch,
Dep. Clerk, Parliamentor.

Her Majesty's Most Gracious Answer:—

"It is with heartfelt satisfaction that I receive upon the present occasion, this Address from both my Houses of Parliament.

"I am deeply sensible of the mercy of Divine Providence, to whose continual protection I humbly commend myself, and I trust, that under all trials, I shall find the same consolation and support which I now derive from the loyal and affectionate attachment of Parliament and my Peple."

The Storm.—The city was visited yesterday by a succession of severe storms, accompanied by vivid flashes of lightning and claps of thunder. The rain commenced at an early hour in the morning, and continued without much abatement until a late hour at night. About eleven o'clock in the forenoon a dense black cloud rolled up from the southwest, shedding floods of water and discharging bolts of lightning, which momently broke over the city with a force which seemed to shake the foundations of the earth. The thunder and lightning continued with more or less violence during the day. In the morning the spire of St. Paul's Church was struck, but the electric fluid was conducted to the ground by means of the rod without doing any damage. The United States Revenue Cutter Rush, lying at anchor off the Battery, the ship Orpheus, in Peck Slip, the schr. Fairfield, at pier No 6 East River, were all injured by the lightning.—In the latter vessel the Captain, who was reading in the cabin, was dangerously burned.

The schooner Actress, from St. Johns, N. B. bound to Philadelphia, put into this port in distress, having lost fore and mainmast, jib boom, &c. in the storm.

In Brooklyn the storm was more disastrous. A liberty pole, which had lately been erected at the corner of York and Pearl streets, at an expense of six hundred dollars, was struck down, but a man who was in the act of tying a horse to the pole escaped uninjured. The three story brick house in Sands, near Bridge street, belonging to J. Lambertson, was struck by lightning, the chimney was thrown down, and in its fall it broke through the roof of the next house, doing great damage to the inside of the building. The fluid separated and passed towards the base of the house, tore off the cornices and clap-boarding, and passed through some of the rooms, following the bell wires and other conductors. One of Mr. Lambertson's children was injured, though not seriously; the fluid struck him on the foot, burning his shoe, and passed off. A house in Jackson street, occupied by Mr. Collier, was also struck. The lightning descended through the chimney and passed to the basement of the house, where a child of a Mrs. Grady was struck and instantly killed. Three boys who sought shelter under a tree in Hicks street, were knocked down and one of them killed. In Front street, a woman was struck down, but was afterwards recovered.—N. Y. E. Post.

A Female slave.—I had purchased her for her great beauty, but soon found that she was also active, lively, and intelligent. At first our only means of conversing was by signs, and her eyes sparkled with pleasure whenever she succeeded in comprehending my meaning. After the task of preparing our evening meal had been concluded, I frequently called her to my side, and endeavored to acquire her language, which was of a silvery sweetness, every word terminating in a vowel. Sometimes she sung the wild and plaintive airs of her country; and when I had explained to her that this was not also my native land, she would point to Afric's shore, and her eyes would fill with moisture when she signed to me that there she, too, had sisters, brothers, and other dear relatives.—Wellstead's City of the Caliphs.

Health of New Orleans.—The Picayune of the 14th says: from the weekly report of the Charity Hospital it appears that from the 5th to the 12th inst. seven persons affected with ordinary fever, were admitted; seventeen with bilious fever; thirty three with intermittent fever: two with remittent fever; and one with bilious remittent fever.

The silk worm was first introduced into Europe by two monks, from Persia, who were missionaries. The silk worms were secretly carried in a hollow cane.

She removed to Brookfield, and was one of the first members of the 1st church in that place. She was truly a mother in Israel, and died in the triumphs of faith. She left a large number of friends to mourn their loss. Comm.

In Hopkinton, R. I. on the 14th ult., of the consumption, Miss EMELINE, daughter o Dea. Daniel Lewis, aged 25 years, in hope of a blessed immortality. Shs made a public profession of religion in the autumn of 1832, and united herself with the first S. D. B Church at that place, and has ever been a bright example of piety, and an ornament to the christian name. During her distressing and protracted illness she ever manifested a meek and quiet spirit, and while nature sunk under disease, her soul was preparing for its homeward flight. In her were united the qualities of piety, cheerfulness, and forbearance, which warmly endeared her to relatives, friends, and acquaintance. Comm.

POETRY.

From the New-Yorker.

"THIS IS NOT OUR REST."

Rest! angel of our dreams!
Sweet Hope, the quickener of our toils and joys,
Which sees thee from afar in broken gleams,
Lives on the music of thy fairy voice.
How fair thy dwelling seems!
But here we toil and pant in weary strife,
Never to find thee on the waste of Life.

The Youth, with heart unworn,
With Life's first brightness on his opening brow,
By untamed aspiration onward borne
To meet the scenes that rise before him now—
Ah! he must sigh and mourn!
That aspiration swells to urge him on,
But gives no rest from toil till life is done.

Yon hoary, tottering man,
Who seventy years has toiled to reach repose,
Turns sadly back to scenes when life began.
No more for him life's brilliant Future glows:
He turns the Past to scan,
Weary and sick at heart—and, groaning, deems
Man's highest joy dwells in his early dreams.

Ambition's venturous child,
Mounting o'er crag and cliff Fame's giddy height,
Sees wait above, an angel, bright and mild.
Oh! to dwell with her there in Glory's light!
He mounts—a phantom wild
All grimly glares, screams in his ear, and flies!
Not there is Rest—Fame gives no Paradise.

The hermit in his cell
Hides from the toiling world in reveries deep,
Where restless hopes his soul no more may swell,
And strives to exchange this life for dreamy sleep.
Alas! he feels too well
The human heart's all-heaving world unstilled—
The yearning wants of Mind not thus are filled.

This cannot be our rest:
Life's solemn trial in this strong array
Is no bright wave of song, a mind oppress
To bear reposing o'er the troubled way.
But how supremely blest
If with true hearts we use the trial given
To know ourselves and find the way to Heaven!

MISCELLANEOUS.

VESUVIUS, HERCULANEUM, AND POMPEII, IN 1839.

Whoever sojourns at Naples, were it only but a day, experiences the irresistible desire of going to what is passing at the bottom of that crater which perpetually smokes. It is especially towards evening, when the sun has disappeared beneath the horizon, that the vapors of Vesuvius assume a denser tint, and deck its summit with a bouquet of brighter whiteness. At Resina you find horses, donkeys, and conductors, who convey travelers half way up the mountains to the spot called the "Hermitage." This first ride is not an uninteresting one. Here nature is not yet dead. You pass through vineyards, planted in ashes, which yield the celebrated Lacrhyma Christa wine, two sorts of which there are much inferior to their fame; then come some nameless trees, the foremost sentinels of vegetation, which the next eruption will devour, and, lastly, you reach the "Hermitage," surrounded on all sides, save one, by the lava of 1794, 1810, 1813, and 1822. Here you alight, and enter a region of chaos. No more trees, vegetation, birds, or insects are to be seen. Every thing is dark, bristling with points, rent into deep and rugged fractures, covered with scoria, of a sulphurous smell, which tear your feet before they burn them. You are now at the foot of the cone; all that remains to be done is to ascend vertically along the external sides of the volcano halting on your way to cast a glance at a lateral plateau, called La Somna, which was no doubt, at one time, the main focus of Vesuvius.

If your heart has not failed you along this ladder of dried lava, you will reach the top of the volcano in three quarters of an hour. Here the sight begins—a terrible, original, and unexpected one, notwithstanding all descriptions given of it. Imagine a funnel five hundred metres deep, whose upper edges present innumerable crevices, whilst from the lower part rise clouds of sulphurous vapor, which escape by numberless apertures, bordered with dust of a lively orange color. If you stop to admire in the distance the city of Naples softly spreading round the gulf and at your feet the ever smoking crater, you feel the fire penetrating your boots, and the guide will urge you to walk to avoid accidents. The ground, when strongly struck, yields a certain metallic sound, and as you go round the mountain you meet with gaping apertures, at the bottom of which burns a red and fattish flame. I have plunged into one of these pits a long chestnut-tree stick, fresh cut, and covered still with moist bark, and it has instantly caught fire. As you kneel before those infernal gates to ascertain their depth you distinctly perceive within hand-reach the flame bending upon itself, dense, quiet, and almost limpid; it discharges clouds of sulphuric acid gas, which excites a cough, and soon compels the observer to quit the spot. The ground, if such a name can be given to the dangerous floor which covers the orifice of the volcano, is strewed with grey lava, ashes, melting sulphur, and pyrite substances, whence escapes, at intervals, a white smoke, which affects your eyes and lungs, and yet you cannot retire without reluctance from the awful scene. One can scarcely conceive how that crater, so narrow in its lower part, has vomited heaps of lava large enough to form a mountain four times as bulky as the Vesuvius itself, without mentioning the ashes, small pebles, and masses of boiling water, which the wind has sometimes carried to enormous distances.

Notwithstanding its fearful aspect, the Vesuvius itself may be easily approached even when its eruptions take place. The lava itself, whose progress is so formidable and inflexible, advances with extreme slowness. One has time to avoid or fly before it. The slightest obstacle stops it; it turns round objects, burns them if they be combustible, and envelopes and petrifies them as it cools, if they be not so. Thus it is that the city of Herculaneum has been seal- into a semi-metallic mass, and, as it were, cast in the lava which now covers it. Pompeii has disappeared under a discharge from Vesuvius, under a shower of ashes and little stones which have gradually though rapidly, covered it, just as certain Alpine villages disappear beneath the snow in our severe winters. Such is the reason why so much money has been expended in uncovering but a few small parts of Herculaneum, namely its theatre, which continues hid in utter darkness; whilst a third part of Pompeii has been cleared, exhibits itself to the open sky, and renders us contemporary with its inhabitants. Let us, therefore, hasten down the Vesuvius and view its ravages, which have been miraculously preserved for us in its whole splendor, a city of thirty thousand souls buried for eighteen hundred years past.

Herculaneum and Pompeii seem both very distant from the focus of Vesuvius.—They are now separated from it by inhabitants and cultivated spaces which have been conquered from the lava and recovered from the volcano. The village of Portici is built upon the roofs of the first of those two cities, which was petrified on the day of its death, and into the tomb of which one descends as into a mine, by a sort of shaft, ending at the theatre where, it is conjectured, the inhabitants were assembled when the eruption surprised them. It was in 1689 that the ruins of the city made their appearance for the first time in an excavation made at random, which was resumed in 1720, and finally organized in 1738, with admirable success. The discovery of the theatre and of every thing else has taken place since that period. The theatre is of Greek architecture, it is ornamental with a fine front, and with marble columns standing on the stage itself; the spectators occupied twenty one rows of steps, with a gellary above embellished with bronze statues.

One can still distinguish the places allotted to the magistrates, the scene behind which the actors withdrew, and a number of objects which excite in the traveler mingled astonishment and emotion. There are also at Herculaneum a Forum surrounded with porticos and temples, which are almost all of them damaged, and a jail with old rusty iron bars, to which the prisoners were chained—a melancholy feature of all times and places, and a monotonous emblem of human society at all periods. As you leave these excavations, which have as yet made little progress, and cannot be much extended without endangering the safety of Portici, you distinctly perceive several strata of lava, proving beyond a doubt that Herculaneum was drowned in repeated eruptions of Vesuvius.

The difficulty of carrying on the excavations at so great a depth, and under the foundation of a new town, has caused the ruins of Herculaneum to be almost abandoned for those of Pompeii, which present a far more striking interest. At Herculaneum there are only catacombs. At Pompeii the Romans entirely revive: the houses stand and are furnished and ornamented with picturesque paintings, the cellars are stocked as well as the tables; in more than one dwelling the dinner has been found on the table, and the skeletons of the guests round it, and then you enter everywhere on the same floor; and as the ashes, which lie but a few metres thick upon the ancient buildings, are cleared, the town appears, as ours come to light again when the snow melts in mountainous countries. You arrive by a suburb wholly lined with Roman tombs, and walk over a Roman pavement, worn out by Roman vehicles; you may enter the inn; there are the stables, with the rings to fasten the horses; close by is the farrier, with his sign over his door. If you penetrate into one of those tombs, you will find urns, containing ashes, hair, and fragments of calcined bones. Everywhere are displayed inscriptions, unaffected, dignified, and touching, such as the epitaph:—"Servila, to the friend of her soul." Let us advance; we are in the town. To the right of the gate you behold the guardian's sentry box cut into the stone. Take the footwa , for their are footways at Pompeii, Roman footways, with posts at intervals on both sides, footways wherein one ceases not to gaze on wheel-ruts, made eighteen hundred years ago.

Whom do you wish to be taken to? You have but to speak—the names are written on the door of every house, in large red letters. Here is an apothecary's shop, with his drugs in phials, with surgical instruments and balsams still yielding a smell.—Here are far different things! Enter, you have nothing to fear; but I dare not tell you where you are, unless you have perceived the sign over the door. What think you of it?—and yet facing one of these houses stands a temple of Vesta!

Let us, then, pay a few visits; we are in a baker's shop, and here is the flour-grindstone; suppose a stone sugar-loaf, covered with an extinguisher also of stone—rub the one against the other, after throwing some corn between them, and you have a Roman mill. This wretched piece of machinery was entrusted to the hands of slaves. But I have reserved a surprise for you; here is some bread—do you read the baker's name hollowed out of that carbonized pancake; take and break it. Open that cupboard, you will find there preserved olives, dried figs, lentils, and eatables of all descriptions. A saucepan has been carried to the Naples Museum, containing a piece of meat, as well preserved as by Mr. Appert's process. What a number of meals Vesuvius interrupted on that woful day!

I nevertheless, do not think that the Romans were great eaters. I have carefully explored a number of kitchens and dining-rooms at Pompeii, and I have found, even in the richest houses, but very trifling cooking apparatus, and miniature table utensils. Their plates were real saucers, and the tables upon which the dinner was served up but little stands, in general of stone or marble, which could hold but one dish at a time. The guests lay down around as soldiers round their mess. What is admirable, delightful, charming, and overwhelming to us barbarians of the nineteenth century, is the exquisite pureness and delicacy of shape of all the utensils which served in Roman domestic life. One must see those candlebras, lamps, vases of all sizes, those charming little bronze calefactors (for everything was of bronze,) those tripods, scales, beds, chairs, those graceful and so ingeniously wrought shields which fill up whole rooms at the Naples Museum. One must, above all see the toilet arsenal of the Roman ladies, their combs, toothpicks, curling-irons, and the pots of vegetable or mineral rouge found in a boudoir. Thus the Roman ladies used rouge and deceived people, just as is practiced now-a-days; they wore, like our ladies those necklaces, rings, and ridiculous earrings which add nothing to beauty and diminish not ugliness. How times resemble one another, in spite of the space that separates them.

Above thirty streets of Pompeii are now restored to light; it is a third part of the town. The walls which formed its ancient inclosure have been recognized, a magnificent amphitheatre, a theatre a forum, the temple or Iris, that of Venus, and a number of other buildings have been cleared. The secret stairs by which the priests of those times slily crept to prompt the oracles have been detected. On beholding so many monuments which display in so lively a manner the importance of public and the independence of private life among the Romans, it is impossible to resist a feeling of sadness and melancholy. Behold along that fall of earth, the vestige of the breast of a woman who was buried alive, and stiffened by death—behold the stones of that well, worn by the rubbing of the ropes—examine that guard-house, covered with caricatures of soldiers—one might suppose that the Roman people still existed, and that we were but strangers in one of their towns. Who knows what future discoveries may be made in those august ruins! Murat employed upon them 2000 men every year. Only 60 men and 1000*l*. are now employed upon them. The excavations proceed, in consequence, with dismal slowness, however great may be the interest which his Sicilian Majesty takes in their success. It is not to Rome—devasted and disfigured Rome—that one must go to study the Romans—it is to Pompeii. Pompeii, as regards antiquities, is worth all Italy together.

"Lightning in Harness."—It was said of Franklin, when he brought down the lightning of Heaven by means of a kite, and proved to the world the truth of his predictions, that it was identical with the electric fluid, that as he had torn the sceptre from tyrants, (alluding to his eminent diplomatic services in the revolution afterwards) so had he snatched the red artillery from heaven. Cooke, the Vermont blacksmith, who first applied the electric-magnetic power to the production of rotary motion, promises to share a part of the glory of his illustrious countryman of New England, Davenport, who has been for Cook what Bolton was to Watt, and Livingston to Fulton, in procuring the pecuniary means to give efficiency to his great discovery, and whose machine was exhibited here and elsewhere for some years past, has now established a press driven by his electro-magnetic influence, and has issued the first number of a very neatly executed paper, called the Magnet, to be devoted to the subject of electro-magnetism and other scientific matters. We can conceive of no practical idea more sublime than that of diffusing the light of intellectual power through the agency of the etherial fluid, which seems to control all the movements of the universe. The emission of this paper is an epoch which will hereafter be recurred to.—N. Y. Star.

Protestant Chapel in Jerusalem.—A letter from Jerusalem says:—'The building of the protestant chapel proceeds rapidly. For the present, a house is hired. The English Church liturgy is translated into Hebrew, and printed, and the missionary Nikolayson performs divine service, with his assistant Plent. An institution for converts has been established by the English Missionary Society, and a Hebrew prayer-book is to be published. The English consul endeavors to engage the Jews to cultivate the land of their fathers, under the favor of Mehemet Ali, and considerable quantities of land have been purchased for foreign emigrants. It is said, there is somewhere a Talmudic saying, that when there shall be 25,000 Jewish inhabitants in the Holy Land, the laws and regulations must be again enforced which prevailed when Palestine was a Jewish state. The rabbis in Turkey are endeavoring to complete the above number, by colonists which doubtless will not be difficult under the powerful protection of England. Some rich Jews in London and Italy intend to establish factories and manufactories in Jerusalem, and some other considerable towns under the protection of England. The English government, has appointed a vice consul at Jerusalem for all Palestine."—Hamburg Correspondent.

Things Valuable.—A young saint; an old martyr; a religious soldier; a conscientious statesman; a great man courteous; a learned man humble; a woman loving silence; a friend not changed with prosperity; a sick man cheerful; and a soul departing with comfort.

When Oliver Cromwell first coined his money, an old Cavalier, looking upon one of the new pieces, read this inscription on one side, God with us; on the other side, The Commonwealth of England. "I see (said he) God and the Commonwealth are on different sides."

FOR THE FARMER.

Packing Butter.—The increased price of butter in autumn, as well as its scarcity in winter, renders the best mode of packing it a matter of some importance.—There are several particulars of minor importance to be attended to, to which greater or less attention is given by good butter makers; but the two leading requisites without which there must be a failure, and with which there cannot easily be, are clean vessels and thorough working.

The importance of the former, in obtaining perfectly sweet butter, must be evident to every one; hence the necessity of washing vessels by scalding: and where they become rusty from disuse, of employing chloride of lime.

In order to keep the sweetness, it is indispensibly necessary that every particle of buttermilk be worked out before packing down. This is ascertained when none ceases to flow from it. Inexperienced butter makers generally perform this part of the operation very imperfectly. Work the butter four times as long as you think necessary, and then perhaps you will have half completed it. When it is thoroughly worked, pack it down by beating it in a strong brine, and keep it in the coolest part of the cellar, and you need not fear its becoming injured by keeping before next winter.

Hints to those who own Horses.—A correspondent of the Pearl says it is an egregious error to use blinders on horses—that it is a strange custom derived from England where it is fast going out of use, and is almost unknown elsewhere. He adds, that instead of preventing they increase shying, while they add to the head-stall an uncomfortable weight, and interfere with the movements of the horse.—Several gentlemen in Boston have disused them on their gig harness.

PROSPECTUS
OF
THE CASKET,
AND PHILADELPHIA MONTHLY MAGAZINE.

THE great increase of the subscription list of the Casket, which has been nearly doubled since the commencement of the last volume, warrants the most extensive improvements on the first of July 1840, at which time a new volume will be commenced with increased vigour. Nothing need be said of the firm basis on which the Casket stands, it being already the oldest magazine in the country, and has maintained its popularity, in the face of all opposition. It is to be found upon the centre tables of families making literary pretentions from Maine to Georgia.

Type—Embellishments.

The Casket is printed with a clear and beautiful type, upon the finest white paper. The illustrations are not surpassed by those of any periodical, at home or abroad: and beside the monthly steel engravings, a quarterly plate of colored Fashions has lately been added. The style of these embellishments is unequaled, and they are always accompanied by an appropriate sketch. No wood cuts disgrace the work. Whatever appears in the Casket, is of the first order of art.

The volume will be with the first of a series of splendid mezzotint engravings, prepared expressly for the work, by the burin of Sartain, who deservedly stands as the best engraver of the kind in the United States.

Literary character.

The literary character of the Casket is well known. It is wholly original, of the highest order, and sustained by writers of the first rank. Essays, Tales Sketches and Travels, compose its prominent prose articles; while the poetry is equalled by that of no other magazine of like character. The variety for which the Casket is celebrated, shall suffer no diminution; but on the contrary every exertion shall be made to increase its interest.

Several Romances of the Revolution have already appeared, and others shall follow in the course of the volume, presenting when finished, a complete picture of the manners, and a historical account of the great battles of that time. Thus, the Casket, instead of being filled with sickly sentimentalities, aims at a true delineation of human nature in every variety of passion.

The series of thrilling nautical sketches, entitled Cruizing in the Last War, and which are rated by the contemporary press, equal to the celebrated sketches from 'Tom Cringle's Log,' will be continued and the 'Leaves from a Lawyer's Port Folio,' which have attained a deserved celebrity, will still furnish attraction to the Magazine.

We shall furnish the readers of the Casket with some valuable papers from entirely new contributors. The author of 'Old Ironsides on a Lee Shore,' will give the first of a number of Sketches in the July number. We count upon his prolific and graceful pen to do much in maintaining the great popularity of the Magazine. In addition to the variety already embraced in the pages of the Magazine, our Syrian Letters, the first of which appears in the June number as introductory, will interest and add worth to its pages. They are from no unpractised pen.

Fashions.

The Fashions are published in the Casket quarterly, or as often as any really new style arrives from Paris. The engravings are designed and executed from original designs. No old worn out plates are retouched and then published as the latest fashions.— The truth of our designs may be tested by comparing them with the latest description of dresses from London and Paris. They are universally admitted to be the finest specimens of engraving and coloring afforded by any Magazine in the country.

The expense of getting them up is great, but we shall in no wise abate the quality. Remember!— The readers of the Casket are furnished with these fashion plates as an extra. They do not interfere with the regular and choice engravings which always accompany the work.

Time of Publication.

The Casket is published on the first of the month in every quarter of the Union. The most distant subscriber consequently receives it on that day as well as those who reside in Philadelphia. In all the principal cities agents have been established, [illegible] means subscribers in the vicinity can obtain their copies free of postage.

Terms.—Three Dollars per annum, or Two Copies yearly for Five Dollars, invariably in advance, post paid. No new subscriber received, without the money, or the name of a responsible agent.

Editors who may copy this prospectus and will send a copy, marked with ink, addressed to the Saturday Evening Post (which will save postage on newspapers), shall be promptly furnished with the work. To be particular in this matter, we should like a copy of the paper marked, to be sent more than once, that no mistake or delay may occur.— Editors are served with the Magazine from the time the advertisement is inserted. We mention this, as many inserted the advertisement at the close of the last volume, and expected all the back numbers.— This of course we could not be expected to grant.

Ladies Department.

Mrs. L. M. CARPENTER, Preceptress.

This Institution is located in the pleasant and healthful village of De Ruyter. Its buildings are both spacious and commodious. Study rooms of which there are a large number, are furnished with chairs, tables, bedsteads, and stoves, and rented to gentlemen at one shilling per week; or one shilling for each student, the rooms being large enough to accommodate two. Good board is afforded at one dollar and twenty five cents per week, including washing or lodging. One shilling extra, is charged to those who require both.

The institution is furnished with a good Philosophical and chemical apparatus. It is also furnished with a valuable Library. A scientific society connected with the Institute, is furnished with a choice collection of Minerals and Curiosities.

About twenty-one thousand dollars has already been expended on the De Ruyter Institute for the purpose of facilitating the student in his pursuit of scientific knowledge.

It is the object of those to whom the management of the Institute is entrusted, to make the expenses of acquiring a knowledge of the sciences, as light as possible.

And the public may be assured that a strict attention will be paid to the moral cultivation of the student; and the trustees and teachers will spare no reasonable pains to render the time spent at the De Ruyter Institute, as agreeable and profitable to the student as circumstances will admit.

Young gentlemen and ladies wishing to engage in the pursuit of science, are respectfully invited to spend a term or two, at the De Ruyter Institute and satisfy themselves in regard to its merit.

The year is divided into three terms, of fourteen weeks each. The first term commenced on the twelth day of September; The second term on the second day of January; and the third term on the eighth day of May.

DARKNESS.

BY F. GLANVILLE.

The evening spreads its sable pinions round,
Diffusing darkness o'er the wide-spread ground.
Darkness of Nature! mystery most profound!
Thy native depths our noblest thoughts confound.
From everlasting, still thou art the same,
Changeless thy nature, not unchanged thy name.
Creation did not alter thy command,
Thou art "the night," now resting on the land;
Mysterious something, what, no tongue can say,
The counterpart, the first part of the day.
Light was created by Jehovah's word,
But thou existed long before the world;
No sun, nor moon, nor stars appeared in view
In thy dominion, then, of deepest hue;
Nonentity made way to give thee room,
All conquering monarch, of its dreaded gloom.

Thick clouds are but thy chariots; they appear
(But for thy presence) bright, and fair, and clear.
Clouds and thick darkness are around His throne,
Who dwells in darkness, who is Light alone.
Thus he appeared on Sinai's awful height
The God of darkness and the God of light.
Light, that led Israel to the promised land,
Darkness appear'd, to Pharaoh's hostile band.

Light! thou art pleasant for the eye to see!
Darkness! deep, solemn, elder part of day!
Thou aged sister, first-born twin of light,
Thou sable Goddess, solemn darkness! night!
Here thou art now, but where an hour since?
Where 12 hours hence, or why withdraw thee thence!
Is day a youth, and stronger than thy age?
Perchance the blank, and thou the written page.
Dost thou retire before the beams of light,
As age resigns to youth, infirmity to night?
Art thou more modest than the break of day
Retiring soft and quick, nor ling'ring stay?
Or is thy dreadful presence forced away
At once to hear light's voice, at once obey?
Then reverence to thy shade we justly pay,
And honor thee beyond the break of day.

RELIGIOUS.

From Scott's Christian Life.

PROOFS OF PROVIDENCE.

One sensible instance of a Divine Providence is the constant direction of things to the same good ends which have no design in themselves. When we see things void of all sense and reason as constantly directed to good ends, as they could be if they had sense and reason, we may be sure that there is a reason without them that framed them for those ends, and directs them to them; it being unconceivable how chance or blind necessity, that have no design or art or contrivance in them, should constantly operate as regularly as reason itself.—Now if we survey this vast universality of things, we may easily observe, at least of the generality of them, that they are framed for and directed to some wise and excellent end; and though through our own short-sightedness or want of enquiry, we do not see the use and tendency of them all, yet this is no argument at all that they are vain and superfluous; for, as we now see the use of a world of things which past generations understood not, so there is no doubt but future generations will understand the use of a world more than we; and therefore since the usefulness of the generality of things is now so apparent and visible, we ought in all reason to conclude, that our not discerning the usefulness of them all, proceeds not from their defect, but from our own ignorance.

Let us therefore briefly survey this beautiful scene of things that is before us. The sun and earth, for instance, are things utterly void of understanding, and therefore can have no design or contrivance in them; how then came they to place and continue themselves at such a commodious distance from one another; whereas in such a vast and immense space they might have found ten thousand millions of other places to fix in? The earth might have found room enough to place itself either much nearer to, or much remoter from the sun than it is; but if it had done so, it must have either been everlastingly parched or everlastingly frozen and benighted, and either way converted into an useless, barren and uninhabitable desert; whereas, as it now is, it stands at the most convenient distance from the sun, to be warmed and cherished by his enlivening fires, and neither to be roasted by being too near them, nor frozen by being too far from them; but to receive from them such a temperate heat, as is sufficient to excite its seminal virtues, and to draw up its juices into them, and thereby to ripen its natural fruits, and in a word to comfort and refresh its inhabitants, and to render it to them a pleasant, a heathful, and a fruitful paradise. Since therefore of ten thousand millions of places wherein it might have fixed in that immensity of space that surrounds it, it hath fixed upon, and doth still continue in the best, without any design or wisdom of its own, it is plain that there is an over-ruling wisdom without it, that chose its place, and fixes and determines it thereunto. Again, how came the sun, (for whether it be the earth that moves about the sun, or the sun about the earth is all one to our enquiry,) how came this sun, I say, which hath no reason to govern itself by, to be determined to such a useful course of motion? what makes this vast and mighty body move round the earth in twenty-four hours, in finishing which spacious circle of motion, it must fly far swifter than a bullet from a cannon's mouth, and yet through so many ages each twenty-four hours it hath constantly performed, without being so much as one minute faster or slower; whereby it makes those just and regular returns of day and night to both hemispheres, so that neither the one or the other is too much heated by his presence, or too long benighted by his absence; because as soon as the one hath been sufficiently warmed and cherished with his rays, he immediately retires from it into the other, and by so doing he gives the active animals leave to rest, the overheated air to cool, and the gasping earth to repair its fainting virtues, which a continued heat would soon exhaust and extinguish. Thus by returning day and night to both parts of the earth once in twenty-four hours, he preserves both their heat and moisture, upon which all generation depends, in a due and regular temper; so that neither their radical moisture is consumed by the parching droughts of the day, nor their vital heat extinguished by the cool moistures of the night, but the one still allays and tempers the other by their quick and alternate revolutions. How then came the sun, that understands no utility, and designs no end, to be determined to this course of motion, which above all others is so admirably useful and advantageous to this world we live in? Again, what is the reason that since he thus equally moves round the earth, he doth not always move in the same circle; but run out every day into a different circle almost a whole degree farther northward or southward, and this so constantly and precisely, that in six thousand succeeding revolutions, he hath never varied so much as one minute from his course either one way or the other, and by these his stated excurrences towards the north and south, he makes the seasons of the year, gives a summer and a winter, a spring and a fall to all parts of the earth, without which, the earth would long ere this have been utterly useless, and all its fruits, and for want of them its animals too, would have forever perished? For some parts of it would have been scorched with everlasting heat, others bound up with everlasting frost; here it would have been all a sandy, there all an icy desert, and so both vegetation and generation would every where have utterly ceased, either for want of moisture or for want of heat. How came the sun then, which hath neither sense or reason of his own to guide him, to be directed into such a commodious course of annual motion, when in that vast space he moves in, he might as well have run ten thousand other courses of motion; he might have moved all the year round the earth's equator; but if he had done so, all the middle tracts of the earth both northward and southward would soon have been scorched up with his continual presence, and all the remoter parts both ways would quickly have died with cold through his perpetual absence: or he might have run his course on one side only of the earth's equator; and made his circular excursions to or beyond the pole; but if he had done so, he must have left a great part of the opposing hemisphere exposed to everlasting night and cold: whereas in the annual course of motion he now performs, he sheds forth his light, and heat, and influence over all the world, and by turns gives every part its yearly seasons; which is a plain evidence, that all his motions are conducted by a wise and over-ruling mind, which among so many courses of motion that lie before him in the boundless space he moves in, hath determined him to that which, for perpetuity, is much the best and most commodious.

And the same is to be said of the motions of the moon, which nature hath designed for a vicarious light to the sun, to supply his absence, and perform his office in the lower world. For what makes this senseless and irrational planet, that moves without any intention of its own, wander by turns northward and southward some degrees beyond the sun? And what makes it move northward when the sun is southward, and again southward when the sun is northward; whereas in that immense space wherein it swims, it hath room enough to run a thousand other courses of motion, none of which could have been so advantageous to us as this? For by moving northward when the sun is southward, and so en contra, it moderates the cold and darkness of the winter nights; and by passing beyond the tropics, which are the boundaries of the sun, it in some measure supplies his absence, by enlightening those long and tedious nights in which the regions towards the poles are buried; which is a plain instance of the singular care of Providence, that no parts of the earth should be left altogether destitute of the necessary comforts of the heavenly light and warmth.

EXTRACTS FROM THE BIOGRAPHY OF DR. PAYSON.

WRITTEN NEAR THE CLOSE OF HIS LIFE.

You ought to feel happy, all ought to feel happy who come here, for they are within a few steps of heaven. During the conversation he repeated this verse: 'Thy sun shall no more go down, neither shall the moon withdraw itself; for the Lord shall be thine everlasting light, and the days of thy mourning shall be ended.' Turning to a young lady present he said, 'Do you not think this worth traveling over many high hills and difficult places to obtain? Give my love to my friends in Boston; tell them all I ever said in praise of God or religion falls infinitely below the truth.'

To a clergyman. 'O, if ministers only saw the inconceivable glory that is before them, and the preciousness of Christ, they would not be able to refrain going about, leaping and clapping their hands for joy, and exclaiming—I am a minister of Christ.'

'When I read Bunyan's description of the land of Beulah, where the sun shines and the birds sing day and night, I used to doubt whether there was such a place; but now my own experience has convinced me of it, and it infinitely transcends all my previous conceptions.'

'I think the happiness I enjoy is similar to that enjoyed by glorified spirits before the resurrection.'

'O what a blessed spirit it is to lose one's will. Since I have lost my will I have found happiness. There can be no such thing as disappointment to me, for I have no desires but that God's will may be accomplished.'

'I can find no words to express my happiness. I seem to be swimming in a river of pleasure, which is carrying me on to the great fountain.'

'Christians might avoid much trouble and inconvenience, if they would only believe what they profess, that God is able to make them happy without any thing else.'

'I seem to swim in a flood of glory which God pours down upon me. And I know, I know that my happiness is but begun; I cannot doubt that it will last forever. And now is this all a delusion? Is it a delusion which can fill the soul to overflowing, with joy under such circumstances? If so, it is surely a delusion better than any reality. But no—it is not a delusion; I feel that it is not. I do not merely know that I shall enjoy all this, I enjoy it now.'

From the Southern Christian Advocate.

'How amiable are thy tabernacles, O Lord of Hosts!'
"There shall be no more death, neither sorrow, nor crying, neither shall there be any more pain."

How beautiful, how beautiful,
The land of promised calm,
Where Sharon's roses ceaseless bloom,
And Gilead's trees of balm;

Where every tear is wiped away,
And every wrong redressed;
Where the wicked cease from troubling,
And the weary are at rest.

How beautiful, where cherub forms
With cherub voices sing;
And the seraph veils a face of joy
Beneath his folded wing;

Where sainted spirits meekly bow,
Their sins and sorrows done;
The burthen borne, the battle fought,
The victor's garland won.

Why love we then a sin-stained earth!
When fetterless to roam
'Tis ours among yon isles of light;
Each starry isle a home.

Where glorious shapes in vesture bright,
The palm branch in each hand,
With shouted joy, and whispered love,
In radiant myriads stand.

Home of the pure and innocent!
Where spirits live and love;
Home, where the holy and the just,
A Saviour's mercies prove.

Home of the Christian's humble hope,
The Christian's ardent prayer;
Who would that humblest hope forego,
For all that's certain here?

THE CHRISTIAN'S HOPE.—What is it that comforts and consoles the weary traveler through time and under deep affliction and heavy adversity? What is it that cheers and enlivens his heart as he is beset on every side and harrassed with difficulties from every quarter? What is it that supports the fainting spirit even in the solemn hour of death? 'Tis hope—the cordial of life, the healing balm for every wound. 'Tis the hope that through the grace of God when his trials and troubles are ended here, he shall be translated to the kingdom of eternal glory. 'Tis the hope that when the cold and icy billows of Jordan's dark stream shall have been passed, his unfettered spirit shall soar aloft on angel's wings unto God who gave it, to be forever, forever with the Lord. 'Tis the hope that when the thunder of the last and awful trump shall arouse the sleeping dead and call all nations into the presence of God, he shall view with peace the Judge his Savior and hear the welcome plaudit, "well done good and faithful servant enter thou into the joys of thy Lord."—Christian Index.

EFFECTS OF THE HOLY SPIRIT.—Mark the rain that falls from above, and the same shower that droppeth out of one cloud increaseth sundry plants in a garden, and severally according to the condition of every plant; in one stalk it makes a rose, in another a violet, divers in a third, and sweetning all. So the Spirit works its multifarious effects in several complexions, and all according to the increase of God. Is thy habit and inclination choleric? Why, try thyself if thou be very apt to be zealous in a good cause, and it turns thy natural infirmity into holy heat. Is melancholy predominant? The grace of God will turn that sad humor into devotion, prayer, and mortifying thy pleasures to die unto the world. Is thy temperature sanguine and cheerful? The goodness of God will allow it unto thee in thy civil life, in a good mean; but over and above, it will make thee bountiful, easy to pardon injuries, glad of reconciliations, comfortable to the distressed, always rejoicing in the Lord. Is a man phlegmatic and fearful? If this freezing disease, which is in thee from thy mother's womb, be not absolutely cured, yet the Holy Ghost will work upon it, to make thy conscience tender, wary to give no offense, to make thee pitiful, penitent, contrite, ready to weep for thy transgressions. "There are two handles to take hold of every thing," says a heathen; a dissolute man takes hold of original frailities, and makes them serpents; a holy man declines their serpentine nature, and catcheth them by that part which may conduce to all manner of virtue. This is the comfort of hope against original inquination, that this great enemy, by the operations of the Spirit, shall be made our friend or our footstool.—Taylor.

PRESIDENT EDWARD'S RESOLUTIONS.

Resolved, that I will do whatsoever I think to be most to God's glory, and my own good, profit, and pleasure, in the whole of my duration; without any consideration of the time, whether now, or never so many myriads of ages hence. Resolved to do what I think to be my duty, and most for the good and advantage of mankind in general. Resolved to do this, whatever difficulties I meet with, how many, and how great soever.

Resolved, to be continually endeavoring to find out some new invention and contrivance to promote the forementioned things.

Resolved, never to do any manner of thing, whether in soul or body, less or more, but what tends to the glory of God; nor be, nor suffer it, if I can avoid it.

Resolved, never to lose one moment of time; but improve it the most profitable way I possibly can.

Resolved, to live with all my might while I do live.

Resolved, never to do any thing which I should be afraid to do if it were the last hour of my life.

Resolved, to think much on all occasions of the common circumstances which attend death.

Resolved, when I think of any theorem of divinity to be solved, immediately to do what I can towards solving it, if circumstances do not hinder.

Resolved, to be endeavoring to find out fit objects of charity and liberality.

Resolved, never to do any thing out of revenge.

Resolved, never to suffer the least motions of anger to irrational beings.

How happy is the real Christian, whom divine grace prepares for death long before the event takes place! How great are his obligations to the Holy Spirit, for a disposition to exercises and pursuits to which he himself once felt as relectant, as those who still continue 'children of wrath.'—Let him persevere in giving increasing proof of his being a real convert, by a becoming state of mind and behaviour. Thus will he be always ready for his last and great change, let it happen when it will, with or without previous notice. He may choose rather to be found by it, when employed in devotional exercises; but if it should surprise him in the midst of his worldly business, his soul will not be less safe. His lamp, when lighted, will not 'go out' for want of oil. To him, sudden death will be sudden glory.—Burnside.

'MID THE HILLS

BY RODNEY L. ADAMS.

Beneath me are the rock-bound streams,
Around me are a hundred hills,
Above, a flood of golden beams,
That all the earth with glory fills.

Birds on their light, unfettered wings,
Are thronging ev'ry bush and dell;
While each, a minstrel, happy, sings,
And all in blissful union dwell.

Eternal One, how great thy love!
Thy power let all the earth proclaim!—
Below, around,—in heav'n above,
Ten thousand transports speak thy name.

Oh, here, 'mid nature's majesty,
Within this wild, primeval dome,
Where thought seems echoed back from Thee,
Let breath and pulse Thy presence own,

'Mong rock and stream, from human strife,
Where untaught music deeply thrills,
I'll muse of Thee, great King of life,
And praise Thee, 'mid Thine ancient hills.

Oh! the blessed choice of that soul that is still seeking more love to God, more affection, and more ability to do him service: that counts all days and hours for lost that are not employed to this improvement; that hears the word in public and reads it in private for this purpose, to kindle this love, or to blow the spark, if any there be already in the heart, to raise it to a clear flame, and from a little flame to make it burn yet hotter and purer, and rise higher. But, above all means, is often presenting this in prayer to him, on whose influence all depends in whose hands our hearts are, much more than in our own. Oh! that happy word of David, worthy to be twice repeated; when shall we say it? Oh God my heart is fixed; I will sing and praise.—Leighton.

The graces which the blessed Spirit implants in our hearts, resemble a sun-dial; which is of little service except when the sun shines upon it. The Holy Spirit must shine upon the graces he has given, or they will leave us at a loss (in point of spiritual comfort,) and unable to tell whereabouts we are.—Toplady.

We may know what Christ has done for us, by what he has done in us.—Mason.

FOR THE CHRISTIAN.

From the N. Y. Evangelist.

Watching thereunto with all perseverance.—St. Paul.

Christians sometimes wonder why their prayers are not more efficacious. They pray for various, and often for particular objects, but find no answer. Especially do they find this to be the case, when they pray for the advancement of their own personal piety. But the mystery is easily solved: they do not WATCH as well as PRAY. For example: the Christian, before going into the world in the morning, prays, "O Lord, keep me this day. I beseech thee, from all vain and wicked thoughts—from all inordinate desires—from worldly-mindedness of every form, and grant that I may walk worthy of the high vocation whereunto I am called. Let the words of my mouth, and the meditation of my heart, be acceptable in thy sight, O Lord, my strength and my Redeemer." This is a solemn and interesting petition; but he goes forth, without "watching thereunto." At once he engages in conversation well calculated to awaken the very thoughts and call into exercise the very sort of desires, against which he had so earnestly prayed. He runs into temptation, and then perhaps the very next time he prays, he pleads for deliverance from temptation. No wonder such prayers are not answered. Such petitions always go away empty. Whoever really and truly desires that God would hear and answer his prayers, must "watch thereunto, with all perseverance."

We often prevent the answer of our petitions by our own voluntary carelessness. If we send a note to a friend, asking a favor, which we know he is abundantly able and willing to bestow, we expect the bearer will bring a favorable answer. And sometimes we wait and watch for the messenger's return. Thus we should always send our requests up to God, and fully believing in his ability and readiness to grant us all we need, we should confidently and patiently wait for the answer.

The phrase, "watching thereunto," as quoted above, has by no means a limited signification. It does not mean, as will be readily seen by referring to the preceding context, that we must watch unto every particular or specified prayer; but watch unto every prayer. The import of the exhortation is evidently this: If you pray in the morning, "keep me from vain and wicked thoughts," &c., as before specified, watch thereunto; i. e., be careful not to do any thing that will prevent the answer. Avoid all conversation that would naturally awaken such thoughts and desires. If you pray that you may be enabled to deal uprightly with your fellow-men, watch thereunto; i. e., remember your petition whenever you are brought into contact with others, and endeavor in all your dealings with men to seek as much their interest as your own. If you pray for the salvation of sinners watch thereunto; i. e., do all in your power to turn sinners from the error of their ways; be careful, in all the diversity of active life, that you do and say nothing to prevent an answer to your petition.

If you do not expect that God will hear and answer you when you pray, what benefit do you derive from prayer?

Whoever wishes to be a growing, active, joyful Christian—to be more and more like Jesus in heart and life, let him pray much, and then follow the injunctions of Paul at the head of this article. D. F. J.

FAULTS OF PRAYER.

Some of the faults of public prayer are the following:—

1. Doctrinal prayers, or prayers designed to inculcate certain doctrines, which are regarded as essential or important. But should a prayer be thus converted into a sermon? Is a prayer designed to teach men, or is it not an address to God?

2. Historical prayers, in which are comprised long narratives for the information of those, who may not be acquainted with the details of the facts referred to. But is narrative the business of prayer—or not rather petition?

3. Hortatory prayers, designed to stir up the zeal of the congregation in regard to some particular subject, which at the moment may be thought interesting.

4. Denunciatory prayers, designed to warn against certain errors or practices, to put down certain sentiments, or to awaken towards them indignant feelings; being appeal to men, not addressed to God.

5. Prayers which have a design or palpable bearing on individuals. The case of the afflicted, who ask prayers, is not intended,—though in regard to prayers for them, some caution against too great particularity is requisite;—but the personality, which may spring from a desire to administer a secret reproof or to bestow commendation, some individual being expressly in the mind of the praying man. But should not public prayers be general—such, as all Christians may join in, instead of having a secret aim for or against any individual?

6. Prayers of eloquence, in which there is a display of a brilliant fancy and of polished and eloquent language, compelling the hearer to say—"what a fine prayer that was!"

7. Prayers of familiarity, in which there is an evident absence of that sacred awe and reverence, which should fill the mind in every approach to God.

8. Sectarian prayers, which indicate very clearly an attachment to a particular sect among the multitude of Christian denominations.

9. Long prayers, which weary and exhaust the spirit of devotion.

There are those who seem to think that public prayer is an address of a company of Christians to God,—all guilty and needing mercy—all weak and needing divine strength—all either subject or exposed to calamity, and needing support and consolation—all breathing the same benevolent and pious desires—all with hearts full of praise to the Father of mercies;—and that praying is a different thing from preaching and exhortation. A.

THE GOOD CHRISTIAN.—A good Christian is God's servant, the world's Master, and his own man: Virtue is his business, study his recreation, contentment his rest, and happiness his reward. God is his father, the church is his mother, the saints his brethren, and he is a friend to all that need him.

Heaven is his inheritance, religion his mistress, mercy and justice his two ladies of honor, devotion his chaplain, chastity his chamberlain, sobriety his butler, temperance his cook, hospitality his housekeeper, providence his steward, honesty his treasurer, piety his mistress of the house, and discretion his porter, to let him in and out as most fit. Thus is his whole family made up with Virtue, and he is the true master of the family.

He is obliged to take the world in his way to Heaven, but he walks through it as fast as he can; and all his business by the way is to glorify the name of God, and to do good to mankind.

Take him all in two words, he is a MAN and a CHRISTIAN.

FOR PARENTS.

PARENTAL AFFECTION.

It is not like common friendship, which, often for interest, will decline when that interest expires; which, often springing from caprice, is mutable as the source from which it sprung; which comes in prosperity, but cannot stand the storms of misfortune, still less of disgrace. When the storm which is desolate, when adversity has swept over us, and life is stript bare of every charm, above all, when calumny, which "walketh in darkness," has shed its deadly blight on the reputation; when all drop away from the striken spirit, and he too, "our companion, our guide," our "own familiar friend," with whom "we took sweet counsel together,"—when he too "passes by on the other side," and scarcely cares, amid the cold scoff and the rude sarcasm, and the "altered eye of hard unkindness," to give vent to the brief cry, "alas! my brother!"—who then remains, still "faithful among the faithless," still ready to enter with real sympathy into all our griefs, to search out every extenuating circumstance in our errors, to dwell upon every redeeming feature in our character, to strain after every streak of hope in our obscured prospects? It is the same form which hung over the cradle of infancy, and sat by the bed of languor; which rejoiced when we rejoiced, and wept when we wept. "Can a woman forget" her own child, that she should not have compassion on the son of her womb? All others on earth may forsake thee, but the parent will not forsake thee.

Such is parental affection, which "loveth at all times,"—in grief, in misfortunes, in sickness, in neglect, in disgrace itself. It is therefore no subject of surprise if the Mosaic law, which like the primitive codes of Greece and Rome, had made no provision against a crime so monstrous and incredible as parricide, extended its severest penalties to the lesser but still most appalling shapes of filial disobedience. It [illegible] that he who could shut out from his breast the most powerful instinct of nature, would never feel the obligation of minor laws—that he who could requite with ingratitude the unalterable tenderness of a parent, would never estimate any blessing which the allurements of civil society could confer. He was excluded from a system of which an interchange of kindly acts is the predominant element, as incapable of understanding the nature of its duties and the value of its privileges. "His lamp," saith the Scripture, "shall be put out in obscure darkness." But a peculiar blessing, even length of days in the land of promise, reserved for him who should "honor" his parents. And the meaning of that honor—which is not a cold, formal respect merely, but a warm and active sympathy, which anticipates every wish and interprets every want—is beautifully illustrated by the son of Sirach, when he directs the subject of his instruction "to help" "his father in his age," and not "to grieve him as long as he liveth;" and, "if his understanding fail," "to have patience with him," and not "to despise him;" for, it is affectingly added, "the relieving of thy father shall not be forgotten;" "in the day of thine affliction it shall be remembered." It is thus that is fulfilled that beneficent design of Divine Providence, which it is impossible to trace without sensations of exquisite delight; by which in a perpetual circle of tender offices, the vigor of one age is made subservient to the helplessness of another—the father in manhood to the son in infancy; and, again, the son in mature years to the father in declining days.—Rev. Professor Jeremie.

My son, keep my words, and lay up my commandments with thee.—Proverbs.

DAY OF JUDGMENT.

"Some years since, a clergyman who held a respectable rank among his brethren, became convinced that the time for the arrival of the great last day approached; and from a careful examination of the prophecies, was enabled to fix upon the very Sabbath upon which the Judge would make his appearance. So deeply was he impressed with this important truth, that it gave a new impulse to his preaching, and prompted him to most incredible labors and exertions.—He went from congregation to congregation, and announced his message. He exhorted the impenitent with an eloquence which he never could before; and his language awakened the thoughtless and interested the curious. He preached several times every day; he crowded on his journeys through storms and darknesss, and acted himself under the full impression of the truth of his delusion.

"One evening he rode through the rain, as it fell in torrents, to meet an appointment in one of the villages in New Jersey, where a congregation had gathered with great anxiety, to hear his annunciations.—He ascended the desk, and commenced his fervid exhortation. 'Three days hence,' said he, 'and you will behold the Son of Man coming in the clouds of heaven. Prepare to meet him.'

"The Sabbath came on; the house of God, not only in that village, but in the neighboring towns, was crowded; and all ears were opened to hear, and all eyes awake to see.

"A venerable clergyman in the village to which we refer, informed us that he entered his desk that morning astonished at the excitement around him. He took his text in the Revelation, 'Behold he cometh in the clouds, and every eye shall see him, and they also that pierced him: and all kindreds of the earth shall wail because of him.' He dwelt on the day of judgment—on its eternity, and its glory. He admonished his flock that this was no new doctrine. Year after year he had warned them of it; and yet, they were asleep under his admonitions. Now, when a man who is evidently deranged, comes, and, fixing upon a day, tells you a falsehood, and gives you no evidence, how many are alarmed, and how much anxiety is manifest!

"It is unnecessary to add that the prediction of the prophetic minister was not fulfilled. The Sabbath passed away with no unusual appearance, and the fears of the people subsided.

"This incident is not without its lesson of insiruction.

"1. It teaches us to be careful in studying the prophecies; not to be certain on questions of a doubtful nature; and not to be too confident of our peculiar interpretation. There is one rule about the day of judgment, in which we may confidently confido; it will come as a thief in the night; no man or angel can reveal the day or the hour; the Savior himself cannot disclose it to his most intimate followers.—It will take the world by surprise.

"2. It teaches ministers, that if they realize the importance of eternal things as they ought, they could and would preach with greater eloquence and power."

CHRIST IS A SHEPHERD

1. Because he has purchased his people. A shepherd becomes by purchase the owner of his sheep; and so Christ, by laying down his life—an inestimable price—redeemed a goodly company to be his own possession. They were previously far estranged from him, and serving other masters. And therefore he came "to seek and to save those that were lost." This kindness of his he pointedly refers to, when he says, "The good Shepherd giveth his life for his sheep."

2. Christ calls himself a shepherd, because he feeds his people. The shepherd is charged to find pasture for his flocks; and in some countries, it is necessary to use much care and skill in selecting wholesome pastures. Thus we read that Jacob's sons, who were shepherds, had often to go to a great distance from their father's habitation; where he dwelt in Hebron, they fed their flocks in Shechen and in Dothan. Just so, Christ provides for his followers food convenient for them. He satisfies their hunger with healthful nutriment: he quenches their thirst with living water, causing them to drink of the clear river, whose "streams make glad the city of God."

3. Christ calls himself a shepherd, because he guides his people. Every one must have observed that the sheep is an animal most prone to stray; and, having strayed, it is least able to retrace his steps to the fold. A shepherd, therefore, has to be very watchful, that he loses none of his flock. When he leads them along a road, he has often much trouble to make them keep the right path. He must have his eyes upon every one of them. Just so, Christ not only points out the way in which his are to walk, but treads it himself, that they may follow him, warns them continually against leaving it, keeps them by his vigilance, leads tenderly the feeble and the young: and if one strays away, he goes with anxious compassion to seek it; and when he hath found it, he bears it back upon his shoulders rejoicing.

4. Christ calls himself a shepherd because he defends his people. The sheep is a very timid creature: it has no means of repelling attack, but falls an easy prey to every wild beast. And, therefore, in lands where savage animals are found, the shepherd is careful to secure his fold; and very often as we read of the shepherd of Bethlehem, to watch his flock all night. Just so, Christ is careful to place his followers in safety. They are surrounded by powerful foes, too strong for them; but he does not leave them exposed to their assaults.—Having received his Church as a precious deposit from his Father, he diligently keeps it. "I give unto them eternal life: and they shall never perish, neither shall any man pluck them out of my hand: my Father which gave them unto me, is greater than all, and no man is able to pluck them out of my Father's hand."—Ayer.

BEAUTIFUL EXTRACT.

BY DR. F. A. KRUMMACHER.

The Parsee, the Jew, and the Christian.

A Jew entered a Parsee temple, and beheld the sacred fire; what, said he to the priest, do ye worship the fire? Not the fire, answered the priest; in is an emblem of the sun, and of the genial heat. Do you then worship the sun as your God?—asked the Jew. Know ye not this luminary also, is but the work of that Almighty Creator?

We know it, replied the priest, but the uncultivated man requires a sensible sign, in order to form a conception of the Most High. And is not the sun, the imcomprehensible source of light, an image of that invisible Being, who blesses and preserves all things?

The Israelite thereupon rejoined.—Do your people then distinguish the type from the original? They call the sun their God, and descending, even from this, to a baser object, they kneel before un earthly flame. Ye amuse the outward, but blind the inward eye, and while ye hold to them the earthly, ye withdraw from them the heavenly light. Thou shalt not make unto thee any image or any likeness.

How then do you designate the Supreme Being? asked the Parsee.

We call him Jehovah Adonia, that is, the Lord who is, who was, and who will be, answered the Jew.

Your appellation is grand and sublime, said the Parsee, but is awful too.

A Christian then drew nigh and said—We call Him FATHER.

The Pagan and the Jew looked at each other, and said—Here is at once an image and reality, it is a word of the heart, said they.

Therefore, they raised their eyes to heaven, and said with reverence and love—Our FATHER? And they took each other by the hand, and all three called one another brothers.

CHRISTIAN INTEGRITY AND PROGRESS.

It is not lawful for you to make such a compromise with God, as to undertake a part of the duties prescribed to you in His word; and to omit part of them at your pleasure. For in the first place, He every where recommends integrity as a principal branch of His worship; by which he intends a sincere simplicity of heart, free from all guile and falsehood; the opposite of which is a double heart, as though it had been said, that the beginning of a life of uprightness is spiritual, when the internal affection of the mind is unfeignedly devoted to God in the cultivation of holiness and righteousness. But since no man in this terrestrial and corporeal prison has strength sufficient to press forward in his course with a due degree of alacrity, and the majority are oppressed with such great debility, that they stagger and halt, and even creep on the ground, and so make very inconsiderable advances; let us every one proceed according to our small ability, and prosecute the journey we have begun. No man will be so unhappy, but that he may every day make some progress, however small. Therefore let us not cease to do this, that we may be incessantly advancing in the way of the Lord.—Calvin.

BAD COMPANY.—While Samson lived the avowed enemy of the Philistines, and far from their cities, he was revered among them as a man elevated of God, to restore the glory of Israel; but scarcely had he associated with this perfidious nation; scarcely had he formed connections with them and begun to imitate their manners, before he become the pun of Gaza, and the laughter of their public sports.—Massilon.

Set about doing good to somebody; put on your hat, and go and visit the sick or the poor; seek out the desolate and oppressed, and tell them of the consolations of religion. I have often tried this method, and have always found it the best medicine for a heavy heart.—Howard.

LOVE TO CHRIST.—As the needle in the dial, disturbed and shaken from his point, does never leave his quivering motion, till it fix and sleeps upon the Arctic pole; so fares it with the christian in this world.—Nothing can charm or scatter him, but still the last result of all does anchor him in his Savior's arms.—Owen Feltham.

PROFANE LANGUAGE.—Avoid those who are profane and obscene in their language. By long associating with such youth, you will by degrees habituate yourself to their language, and thus be shunned by the virtuous and good. When you hear the name of God irreverently spoken by a companion, set him down as an unsafe friend; and unless he break away from this habit, in future have but little to do with him.

Excellence is providentially placed beyond the reach of indolence, that success may be the reward of industry, and that idleness may be punished with obscurity and disgrace.—Cowper.

CONSTANT TRUST.—David expresses the same courage in all states. See Ps. lvii. 7, and Ps. cviii. 1: O God, my heart is fixed, I will sing and give praise. Faith taught him the same song in the cave and on the throne.

The desire of the conversion of souls, is nothing else but spiritualized humanity.—Howe.

Men never sin with less restraint, than when they are influenced by false principles.

ERROR IN RELIGION.

A variety of influences induce to error in interpreting the scriptures, and forming views of truth. It is an important question whether it is possible to avoid error, or be guiltless in the possession of it. If it is impossible to overcome contrary influences, to direct the imagination, to rule the dispositions and passions, and bring them into obedience to the law of Christ, there can be no accountability or guilt. That it is otherwise is manifest, or the benevolence of God would place men beyond the power of such influences. By adopting a false rule of judging, error may be held for truth. It is possible for different persons to have "a conscience void of offense," and yet be directly opposed to each other in their views of the fundamental doctrines and duties of religion. If conscience possessed the power of leading to the discovery of truth, and were not itself the creature of education, its monitions might be regarded as infallible. It may excuse or accuse, as it has been taught; but its approvals may not be considered as evidence of purity and truth. It must be obvious that, if conscience does not condemn those who deny the fundamental doctrines of the gospel, the honor of God's law and the purity of his throne cannot be maintained in their acquittal.

The Mahometans and Pagans are conscientious in their worship of false divinities; but the scriptures declare that there is no other name under heaven given among men whereby we must be saved but the name of Jesus.

It is also possible for men to be in a fatal error with an approving conscience and a correct external conduct. Fortuitous circumstances may lead to a life above reproach. But the approbations of conscience and of men, are not to be merited without mental activity, patience and caution in investigating truth, a disinterestedness of temper, a devotional spirit, and a disposition to do the will of God. But little confidence may be placed in the possession and exercise of virtuous principles if they are induced by sinister motives, or fortuitous circumstances. In a christian community it is not difficult to find those who possess many ennobling principles, and exhibit many excellent traits of character; yet it may be questioned whether attending circumstances have not contributed in some degree at least to this formation of character. Religion exerts a restraining influence over many who are entire strangers to the life and power of it in the soul. And it is even possible for men to mistake this for the actual possession of purity of heart and motive. The omission of moral duties and a neglect of the requirements of the gospel are often lightly esteemed by those who indulge the hope of salvation. But if the soul does not delight in holy things, but little confidence can be placed in its purity; and if religion is not a delightful theme of contemplation, such pretensions to it are of but little avail.

THE CHRISTIAN TEMPER.

1. It is an equable temper. The ten thousand vexatious cares and perplexities that disturb the repose of the man of this world are as the empty wind to him who has the mind of Christ. The Christian's home is in heaven—his reward is there. He is here a sojourner in a land of strangers and sins, far from his blissful home. What advantage can it be to him of celestial birth, to forget his high destiny, and disturb himself with the corroding vanities and sins of earth? The Savior pursued the even tenor of his way; and when he was reviled, reviled not again. When he came to his own, and his own received him not, he was submissive. Let this mind be in you which was also in Christ Jesus. An Apostle who zealously loved the Savior learned to be content with his situation. Job with holy confidence could exclaim, "The Lord gave, the Lord hath taken away; and blessed be the name of the Lord," and "though he slay me yet will I trust in him."

2. It is a forgiving temper. Stephen exclaimed with his dying breath, "Lay not this sin to their charge." Jesus prayed, "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do." He taught his disciples to forgive those who trespassed against them till seventy times seven. To forgive is more ennobling than to avenge. To forgive is one of the greatest and most benevolent acts of God. If God has forgiven us, we ought also to forgive those who trespass against us. The temper of the gospel forbids redressive action. "Dearly beloved, avenge not yourselves; but rather give place unto wrath: for it is written, vengeance is mine; I will repay, saith the Lord."

3. It is a meek and quiet disposition. It is patient of injuries, capable of receiving wrong without redressing it. It was this which caused primitive christians to take the spoiling of their goods patiently; and to rejoice and be exceeding glad when men reviled and persecuted them and spake all manner of evil of them falsely. The Savior pronounces a blessing on such.—'Blessed are the meek for they shall inherit the earth."

4. It is a peaceful temper. An Apostle exhorts, "Stand, therefore, having your loins girt about with truth; and having on the breast-plate of righteousness, and your feet shod with the preparation of the gospel of peace." It brings peace to all its possessors. It brings peace to all who come under the sphere of its influence.—"Blessed are the peace-makers; for they shall be called the children of God." It uses no unhallowed measures, no sophistry, no evasion. It is open, frank, generous.—It seeks the peace of all, and brings it to thousands that are ready to perish.

REV. ALBERT BARNES, of Philadelphia, has declined the acceptance of the title of D. D., given to him at the late commencement of Union College. This is in accordance with the views he expressed relative to the term Rabbi in his "Notes." We have beheld with regret the eagerness with which some religious men have grasped after honorary titles. It is more in the spirit of pure religion to reject than court such honors. And we very much doubt whether the devoted servant of God will derive any advantage from them.

REV. EDWARD PAYSON, who was one of the most devoted and successful ministers of the gospel, likewise declined the acceptance of such a title as being inconsistent and cumbersome.

SABBATH SCHOOL MONITOR.—We have received the fifth number of the above work. It is neatly printed on half a royal sheet, every other Thursday, at 50 cents per annum in advance. The single object of the paper is the benefit of Sabbath Schools. Mr. Southard, the Editor, is well known as a Sabbath School teacher, and his former efforts for the moral elevation of children, give good evidence that his present efforts will be of great service. The Monitor is a neatly printed sheet and ornamented with valuable engravings. We cheerfully recommend it to Sabbath school teachers and scholars.

The quarterly meeting on the itinerant circuit, will be held with the 2nd church in Verona, commencing on the fifth day evening, before the fifth Sabbath in this month.

TO "SOCRATES."—We are not conscious of having taken sides on the question you mention. As you made no specifications we are at a loss to know to what you referred. Our paper is, and has been, and will be neutral so far as politics are concerned. In fact the views of the proprietors are different on that subject.

CORRESPONDENCE.

For the Register.

All were silent. Solemn prayer, joined with devout thanksgiving, had ascended from the sacred desk. Harmonious voices had re-echoed through the sanctuary the praises of God. The servant of God had opened the sacred volume and begun to unfold the glories of the Gospel, and we truly felt that this was the house of God, and this the gate of Heaven. While all were thus engaged in sacred devotion, our attention was excited by the noise of some one approaching. Presently, an aged man leaning for support upon the arm of his consort, slowly and with hesitating step entered the consecrated house. He gazed not on the silent congregation—he turned not his eye to the sacred desk—but drenched with rain and enfeebled with age, he silently sat himself down and appeared as if absorbed in devotion. The services passed away, and still as if held by some unwonted impulse, he moved not from his seat. As the crowd were eagerly passing by he slowly raised his head, but turned not his eyes, (for they were sealed in darkness,) and with tones that bespoke the emotions of a deeply feeling heart, said:—"Once possessing all the vigor of manhood have I worshiped in your assembly. When this house was dedicated to God, I sat among the worshipers. Together with you, have I taken sweet counsel. We have bowed together around the shrine of our Father, while a holy flame warmed our hearts. Then how beautiful appeared the house of our God. Her pillars were firm as the foundations of the earth, and her glory was like the meridian sun. Years have passed away and I am now permitted to tread again its hallowed floor. But I return not as I went out. The waves of adversity have passed over me, and age has palsied my once active limbs. Shut from the light of nature—despoiled of my hearing and enfeebled by age, I now come to worship with my people in the house of my God. Long have I desired to return and dwell in your midst, and finally lay down my bones in the sepulchre of my fathers. My eyes have wept over the abominations of those around me—my soul has fainted within me because of sin. At night have I laid me down sickened at the perverseness of men. In the morning I rose dreading to see a repetition of former scenes. And I have been ready to cry out, "How long O Lord! shall thy Sabbath be disregarded? How long shall thy altars lie waste? Arise, vindicate thine own truth and advance thy glory in the earth!" We were reminded of the ancient patriarchs who dwelt in the midst of abominations. We thought of a Naomi, returning to Israel that she might enjoy that repose which she could not find in the midst of idolators. "Where," continued he, "are my former compeers? And where are those who were wont to stand as watchmen on the walls of Zion?" Some of them we knew; others had long since passed from their labors to their reward. He spake; but no familiar voice greeted his ears. His sightless balls denied him a view of the countenances around him, amongst which, perchance, he might have traced the features of a former friend. He walked in darkness at noonday, and seemed like one shut from the society of friends and doomed to perpetual solitude, till the day in which the glories of the upper world should burst upon his immortal vision. TWENTY DAYS LATER FROM ENGLAND

ARRIVAL OF THE GREAT WESTERN.

The steam-ship Great Western, Captain Hoskin, arrived yesterday morning from Bristol, whence she sailed on the 25th of July. We have received full files of London, Liverpool and Bristol papers—London and Liverpool to the evening of the 24th, and Bristol to the 26th, all inclusive.

IN PARLIAMENT.

The Canada union bill was passed in committee in the House of Lords, with numerous and considerable alterations. Lord Hardwicke's motion to reject the bill was negatived, 107 to 10. In the course of the debate on this motion, Lord Melbourne referred to a brief drawn up for Lord Hardwicke by "a very lively gentleman"—Sir Francis Head—and remarked that he was not disposed to pay much attention to its contents.

On Monday, July 12, the following message was read by the Lord Chancellor in the House of Lords:

"Victoria Regina.

"The uncertainty of human life, and a deep sense of my duty to my people, render it incumbent upon me to recommend to your consideration the contingencies which may hereafter take place, and to make such provision as shall in any event secure the exercise of the royal authority.

"I shall be prepared to concur with you in such steps as shall appear best calculated to maintain unimpaired the powers and dignity of the crown, and thereby strengthen those securities which protect the rights and liberties of my people."

Lord Melbourne announced that it would be taken into consideration on Tuesday.

The Canada union bill was read a third time and passed.

In the Commons the following conversation took place on

THE BOUNDARY QUESTION.

Sir R. Peel said that the papers connected with this question which had been promised immediately after the Easter recess had never appeared, notwithstanding the positive assurances of their early production. He wished to know when they were to be furnished. He thought it would not be a satisfactory answer to say that fresh papers had been since received, which required farther time for their preparation.

Lord Palmerston said he must take upon himself the responsibility of the delay.—He was anxious to present these papers, together with the report of the commissioners appointed last year. The papers as well as the report were now in print, and he hoped in a very few days to lay them before the house. It would be more satisfactory to the house to have the whole before it, than to see the papers partially.

Sir R. Peel asked whether the report of the commissioners would be produced at length.

Lord Palmerston replied that the house should see the whole of it.

Sir R. Peel inquired whether any fresh commissioners had been sent out since the commissioners had made their report.

Lord Palmerston said there was one part of the boundary which the commissioners had been unable last year to ascertain as minutely and as accurately as they wished at the time, and he had since sent out two other persons to complete the survey. It might be satisfactory that he should state that her Majesty's Government had recently sent to the Government of the United States an answer to the communication which they had received last year, that answer being a draft of a convention for the purpose of appointing a commission with a view to the final settlement of the question.

Sir R. Peel asked whether the draft of the convention was founded on the basis of the communication received from the American Government, and by which they were obliged to abide, or whether it was some new proposition which they were at liberty to accept or reject as they pleased.

Lord Palmerston said it was founded on the basis of the communication last made by the American Government.

The selection of Prince Albert as the Regent, in the event of the Queen's death, appears to give general satisfaction. It is said that a portion of the Cabinet wished the Duke of Sussex to be joined in the regency, but this was opposed by the Queen, and was likewise against precedent. It appears that the duties of Regent will devolve temporarily on Prince Albert, even though the Queen should go safely through her confinement, as she will be unable for a season, to perform any of her royal duties.

The Duke of Wellington had another fit on the 15th of July, after walking some distance under a hot sun. He was about again in a day or two, but these repeated attacks show that his time is drawing near.

THE CHARTISTS.

A grand demonstration by these people was to be held at Birmingham on Monday, July 27, upon the occasion of Lovett and Collins being released from Warwick jail. It was openly avowed that this demonstration was to be preliminary to a renewal of Chartist agitation throughout the kingdom.

AFFAIRS OF THE EAST.

The Morning Post of July 24 parades a long letter "from a distinguished correspondent," affirming that the affairs of the East have undergone a portentous change—that French policy has triumphed in Turkey, but that Lord Palmerston, to counteract it, has signed a compact with Austria, Russia and Prussia, the intent of which is to impose still more onerous conditions on Mehemit Ali, which, if not complied with in a month, are to be enforced vi et armis—that France is no party to this compact, and will therefore make common cause with the Pacha—and thereupon Russia will advance her army to Constantinople, and England will be checkmate at last. All this will pass for what it is worth—probably very little. The only truth we can venture to propound, is, that the Egyptian question seems no nearer a settlement than it was six months ago.

SPAIN.

The civil war at last is ended. Cabrera, Balmaseda, Palacios, and all the other Carlist leaders, have been driven into France, where the first two have been thrown into prison as well as their master, and their infatuated followers will probably be incorporated in the army of Algiers. Meantime a new trouble has sprung up in the shape of a quarrel between Espartero and the Queen Regent, which, for the sake of humanity, it is to be hoped will be adjusted without bringing more wretchedness upon the country.

The following extract from a letter in one of the London papers perhaps truly describes the present state of affairs.

"Two parties are still predominant—the Moderados and the Exaltados. Espartero is at the head of the former, and Francisco de Paulo, brother to Don Carlos, who is now playing the part which Phillippe d'Orleans performed at the revolution, is at the head of the latter. He has on his side all those whose ambition gets the better of them and men who have nothing to lose. He is at work in the dark, and his object is to usurp the Crown. The nobility and those connected with trade, are in general, Christinos; and the people and the clergy are Carlists. Christiana is in the very heart of republicanism, and it is feared that she will one day be the victim of some commotion. It is also generally accredited that Espartero wishes to be named dictator, in order to crush the party which is opposed to him. At any rate, we must expect great events.

SUMMARY.

During the first week in August 27,880 barrels of flour were delivered from the Erie canal at Albany, 5,034 at West Troy, 197 at Schenectady.

The population of Wisconsin is 31,000. Iowa has 50,000 inhabitants.

On the 19th ult., Mr. Solon Nash, formerly of Boston, died at Louisville; on the same day his wife died at Baltimore.

The two horses from the Iman of Muscat to the President of the U. S., were sold at Washington, one for $650, the other for $675.

Brooklyn contains more than 35,000 inhabitants. In 1830 it was 15,000.

The Contractor on the rail road near Pittsfield, Mass., lately discharged his hands in consequence of a difficulty among the Irish, and went to N. Y. to engage others. He arrived in the city just in time to engage a supply of emigrants who had just arrived from Ireland, each having father Matthew's temperance medal hung to the neck, as a sign of total abstinence from intoxicating liquors.

A Roman vase full of Roman coins, has lately been discovered by the monks near the monastery in Chamwood forest.

The Indians in Florida continue to massacre the citizens or soldies that come in their way. The latest news gives accounts of the killing and scalping of some half a dozen or more.

A smart shock of an earthquake was lately felt in Hartford, Conn. It continued from fifteen to twenty minutes accompanied with a low rumbling noise. Several buildings were very much shaken and much alarm manifested.

Troy has 19,373 inhabitants. Increase in ten years, 7,786; in five years, 2,414.

Capt. Broughton of the Royal Engineers, who is appointed by the British Government to survey the Disputed Territory, came passenger in the Britannia. He is accompanied by a son of Mr. Featherstonhaugh who was engaged in the survey last year.

Two thousand six hundred Catholics have signed the total abstinence pledge in Montreal. In Pottsville, Pa., 1,900 have taken the pledge.

Of the 307 towns in Massachusetts, six have a population as large as 10,000, viz: Boston 83,979, Lowell 30,981, Salem 15,162, New Bedford 12,586, Springfield 11,012, Charlestown 10,872.

A gang of seven counterfeiters were detected in New Orleans on the 29th ult., having in their possession $700,000 in counterfeit tens and twenties on the Carrolton Bank.

Dog-icide.—One hundred and seventy four dogs have lately been killed in N. Y. city, by the officers appointed for that purpose.

The seats of 18 U. S. Senators will be vacated on the fourth of March.

In the month of July 62 children were brought to the Upper police office in N. Y. city, and 311 persons were committed to the cells during the same time.

ENGLAND AND CHINA.

We are indebted to a mercantile house in this city for the annexed copy of a letter from the United States minister at London, disclosing in part the intentions of the British Government as to the conduct of the Chinese expedition. A blockade of Canton, it seems, is to be one of the first measures resorted to; and there is great reason to apprehend that the blockade will be of long continuance, for we have not the remotest idea that it alone will have any effect upon the Chinese. If the English admiral confines himself to a blockade, he has got two or three years before him.

London, June 26th, 1840.

Gentlemen—I received last night from Lord Palmerston an answer to my note on the subject of the China trade, the substance of which I hasten to communicate for your information. As I had supposed, the order in council was intended to be confined to the subjects and property of the Chinese. It appears that the admiral commanding the expedition on the China seas has been instructed to confine himself (unless extreme measures should become necessary) to the detention alone of Chinese vessels and property, and is not to seize or detain vessels arriving from Europe and America, although such vessels and their cargoes may be consigned to mercantile establishments within the Chinese dominions. His lordship, however, has deemed it proper to apprise me, for the information of those concerned, that one of the first acts of hostility that may be resorted to by the Admiral, will probably be the establishment of a blockade of the Canton river, and of some other points on the Chinese coast. I am, &c.

The Mormons.—A number of citizens of Quincy, Missouri, publish a statement, in which they accuse the Mormons of a number of depredations, and say that Smith, the "Holy Prophet," in presence of some of the citizens, justified the plunderers in their nefarious proceedings, and would continue them till they had recompensed themselves for their Missouri difficulties to the amount of $3,000,000.

THE TEMPERANCE CAUSE IN GREAT BRITAIN AND IRELAND.

Extract from a letter, dated London, June 30, from the secretary of the New British and Foreign Temperance Society to Edward C. Delavan, chairman of the Ex. Com. of the American Temperance Union.

"You have already heard of the doings of Father Matthew in Ireland, but the reality is said, by eye witnesses, to be beyond any description which has yet been given of them. The change for the better is so extraordinary as to have excited the attention of the whole country, and to have obtained for our principles, the commendation of thousands who are not yet prepared to renounce entirely the intoxicating cup. A thousand beer and spirit sellers, are reported to have abandoned the traffick, in Ireland alone.

"Next Monday, Daniel O'Connell comes out in a great meeting in Exeter hall, as a Temperance Advocate. Our society has engaged him for the occasion, and expect an overflowing house. It is said he signed the total abstinence pledge last Saturday. In Scotland the number of pledged members have doubled within the past year, and the Welsh have also been advancing in the great cause. We think in Great Britian and Ireland, there cannot be less than THREE MILLIONS, TWO HUNDRED THOUSAND abstinees from all that can intoxicate. Our society is now supporting nine agents, and we hope before long, that every town and village will have a society. The only government measure which has taken place in our favor since you were here, is the closing all beer and spirit shops on the Sabbath, until one o'clock. This has produced a change for the better, and we must be thankful for it. Our last annual meeting was a splendid affair; the delegate meeting passed off well, but the procession on Whitsunday, astonished even the tee-totallers themselves."

It consisted of 20,000 members of the society, marching in an orderly manner, through various parts of the city, surrounded by hundreds of thousands of lookers on.

A New Locomotive Saw Mill.—Col. James Hamilton, one of the Vice Presidents of the American Institute, a mechanic of great ingenuity and of a most praiseworthy industry has just completed and patented a new saw mill.

Its chief recommendation is great simplicity and cheapness of construction. It is believed that the cost of making one of the largest class will not exceed two hundred dollars. With trifling expense it can be removed and re-established in any spot where the ground is tolerably even. In short, it can be taken into the midst of a forest and set at work with a few hours preparation. Again, it can be used with any kind of power; but what constitutes another and one of its best recommendations is that it can be successfully used by manual labor.

It will prove invaluable in the construction of rail-roads. It can be moved to keep pace with the daily wants of the road, sawing any kind of lumber wanted in the making of it; and is of so simple a construction is necessary to enable common laborers to work it. Another striking feature of its usefulness is that the logs to be sawed are not elevated much above the level of the ground; and that the saw passes thro' the log, instead of the log passing through the saw. This is a very great important improvement. It saves all that vast labor of hoisting up heavy logs, and adjusting them to their proper place; which by the usual mode is slow and expensive, and it also saves one half of the usual space, required in the common way to cut up a log in.

There are many districts of our wide spread country where the face of it is flat, and where timber abounds of the very best quality, but where it is almost valueless, because of the great distance to saw mills. This invention will enable the owners of such lands, to transport the boards and plank to the nearest point of navigation, and by it can successfully compete with other manufacturers of lumber.

It is called an "Improvement in Pitsawing and Slitting Machine for Sawing logs into lumber and boards."—N. Y. Eve. Star.

CARD.

This morning, at half past 11 o'clock, an explosion took place on board the steamboat Erie, which caused the death of two persons, and injured four others, two of whom will not probably survive long. The accident was caused by the bursting of the steam chimney, which forced the steam down through the flues, under the boilers, and into the fireman's hold, where the following persons were engaged in their capacity as fireman, &c.

Wm. Dely, fireman scalded.

Charles Hamberlin fireman scalded—not dangerous.

Edward Irwin deck hand, scalded—since dead.

Timothy Buckley, deck hand, scalded—since dead.

Andrew Money, Fort Gratiot, working his passage—badley scalded—since dead.

James Corey, Buffalo, deck passenger—badley scalded—yet living.

All the persons who were scalded, were in the fireman's hold, none others having been injured by the explosion.

We mention with regret, the death of Mr. Raymond Bebee, of Sandwich, U. C., who was sitting on the other deck at the time, but from fear, or some other cause, jumped from the stern of the boat, into the river, but before the boat could be lowered, which was done with all possible despatch, and rowed to the place where himself and Hamblin, who had also jumped into the river, were, he sank.

Hamblin was picked up and taken to a house on shore.

To Drs. T. Reynolds, Jos. Miller, Robt. Ironsides, of Malden, we tender our thanks for the medical assistance rendered by them to the unfortunate men who needed and received their aid.

To Capt Walker, of the Great Western, and Capt. Hazard, of the Milwaukie, great credit is due for towing the Erie to Detroit.

We as passengers of the Erie, have no hesitation in saying, that no blame whatever, is attached to the Engineer, or other officers of the boat.

The Engineer was at his post, and there was but 19 or twenty inches of steam on at the time of the explosion, although she carries frequently from 24 to 28 inches.

Deep Soundings.—Capt. James Ross, R. N. found bottom, 3d of March last, in lat 33 21 South lon. 94 East, at the depth of 2677 fathoms. He had over 5000 fathoms of line on the reel, and the weight employed was 540 lbs. Capt. Ross says,—"Nothing could be more satisfactory than this sounding, and it is the more so from showing that we have the means of getting soundings however deep the sea may be, and I trust our next trial will be in deeper water. I have ordered the line to be completed again to 5000 fathoms; but it would be useless to attempt it any more on this side of the cape.' The mean velocity of the weight in descending 2677 fathoms, was at the rate of three miles and one fifth per hour. The first fifty fathoms descended at the rate of 71 miles per hour, and the last 100 at 24. On a previous occasion Captain Ross found bottom at the depth of about 3700 fathoms, or about four miles!—Olive Branch.

Indian Marriage.—Four Penobscot Indians, three females and one male, walked up to the police bench about 1 o'clock, yesterday, and addressing Justice Merritt, said, "we want to be married." Justice Merritt declined "taking the responsibility" of performing the ceremony. He therefore "put them off,"—advised them to wait the arrival of Justice Stevens. When Justice Stevens arrived and heard the nature of the request "he also declined officiating in this affair. The Indians were determined, however, to carry their point. Judge Lynch was applied to, but he could not leave the Court of Sessions. In the mean time, until some one could be found to officiate, the Indians were shown into the star Chamber, where they quietly awaited the result of a fourth application, to Ald. Smith, who was also presiding in the Court of General Sessions. At 6 o'clock the Court adjourned, and the Aldermen sent for the Indians into the grand jury room, where the ceremony of mariage was duly performed. The bride, whose name is Susan Moon, was a fine looking girl, 21 years of age—the bridegroom whose name is Peter Peer, was a blank looking tall boy, aged 19.—Times.

Muscat.—Export from New York.—The Arabian ship Sultanee, belonging to the Iman of Muscat, and the first of his Majesty's vessels which has visited our waters, cleared on the 7th inst. for Zanzibar and Muscat, with the following cargo,— Beads, 9 cases, 8 barrels; muskets, 300; guns, 7 cases;—scarlet cloth, 24 pieces; refined sugar, 58 boxes; prints, 2 bundles; paper, 20 reams; glassware, 3 cases; pongees, 1 bundle; powder, 300 kegs; plates and dishes, 1 case; lookingglasses, 7 do.; vases, 2 do.. china, 3 boxes; shells music boxes, 11; sheetings, 127 bales; chandeliers, &c. 20 cases; crockery, 43 packages; soap, 59 boxes; sperm candles, 33 do.—Also, the splendid pleasure barge, presented with other articles to the Iman of Muscat, by the United States' Government.

Insanity.—In the French Academy of Sciences a learned physician, Dr. Boismont has recently read the results of his long and extensive study of the influence of civilization in the production or developement of insanity. It appears that the wits are disordered or lost in a far greater number of cases in the progressive countries, such as England, France, and our America, than in the stationary, such as South America, China, Persia, Turkey, and wherever "the tradition of the past serves as the inflexible rule of the present." Alienation of mind is said to be more frequently caused by moral than physical agency, and the proportion of the crazy is according to the activity and advances of civilized society rather than the amount of population.

These views which are said to be supported by their learned author with great ability, are in direct opposition to those of the celebrated Dr. Woodward, as expressed in his report. The latter gentleman, who is at the head of the first Lunatic Asylum in this country, contends that insanity is caused entirely by derangement of the physical system. "Who shall decide when doctors disagree?"

The Execution of Sir Walter Raliegh.—Sir Walter Raleigh made no more of death, says the Dean of Westminster, than if he were going merely to take a journey; 'not,' said Raleigh, 'but that I am a great sinner, for I have been a soldier, a seaman, and a courtier.' On the morning previous to his execution, they brought him a cup of sacks, being asked how he relished it, he replied, 'As the fellow that drinking of St. Gile's bowl, as he went to Tyburn, said, 'that was good drink, if a man might tarry by it.''—He invited his friend, Sir Hugh Beeston, to see him die. Sir Hugh was unable to obtain a seat, and Sir Walter, observing him in the crowd, lamenting his disappointment, said, "Farewell! I know not what shift you will make, but I am sure to have a place.' On the scaffold he embraced all the lords with 'such courtly compliments, as if he had met them at a feast.' On taking off his gown he called to the headsman to let him see the axe, which not being immediately done, he said, 'I prithee let me see it; dost thou think I am afraid of it?' He passed his fingers lightly over its edge, and smilingly remarked to the sheriff—'This is a sharp medicine, but a sound cure for all diseases,' and kissing it laid it down. When he had laid his head on the block, the executioner desired him to turn it towards the east. 'It was no great matter,' replied Raleigh, 'which way a man's head stood, so the heart lay right.' He ordered the headsman not to strike until he gave the signal. Having lain some moments in prayer, he made the signal, which the headsman not perceiving, Sir Walter exclaimed—'Why dost thou not strike? Strike man!' Two blows severed his head.

Accident at Niagara Falls.—The Buffalo Commercial advertiser of Monday, says—"A British police officer fell yesterday from the cliff near the Clifton House, at the Falls, eighty feet into the gulf and struck on some projecting rocks. He arose and crawled up to within ten feet of the precipice, when he fainted and fell again a less distance. His skull was badly fractured, and also his ribs and one shoulder.

He is not expected to recover.

A young lady, named Hawkins or Ellis, died on Sunday, the 14th inst. at Persia, N. Y. through the instrumentality of poison. A man by the name of Slocum has been arrested on suspicion of administering to her the poison in some candy. It is reported that a short time since she commenced a suit against him for a breach of promise of marriage.

At the recent anniversary meeting of the British and Foreign Bible Society, the report stated that in the last year no less than 27,670 marriages had taken place in England and Wales, and of the parties 8,733 men could not read, and 13,624 women were equally ignorant.

There are no less than 1500 visitors at Saratoga Springs.

Trade with Mexico—We learn from the St. Louis Republican, that a wagon from Chilhuahua, by way of Sante Fe, arrived in that city, bringing $50,000 in bullion, belonging to Messrs. Cordero and Olivarez, in Chilhuahua, and $30,000 in specie, belonging to Mr. John Kelly, of the same place. The wagon left Chilhuahua about the 15th of March, in company with about forty others. This company, with one which arrived in May, have brought about $200,000 in specie and bullion.

Furs and Skins from the West.—The Antelope arrived here yesterday from Fort Union, on the Yellow Stone River, five miles above the mouth, with a full cargo of beaver skins, buffalo tongues and robes.—This boat left the St. Louis wharf on the 31st of March last, and of course has been absent nearly four months. The cargo belongs to the American Fur Company of this city, and is probably worth $100,000.—The officers bring nothing of the news kind with them. The boat experienced considerable detention on her trip, both going and returning, on account of low water.—St. Louis Republican, July 29.

Pompeii.—About thirty streets of Pompeii are now restored to light; it is a third part of the town. The walls which formed its ancient enclosure, have been recognized; a magnificent ampitheatre, a forum, the Temple of Isis, that of Venus, and a number of other buildings have been cleared.—English paper.

Schuylkill Coal Trade.—The shipments of coal from the Schuylkill region to August 10, 1839, in round numbers, is 230,000 tons. The amount transported on the Mount Carbon road this season is 38,866 tons; West Branch, 80,513; Mill Creek 29,838; Schuylkill Valley 25,717; Delaware and Hudson 65,910; Little Schuylkill 5136.

POETRY.

THE CHRISTIAN TRAVELER.

BY FREDERICK S. ECKARD.

Traveler, faint not on the road,
Droop not in the parching sun,
Onward, onward, with thy load,
'Till the night be won;
Swerve not, though thy bleeding feet
Fain the narrow path would leave—
From the burthen and the heat
Thou shalt rest at eve.

'Midst a world that round thee fades,
Brightning stars and twilight life,
When a sacred calm pervades
All that now is strife;
Rich the joy to be reveal'd
In that hour from labor free,
Bright the splendor that shall yield
Happiness to thee!

Master of a holy charm!
Yet be patient in thy way,
Use the spell and check the harm
That would lead astray;
From the petty cares that teem,
Turn thee, with prophetic eye,
To the glory of that dream
Which shall never die.

By the mystery of thy trust!
By the grandeur of that hour!
When mortality and dust
Clothed eternal power!
By the purple robe of shame,
The mockery and the insulting rod,
By the anguish that o'ercame
The incarnate God!

Faint not! fail not! be thou strong;
Cast away distrust and fear,
Though the weary day seem long,
Yet the night is near;
Friends and kindred wait beyond,
They who pass'd the trial pure—
Traveler, by that holy bond
Shrink not to endure!

MISCELLANEOUS.

A TRAGICAL TALE OF THE SEA.

The following dreadful tragedy is related in the "Seamen's Magazine and Church of England Guardian," a new publication recently received from London, and which appears to be conducted with ability and discretion, having for its principal object the advancement of the 'Sailor's Home.' The editor says, it is an authentic narrative as he received it from one of the parties referred to, although it was not thought best to give names or places.

I commanded the ——, we sailed from ——, intending to call at ——, in order to take in passengers and then proceed to ——. We arrived at ——, as designed, and I went ashore to make arrangements with the parties that desired to go with me to ——. A gentleman and his lady, and another gentleman, in an exceedingly weak state, slowly recovering from a malignant fever, composed the party; and being informed that the former had boxes of dollars, and plate to the amount of —— thousand pounds which were to be taken on board, I made every necessary arrangement and returned to my ship.

I had on board a mate and —— men; and deeming it expedient, I called my mate privately into my cabin, and informed him of the large quantity of money and plate about to be committed to our charge, with the passengers; and, to avoid even the possibility of danger from the crew, I desired him to use any means he thought best to induce them to remain ashore that night, in order that we might convey the property on board and stow it safely away, without their knowing any thing of the circumstance. He immediately assented, and accordingly, got rid of the men. I reposed entire confidence in him, and he appeared to deserve it; the men, however, were kept ashore all night, while we, with perfect secrecy and safety, as we thought, had the property conveyed to the ship, and securely stowed away. In the morning the men came on board, and every thing being taken in, we got under way with a fair wind in the evening.

The first night, and the succeeding day and night passed without any remarkable occurrence, and the wind continuing fair, we were at the close of the second day, two hundred miles from land. My crew were most of them Irishmen, not such men certainly, as I should have chosen, but I was obliged to take them as I found them. Indeed one of the Irishmen, to whom I shall again refer more particularly, was not a seaman.

Every thing had proceeded in an even and regular course until the close of the third evening, if I except an undue familiarity between the mate and the crew; which although I observed, I had not even mentioned. On this evening, however I was oppressed with a kind of uneasiness I cannot describe, but fearing it might be a prelude to sickness, I left the mate in charge, and retired to my berth much earlier than usual. I tried to sleep, but in vain. I rose, took some grog, and lay down again. I tried to compose myself, but found it impossible. I several times dozed a little, but almost instantly started under gloomy impressions, or from frightful dreams. As this was quite unusual with me, having scarcely known a solitary instance of my rest being disturbed, I spent my hours under great despondency, and anxiously wished for the dawn of day. I continued thus until nearly two o'clock; even my dozing might have been interrupted by the slightest movement, so far was I from enjoying any thing like repose.

About two I heard a footstep cautiously approaching. I listened—a man came close to my berth, and muttered, 'Captain!' I called out 'Who's there?' No answer being returned, I jumped out, and was instantly accosted by the Irishman above referred to, in the most abrupt and callous manner, with 'By J——s, it's all over with you,—the mate has told the crew about the money,—they have taken the ship, and your throat will be cut at three o'clock.' I was momentarily deprived of the power of utterance, and before I recovered from the shock, the fellow was gone. I, however, soon became collected and slipping on my trowsers and waistcoat, I immediately stepped into the gentleman's cabin to whom this treasure belonged. But he having overheard the dismal announcement, had most imprudently communicated it to his wife, who instantly swooned. She, when I entered, was perfectly insensible, and he, with clasped hands, exclaimed in deep despair, 'O my wife! O my children! I shall never see you more!' Finding he knew the worst, I coolly said, 'Well sir, will you arm with me, and resist?' He said he could not, it was useless. I said, 'Remember, sir, the property is yours;—that your wife and children are at stake; you ought, therefore, to be ready to resist to the very last extremity;—I too have a wife and children, and will, therefore, resist to the last for them, for my employers, and for you.' Finding, however, that he was literally sunk in despair, I returned to my cabin.

Any attempt to describe the state of my mind, would be entirely useless. I think I stood for a few moments utterly at a loss what step to take, when somehow my hand got into my waistcoat pocket, and enclosed my knife. Without premeditation or design I opened it. I now recollected the sick gentleman, but I tho't it best to let him remain in ignorance. I knew not what to do; however, not knowing what might befall me, or what course I should take, I rushed towards the deck, but my hand accidentally striking against something which I found to be an American axe, I seized it, and the next moment was on deck, where I saw the helm deserted, and the mate with the whole crew sitting together drinking in the forepart of the ship. With the open knife in my left hand, and the uplifted axe in my right, I sprang in among them; and as my eye met the mate's, with one blow of the axe, I clave his head assunder. The men simultaneously rose, and fled in different directions; I followed the nearest instantly, and, just as he was in the act of going aloft, I buried the axe in his loins, and he fell overboard. One now turned and tried to grapple with me; but I in a moment, drove the axe into his breast, and he fell at my feet. So deeply had the axe sunk into his body, that I was in imminent danger of being overpowered; but, placing my foot on his chest, I by one vigorous effort succeeded in extricating it. I now looked round, and observing no one near me, I went aft; but seeing here some one standing, I had again lifted my axe, when a voice exclaiming, 'For God's sake, captain,' convinced me it was the sick gentleman. I could only say, 'Go in sir.' Roused by my striking my hand against the axe, and unhanging it, he had come out and having witnessed my actions, without knowing any thing of the cause, he concluded me laboring under a direful paroxysm of madness, and instantly obeyed, thankful that he had not shared the fate of those who had fallen before his eyes.

I found the men had all fled to the rigging, and were still aloft. The moon shone brightly, and I called to the nearest man to come down, but he would neither answer nor move. I went into my cabin, fetched out my fowling piece, and insisted on his coming down, or I would fire at him. At length he came down and fell on his knees at my feet. I asked what he had to say of their blood-thirsty villainy: he replied, the mate had drawn them into it and he was obliged to agree. 'Strip!' said I—he did so. I then put my gun and axe behind me; and, cutting eighteen inches of rope, I gave him a severe flogging; to this I subjected every one of them, and they submitted without the least resistance; the passengers during the whole period, almost petrified, looked on.

It now occurred to me, that there was no one at the helm: I therefore took my gun and axe, and as there was no alternative, I was compelled to occupy that post at once.—The passengers all come to me, but I could only beg them to leave me. They still halted, however, while I called the men before me, and told them I had now done with them; their conduct would determine my future steps: at the same time concluded by saying, I would still kill the first man that manifested a mutinous disposition, or that dared to cross a given line on the deck before me without my express command.—I then ordered them to throw the two bodies overboard, and return to their respective duties.

Beginning now to reflect on what I had done; remembering that my life, my ship, my passengers, their property, and the cargo were at least so far preserved: remembering at the same time, that I had accomplished it only by the sacrifice of three men,—that their blood had been shed by me,—and, seeing it upon me when morning dawned, my feelings overcame me, and I burst into tears.

The danger was still by no means over. I had —— day's sail to —— no mate, two men less than before, and every reason to belive, that the crew would still watch for, and seize any opportunity to murder me now, if for no other purpose than that of securing their own lives. I therefore made up my mind to keep my post at the helm, day and night, that I might have all my enemies before me:—but how I should keep my post, do without sleep, or venture to sleep at it, even for a moment, were questions on which I feared to dwell.

Whatever my fears and feelings were, I still manifested the same determined and fearless line of conduct by which I had hitherto succeeded. I kept my axe close to my side, in full view of the crew. The gentleman who owned the property, but who, in anticipation of the dismal event, gave himself up to despair, certainly did now offer any assistance in his power; but I had too much at stake to venture for a moment to trust him.

From the Irishman, I obtained a full detail of the plot,—the manner in which they intended to murder me and the passengers,—and their intention of carrying the vessel to ——. This man I also generally employed near me: the passengers to, used him, as far as they deemed prudent; though all were sensible that no confidence ought to be placed in him. Thirteen days, at length, elapsed during which we had contrary weather,—and having fallen in with no vessel,—and as to myself, although I was still uninjured, and aware of no attempt against me by the men, my strength and spirits were nearly exhausted.

It will not be supposed by any, that I mean to assert I never did sleep during this period: still I can assert that I am scarcely conscious of ever having, during the whole period, fairly fallen asleep, especially by night; and, indeed, it is, in my estimation, no easy thing for a man to sleep, with a crew before him,—every man of which he knows would seize that opportunity to murder him.

On the morning of the fourteenth day, however, I certainly started from something like sound sleep, in consequence of an idea of a glare or excess of light; and I am unable to express my utter astonishment, and the overwhelming emotions of gratitude that instantly filled my heart, at beholding the sun shining most brilliantly, and in full view the flag flying on the battery of ——. I immediately ordered guns to be fired; and, in a short time, a boat, with a pilot, came along side. We lay to, while they returned with my command for soldiers to take my crew into custody. I need not add that they were all condemned to die, excepting the Irishman before alluded to, whose sentence was commuted to perpetual banishment. I begged their lives might be spared, and used all my influence to save them, but in vain.—Before their execution, I saw them all, and they were informed, in my presence, of the means I had used to save them, and of their also proving unavailing. They appeared so far satisfied that I had not acted from mere vindictive feeling;—confessed their guilt, but attributed their unitimely end, and indeed the origin of the whole, to the mate alone.

The conduct of this brave Scot, in his singularly critical situation has been, and will be, variously judged of; though all attempts to ruin him, by false and absurd insinuations, so completely failed, that all the quarters and parties capable of forming a a just opinion of the whole case, justified his conduct by the strongest expressions of unqualified approbation and the most liberal rewards. While the man (we state the fact and leave it) who sunk under the mere apprehension in the awful moments of the impending danger, had afterwards so great a dread of public opinion—so keen a sense of shame—so little regard for the dictates of religion, for himself, and for his wife and children, as almost immediately to blow out his own brains.

In the present complicated, difficult, and checkered constitution of things, how valuable is the "pure and undefiled religion" of Christ! Had these men been under its influence, the captain would never have had occasion for such an exhibition of his bravery; nor the remaining part of the crew been suspended from a gibbet for a species of crime, which is, perpaps of all others, attended with the fewest softening circumstances.

CAUSES OF SUICIDE.—The following table is curious from the comparison it offers between the number of self-murderers in the two sexes, and the cause which stimulate each; the male and the female being only equal in the cases of self-love and misanthropy. It is also useful as showing that in England by far the greater number of suicides—more than two-thirds of the whole causes are mentioned—have arisen from the pressure of real and tangible evil. The following suicides were committed in London, between the years 1770 and 1830:

FOR THE FARMER.

From the New England Farmer.

HARVESTING OF CORN.

The season for harvesting our corn crops will soon be upon us. The extremely hot weather which we have had for a fortnight past, prior to the late storm, has placed much of the crop out of the reach of frost; and the yield almost universally promises to be abundant. This may be pronounced the great crop of New England. If we have corn enough, we shall have beef, pork, poultry enough. We do not believe there is any grain which, considered in all its aspects and uses, is so valuable.

There are several modes of managing the crop, the fodder and the grain; but they are not equally eligible.

The first is to top the stalk after the ear has become perfectly formed and slightly glazed. There is great danger of performing this operation too early. When done before the corn is generally hardened, the exact experiments of William Clark, Esq., of Northampton, of John Lorain, of Pennsylvania, and others, have demonstrated that the loss upon the crop may amount to a quarter or a fifth of what the crop would otherwise be. The topping of what the stalks is, we believe, an unnecessary, useless, and often a pernicious labor, and therefore not to be advised.

The second method is to leave the crop untouched until it is perfectly ripened, and then to cut it up at the bottom and carry it into the barn and husk it. Some gather it in the field and then cut the fodder. In either case, the corn by being thus left, is always exposed to suffer from frost before it is perfectly ripened; and the fodder, it is believed, loses much of its succulence and nutriment.

The third process is, after the ear is glazed and the corn has passed beyond the boiling or roasting state, to cut it up at the bottom, and let it dry in the shock. In this way it is early taken out of the way of the frost; the corn if properly managed ripens, and weighs more by the bushel than if perfectly dried as by the second method described, and the corn fodder is dried with all its juices retained in it, and has a richness and freshness which render it particularly palatable to cattle and as nutricious for beef or milk stock as any dry feed which can be given to them. This operation should be executed with care. Let a hill occasionally be left standing for the support of the shock against the wind.—Bring as many armfuls of corn cut up as are sufficient to make a good sized shock around the hill—set the bottoms well out and tie them all at the top with a wisp of straw, turning the heads down. But do not first, as is often practised, tie the corn in small bundles. In this way the corn and fodder will cure perfectly. When it is time to carry it in, slip a knife under and cut the standing hill; pitch the whole shock on to the cart; and being loose and easily handled by bringing the top of the shock into your lap, it will be easily husked. A great deal of trouble will be saved in this way. Do not, as is often done, carry out your corn and make your shocks upon the grass land, as in this case the air will not circulate freely under the shock, and therefore neither the corn nor the fodder will dry perfectly. The most intelligent farmers in the State estimate generally the value of the corn fodder to an acre, well cured and saved, as equivalent for the feeding of any stock, to a ton of English hay. Not a few rate it even higher than this.

THE CASKET,
AND PHILADELPHIA MONTHLY MAGAZINE.

THE great increase of the subscription list of the Casket, which has been nearly doubled since the commencement of the last volume, warrants the most extensive improvements on the first of July 1840, at which time a new volume will be commenced with increased vigour. Nothing need be said of the firm basis on which the Casket stands, it being already the oldest magazine in the country, and has maintained its popularity, in the face of all opposition. It is to be found upon the centre tables of families making literary pretensions from Maine to Georgia.

TYPE—EMBELLISHMENTS.

The Casket is printed with a clear and beautiful type, upon the finest white paper. The illustrations are not surpassed by those of any periodical at home or abroad; and beside the monthly steel engravings, a quarterly plate of colored Fashions has lately been added. The style of these embellishments is unequaled, and they are always accompanied by an appropriate sketch. No wood cuts disgrace the work. Whatever appears in the Casket is of the first order of art.

The volume will be with the first of a series of splendid mezzotint engravings, prepared expressly for the work, by the burin of Sartain, who deservedly stands as the best engraver of the kind in the United States.

LITERARY CHARACTER.

The literary character of the Casket is well known. It is wholly original, of the highest order, and sustained by writers of the first fame. Essays, Tales Sketches and Travels, compose its prominent prose articles; while the poetry is equalled by that of no other magazine of like character. The variety for which the Casket is celebrated, shall suffer no diminution; but on the contrary every exertion shall be made to increase its interest.

Several Romances of the Revolution have already appeared, and others shall follow in the course of the volume, presenting [illegible] of the manners, and a history [illegible] battles of that time. Thus, the Casket [illegible] of being filled with [illegible] true delineation of human nature [illegible] of passion.

Study rooms (of which there are a large number, are furnished with chairs, tables, bedsteads, and stoves; and rented to gentlemen at one shilling per week; or one shilling for each student, the rooms being large enough to accommodate two. Good board is afforded at one dollar and twenty five cents per week, including washing or lodging. One shilling extra, is charged to those who require both.

The institution is furnished with a good Philosophical and chemical apparatus. It is also furnished with a valuable Library. A scientific society connected with the Institute, is furnished with a choice collection of Minerals and Curiosities.

About twenty-one thousand dollars has already been expended on the De Ruyter Institute for the purpose of facilitating the student in his pursuit of scientific knowledge.

It is the object of those to whom the management of the Institute is entrusted, to make the expenses of acquiring a knowledge of the sciences, as light as possible.

And the public may be assured that a strict attention will be paid to the moral cultivation of the student; and the trustees and teachers will spare no reasonable pains to render the time spent at the De Ruyter Institute, as agreeable and profitable to the student as circumstances will admit.

Young gentlemen and ladies wishing to engage in the pursuit of science, are respectfully invited to spend a term or two, at the De Ruyter Institute and satisfy themselves in regard to its merit.

The year is divided into three terms, of fourteen weeks each. The first term commenced on the twelth day of September; The second term on the second day of January; and the third term on the eighth day of May.

THE INSENSIBILITY OF MAN TO REAL EXCELLENCE.

The insensibility of man to real excellence has furnished a theme for complaint to the poet and philosopher. A beneficent Creator has placed man in a world of natural beauty and excellence. As his eye wanders over the works of creation, he beholds a variety of the most beautiful and variegated scenes. Mystery after mystery is presented to his mind. Even the little blade of grass and modest flower which he carelessly treads under his feet, when minutely examined, furnishes a field of wonders. All is adapted to his wants, and calculated to delight the eye, and excite the admiration of the human mind. But so astonishing is the insensibility of man to beauty, that he can gaze upon the most charming objects with feelings of indifference. He wanders out in the stillness of night—he looks upward and beholds the vast firmament glittering with myriads of bright, bright worlds, moving in the most perfect harmony and order; and he has been known to view this grand machinery of the universe and not be affected with emotions of sublimity, and to deny the existence of a God! When we candidly examine this subject, if we are amazed at the insensibility of man to the charms and grandeur of natural beauty and excellence, how much to be deplored is his aversion to moral excellence! Much time and labor has been expended by the good and wise of every age to promote the best interest of mankind, and to instil into their minds virtuous principles. Whenever they have formed societies in order to accomplish their laudable designs, they have encountered a host of opposition. They have been branded with every odious epithet which malice could invent, and followed with the acclamations of folly and enthusiasm; but their zeal has remained undiminished. The midnight hour has witnessed their devotion to the cause which they have espoused. They have exhausted all their powers of eloquence to excite a love of moral precepts upon persons who have appeared as insensible as the walls with which they were surrounded. If under the most overwhelming truths they have appeared moved for a moment; how often has the impression proved to be as transient as a dream that flits across the mind during the slumbers of midnight.

The insensibility of man to excellence is manifested by his eagerness to possess wealth, and to esteem it as the chief good. He sacrifices his health, and every principle of humanity to obtain this darling object. He looks with contempt upon those who have not been so fortunate as himself in accumulating worldly goods, although they may possess a highly cultivated mind, and those virtues which will outlive the fading honors which riches confer upon its possessor. But he lightly prizes real worth and is dazzled by a glittering toy.—Another bends all the energies of his mind to the acquirement of earthly fame. He spends sleepless nights in devising means that will advance his popularity. He toils, he struggles to win the prize. In the ardor of the race he forgets to perform those duties which he owes to God and his fellow-men. He hushes the whisperings of conscience, and dreams only to deck his brow with the laurel wreath. When he thinks he has nearly attained to that summit of distinction toward which his wishes has aspired, he is arrested by the summons of death. Ah! who can tell the anguish which rends the heart of the dying man, when he takes a retrospective view of a misspent life! His former follies are like thorns in his dying pillow. The illusion vanishes, and he feels that he has neglected real excellence, and been lured to destruction by a syren.

The insensibilty of man to excellence is displayed by an excessive fondness for dress and vain amusements, and neglecting the more solid endowments of the mind.—How often do we see persons array themselves in sumptuous apparel, when their minds do not possess one brilliant gem!—The same truth is illustrated in the kind of books which are prefered. With what avidity are long tales of fiction devoured, while important truths are disregarded?—How many will shed tears over unreal woe, while actual suffering is passed by unnoticed? Owing to this disposition in man to choose vice and neglect virtue, philanthropists have found it extremely difficult to prosecute plans with the design of benefitting mankind. They have written and said much upon this subject. They have endeavored to present to the minds of men, virtue in all its attractive forms, and vice in its most hideous mien; but strange as it may seem, there is a natural propensity in man to choose vice. When we refer to the histories of men in past ages, we find this truth amply demonstrated. Who among the enlightened Romans and Grecians were crowned with immortal honors? Were they not those who had been most successful in shedding human blood? those who for the sake of gratifying their pride and ambition, devasted countries, and utterly destroyed the happiness of nations? These were the men whose deeds were sang in melodious strains by the bards of their age, and whose names were enrolled on the records of fame. These were the men to whom their countrymen decreed triumphs and reared monuments. These were held up as patterns of excellence. Yet when we examine their lives they exhibit only black catalogues of the most atrocious crimes, utterly repugnant to every sentiment of virtue. Thus, while vice in all its deformities was lauded, real worth was treated with neglect. Was it not a disrelish for moral excellence which caused the death of Socrates? Was not the jealousy of those wicked tyrants inflamed who reigned in his day because he instructed the Athenian youth in moral precepts, and induced them to place in his hand the fatal cup of poison?

But we need not refer to ancient times to establish this truth. It needs not a very discriminating mind to discern that human nature is not changed. Even in this enlightened age of the world, and in this our own beloved country, facts pass before our minds almost daily that prove this truth beyond a doubt. Look at the sable sons of Africa. See them toiling beneath the scorching sun not to accumulate treasures for themselves, and to provide for their helpless babes and the partners of their bosoms whom they tenderly love; but to fill the coffers of another with the shining metal. View them in their degradation and misery, bereft of happiness and hope. Perhaps you will see one who possesses a noble mind, one whose feelings are sensibly alive to all that is grand and beautiful in nature. He in his imagination pictures to himself some happier clime, out of the reach of the lash of the proud lordling who exercises dominion over him. And it may be that his untold misery has reached to heaven, and that Being who watches over the destinies of men has heard the groanings of the captive, and enlightened his untutored mind by the influences of his Spirit, and condescends to hold communion with him. But the haughty master, who claims him as his property, treats him with disdain, and if he discovers that he is endowed with a more than ordinary intellect, he binds his chains closer upon him and shuts up every avenue through which he might receive instruction. He despises this immortal mind, this gem of inestimable value which may shine with undimmed lustre forever in the paradise of God, because it is enshrined in a form of coarser clay than his own. And after we all have slept the sleep of death, and master and slave are called to render their account to God at the last day, will he not remember that he in his lifetime was "clothed in purple and fine linen, and fared sumptuously every day," and that he treated with scorn real excellence, and wasted his precious moments in grasping after fleeting shades? SECURITY OF FALSE HOPE.

A false hope may be the more easily kept in security in consequence of all hopeful converts whether true or false, being at first so much alike in appearance.

Our Savior has given us a plain rule by which we may distinguish true and false professors from each other. 'By their fruits ye shall know them.' His words imply, not only that this is a good criterion, but, perhaps, that this is the only safe one for men to trust. There must, then, be time after conversion for the proper fruits to appear in those who are really changed, before we can with confidence distinguish them from those who are not. In the parable of the wheat and tares, Christ has given an illustration of the truth we are now considering. The wheat and tares springing up together he refers to as an illustration of the mixture of true and false converts in a work of grace. Mark then, what follows. "When the blade was sprung up, and brought forth fruit, then appeared the tares also." This seems to imply that the tares might not be readily distinguished from the wheat until the fruit appeared in the latter. And the literal fact is said to be that the blades of these two plants are so much alike in appearance that it is nearly impossible to distinguish them, until, in the phrase of the husbandman, the wheat begins to "ear out."

Flavel, who is high authority on subjects of this nature, remarks upon this parable as follows, "How difficult soever it be to discern the difference between wheat and tares, yet doubtless the eye of sense can much easier discriminate them, than the most quick and piercing eye of man can discern the difference between special and common grace. For all saving graces in the saints, have their counterfeits in hypocrites; there are similar works in those, which a spiritual and very judicious eye may easily mistake for the saving and genuine effects of a sanctifying spirit."

President Edwards, also, has furnished a striking illustration of this sad truth. "It is with professors of religion," he observes, "especially such as become so in a time of outpouring of the Spirit of God, as it it is with blossoms in the spring; there are vast numbers of them upon the trees, which all look fair and promising, but yet many of them never come to any thing. And many of those that in a little time wither up and drop off, yet for a while look as beautiful and as gay as others—so that we cannot certainly distinguish those blossoms which have in them that secret virtue which will afterwards appear in the fruit, and that inward solidity and strength which will enable them to bear. It is the mature fruit that comes afterwards, and not the beautiful colors and smell of the blossoms, that we must judge by."

Our remark then is, that as all supposed converts appear so much alike at first, for a considerable time—an opportunity is offered from this circumstance for many to fix themselves in their delusion. Those who are cherishing such a delusion, are inclined in examining their evidence, if they attempt to do this at all, to compare themselves with those around them, rather than with the perfect standard of God's word. If the eye of a third person, which is more impartial, cannot for a time detect the deficiency, most certainly they will not be likely to do it for themselves. It will not indeed be a very long time before the distinctive fruits of those who are truly regenerated will begin to appear. But in the mean time the hypocrite may have settled it in his mind that he is as good as others; and will have become blind or inattentive to the difference which may afterwards arise between his life and theirs. Or if he should be obliged to observe and acknowledge their superior attainments, still he will parr the force of the self-conviction which he ought to feel, by looking back to a time when, as he imagines, he gave as good evidence as they. His own hope is perhaps secretly strengthened rather than otherwise, by seeing them prove well; inasmuch as he takes it for granted that his own beginning was as fair as theirs. Their life which proves their beginning to be good, he considers as going far to prove the same for his.

But it must also be remarked, that the self-deceived are assisted in fortifying and maintaining their hope, by a too great similarity in outward appearance between themselves and others, not only at first, but through life. All professors of religion are too much like the mere formalist in appearance, because, in the first place, all are really very imperfect. The best Christians fall immeasurably below the divine standard. In all things they come short of duty, and in many they act part of disobedience. Indeed there is scarcely a Christian, however devout, and exemplary, who has not, as a man, his characteristic failings. On these more especially, the hypocrite will fix his criticisms in making up a judgment favorable to himself. Or if he does not deliberately do this, the prevalent measure of piety is so low in all ordinary states of the church, that he may imitate the external deportment of Christ's true followers with sufficient exactness, to render the apparent difference between his example and theirs so inconsiderable as not to be palpable to the powers of his obtuse moral vision.

Again, the body of Christians are too much like the hypocrite externally, because the most satisfactory proofs of their conformity to God are not as obvious as they might be to the notice of the world. This consequence follows partly from the very nature of piety; as piety finds its element to a great extent in secret communion of the soul with God. It has distinctive features and operations and fruits which the world knows nothing of. Yet we say that the Christian is too much like the mere formalist in this respect; because, generally, he keeps his spiritual thoughts and feelings too much to himself. The fear of man bringeth a snare in this matter. It induces him to refrain too frequently when before the world, from giving utterance to the pious desires and emotions of his soul. There exists generally an unjustifiable reserve on the part of professors of religion, even in their intercourse with each other. Consequently the hypocrite, when comparing himself with his professing brethren, has not a fair opportunity to discern the real disparity which exists; and so with the less suspicion he continues to slumber over the signs of deficiency in himself. Could he be the constant companion of some of his brethren; could he witness to the manner in which their private hours are occupied, and to what passes in the sanctuary of their own bosoms, he could no longer imagine himself a Christian.

But we must go farther and say that the security of false hope is generally maintained through inattention to instruction and neglect of self-examination. There are some false professors, unquestionably, who make a righteousness of attending meetings and of religious reading, and of examining their hearts in a certain way. But they generally fall into the neglect of these duties in a very great degree. They forsake the assembling of themselves together.—Their attendance at the house of God, is irregular; or they fail to give a wakeful and prayerful attention when there. They neglect the private study of God's word; they employ no time or next to none, in the careful perusal of books of human composition which closely scan the subject of experimental religion. It is remarkable how few approved works of this description are to be found on the shelves of professing Christians. And where they are found, there is too much reason to believe that they are little read. Every Christian should make himself familiar with the writings of Flavel, and Baxter, and Edwards, and Scott. Yet how little do false professors, probably relish these excellent authors. They prefer spending their evening and perhaps their sabbaths over a newspaper, or in idle conversation, or even in a listless attendance at religious meetings, to the serious reading of such works as the Treatise on religious affections, the Touch-stone of Sincerity, the Rise and Progress of Religion in the Soul, the Pilgrims Progress, &c.—How can it be expected that a false professor, who passes his life as many do, without either asking instruction or exercising reflection, should be any thing else but an incorrigible self-deceiver?

THE MECHANISM OF MAN.

"I am fearfully and wonderfully made."—Ps. 139:14.

Fond atheist! could a giddy dance
  Of atoms blindly hurled,
Produce so regular, so fair,
  So harmonized a world?

Why do not Lybia's driving sands,
  The sport of every storm,
A palace here, the child of chance,
  Or there a temple form?

Presumptuous wretch! thyself survey;
  That lesser fabric scan;
Tell me, whence the immortal dust,
  The god, the reptile, man?

Where wast thou, when the embryo earth
  From chaos burst its way,
When stars exulting sang the morn,
  And hailed the new-born day?

What fingers brace the tender nerves,
  The twisting fibers spin?
Who clothes in flesh the hardening bone,
  And weaves the silken skin?

How come the brain and beating heart,
  Life's more immediate throne,
(Where fatal every touch,) to dwell
  Immailed in solid bone?

Who taught the wandering tides of blood
  To leave the vital urn,
Visit each limb in purple streams,
  And faithfully return?

How know the nerves to hear the will,
  The happy limbs to wield?
The tounge ten thousand tastes discern,
  Ten thousand accents yield?

How know the lungs to heave and pant?
  Or how the fringed lid
To guard the fearful eye, or brush
  The sullied ball unbid?

The delicate, the winding ear,
  To image every sound!
The eye to catch the pleasing view,
  And tell the senses round!

Who bids the babe, new launched in life,
  The milky draught arrest,
And with its eager fingers press
  The nectar-streaming breast?

Who with a love too big for words
  The mother's bosom warms,
Along the rugged paths of life
  To bear it in her arms?

A God! A God! creation shouts,
  A God each insect cries;
He moulded in His palm the earth,
  And hung it in the skies.

THE DUTY OF PRAYER.

What man is he that can help offering up his morning sacrifice of devotion, when, awaking from sweet sleep refreshed and renewed, he beholds all things as it were, new created? The sun arises and finds the cattle on a thousand hills waiting for his appearance, and all the birds of the air ready to pay their tribute of thanksgiving for the return of his glorious and enlivening beams. And shall man—man, for whose use and benefit all these things were made, —shall man alone lie buried in sleep, or, when arisen forget to worship his God? Shall he not rouse all his affections at once, with these and the like strains of the sweet singer of Israel: "Awake up, my glory; awake, lute and harp," every organ of my body and faculy of my soul; "I myself will awake right early. O God, thou art my God; early will I seek thee. I will sing of thy power, O Lord, and praise thy mercy betimes in the morning. I will magnify thee, O God, my King, and praise thy name for ever and ever. Every day will I give thanks unto thee, and praise thy name for ever and ever." Now is the [illegible] in the preceding passage refers to the moral law, is evident from the subsequent verses, and indeed from almost the whole of the discourse that follows, in which the full sense, extensive application, and solemn sanctions of its several provisions, are most clearly and forcibly stated. The same infallible Teacher, after citing the first and great commandment in the law, declares the second to be like unto it—Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself.—Whatever difference, therefore, though no contradiction, there may be between Christ and Moses in other great respects, they both hold the same doctrine on this point.—Burnside.

THE BIBLE.

It is a book of laws to show the right and wrong.

It is a book of Wisdom, that condemns all folly and makes the foolish wise.

It is a book of Truth, that detects all errors.

It is a book of Life, that shows the way from everlasting death.

It is the most compendious book in all the world.

It is the most authentic and entertaining History that ever was published.

It contains the most ancient antiquities, remarkable events, and wonderful occurrences.

It points out the most heroic deeds and unparalled wars.

It describes the Celestial, Terrestrial and lower worlds.

It explains the origin of the Angelic Myriads, of human tribes, and devilish legions.

4. Do you make it a matter of conscience, except when providentially prevented, faithfully to attend the public worship of God on the Sabbath, and also, the stated meetings of the church for social prayer and instruction?

5. Do you daily pray for your minister and the appointed officers of the church, and that God will bless his truth to the sanctification and to the conviction and conversion of all who hear it? And are you daily doing what you can to bring the unconverted to the cross of Christ?

6. Do you sincerely desire and pray for the salvation of the young, and to this end are you doing all that you can in Sabbath schools, in Bible classes, and by Christian influence?

7. Do you sacredly cherish the spirit of Christian love and fellowship toward all the disciples of Christ, and especially do you so far as possible, visit and keep yourself acquainted with the members of your own church?

8. Do you cultivate the spirit of Christian charity and tenderness towards the imperfections and failings of every member of the church—being as tender of their reputation as of your own, keeping your tongue from speaking and your heart from thinking evil of such; and if from any one you have cause for offense, do you at once follow the gospel rule, to go and tell it to himself alone?

9. Do you ever make it a solemn matter of conscience, never to visit, or to allow your children to visit any place of public amusement or social pleasure, or to engage in any plan or business, on which you cannot in all sincerity, ask God's blessing?

10. Do you daily, and habitually remember that by solemn covenant, you have given yourself and all that you have and are to God, and that you have solemnly vowed to keep yourself unspotted from the world, making Christ your example, and the upbuilding of his kingdom your supreme object? And in the spirit of this engagement are you yourself daily growing in grace, and by your property, your influence, your prayers, and your active efforts, are you doing all that you can for the interests of the church, for the souls of those around you, and for the salvation of a world lying in wickedness?

Do you systematically, and to the extent of your ability, give to those associations which labor to extend the kingdom of Christ? and do you regularly read missionary publications.

Do you habitually live in a state of preparation for death—keeping your house and heart in order, so that whenever your last hour shall come, it may find you with your earthly work done, and your spirit fully prepared for heaven?

RELIGIOUS EMOTION.

It is not an uncommon mistake among Christians, when duty is before them, to wait for a particular emotion or feeling before they engage in the exercises of religion. This is not only unphilosophical, but hinders the usefulness of Christians, and is a manifold injury to the cause of God. Reader, if you read in God's word that it is your duty as a Christian to be baptized, and you wait for irrepressible emotion to impel you to do that duty, and say (as many do) "I want to feel different before I am baptized," you are injuring your own soul. How do you feel now?—Why, you feel conscious you have not obeyed the command, "be baptized;" and therefore you want to feel "different." The feeling you desire is a consciousness that you have obeyed Jesus Christ, and the peace and joy that flow as the legitimate result of entire obedience. Do you want to feel this?—can you expect to feel this before you obey? It is like this; you want the Holy Spirit to bear witness with your spirit, that you have obeyed, and are a willing and obedient follower! Strange delusion. Thousands are waiting with this and other duties before them, till they feel better. Under these impressions, one comes to the place appointed for prayer meeting. He knows in the days of the apostles, that at certain times "many were gathered together praying." He feels conscious, if he does not engage in praying, that he shall not do his duty. But he begins to wait until he "feels," and the meeting is chilled by his disobedience, and God's holy cause dishonored. Perhaps the reader can testify experimentally to the truth of this remark. Perhaps you have waited in this way till you could feel. Feel how? That you have been laboring with your brethren in solemn prayer? That you have been praying in faith and are confident God will hear and answer to the joy of your soul and the peace of Zion? And still you have not prayed at all! Want to feel that peace that flows from God, and always follows obedience, prior to obedience!

But for a Christian to wait for right feeling without previous right action, is altogether inconsistent and capricious. Some object to this idea, and lay God's word aside as a rule of action, and drift before states of feeling, or follow some feeling which is purely chimerical. But let it be remembered, that the bible is the just rule of action, and the Holy Spirit will never lead a soul to act in contradiction to his word. While the bible says, "Pray always" if you suffer God's spirit to lead you, you will feel that it is your duty to pray always.

But another objection is, "You would not have us be baptized, pray, and so on, unless we feel it to be our duty." Is there not authority enough in the commands of Christ to make you feel that these duties you ought to perform? God's word teaches you your duty, and in the performance of that duty you feel the evidence that you are the friend of Christ, because he says, "Ye are my friends, if ye do whatsoever I have commanded you," and then the holy comforter happyfies your soul while obeying the truth. God's spirit will never make you feel happy in acts of disobedience. But you want feeling. Very well. You want right feeling. Do you expect to obtain right feeling by acting wrong? There are present circumstances surrounding you that should make you feel. The bleeding cause of Christ—the honor of God—the danger of sinners. These should produce "immediate emotions." Look at your past life, stained by disobedience—sinners, perhaps in hell that you should have warned. This should produce "retrospective emotions." Cast your eyes forward to the seats of glory—hear the songs—catch but one note of the rapturous anthems of paradise, and this I think cannot fail to produce "prospective emotions." O how can a Christian help feeling just as he ought to feel.

THE DIFFERENCE BETWEEN SPECULATIVE AND PRACTICAL CHRISTIANITY.

Locke tells us of a blind man who thought that scarlet was like the sound of a bell. The man was probably not a fool, notwithstanding his strange comparison. He might have had as powerful and intellect as Daniel Webster. The deficiency was not in the mind, but in the eye. And the difficulty would have been the same, if the man had possessed the power of vision, but had always refused to use it. The strength of mind of an archangel would not have enabled him to give a correct judgment concerning an object of sight in such a case.

The anecdote of Locke illustrates very clearly the incompetency of the unregenerate to give intelligent judgments respecting religious truth. They are not entitled to have their opinions received with deference, because they have never opened their eyes to the truth. They have the power of vision indeed, but "their eyes have closed, lest they should see with their eyes, and understand with their hearts." Whatever strength of mind they may have, they have no right to say a word in disparagement of evangelical religion, for they can know nothing about it.

These remarks are suggested by a good sermon we recently heard on John 1:46:—And Nathaniel said unto him, can there any good thing come out of Nazareth?—Philip saith unto him, come and see." It was the preacher's object to show that unconverted persons cannot know what religion is. One striking inference deduced from this proposition, was, that the sneers of the opposers of religion are not to be regarded, any more than the taunts of a poor blind man, who should ridicule seeing persons for their views of the objects of sight.

We know that unconverted persons may talk learnedly, and with great discrimination about religion. But this fact is not at all inconsistent with the position taken by the preacher. Blind men may talk very learnedly respecting the laws of optics.—All the principles of optics are as intelligible to them as to the seeing. Saunderson, the blind mathematician, professor in the University of Cambridge, Eng. was extremely popular as a lecturer on this science. The speculative principles of optics and vision, are so different from each other, that one who knew nothing of the latter, could discourse eloquently of the former. In like manner, unconverted persons may talk of the speculative principles of religion while religion itself is as unknown to them as vision to the blind.

It behooves professors of religion to inquire whether they do really see the heavenly beauty and glory of the objects of spiritual contemplation, or whether they merely comprehend intellectually the forms and outlines of religion, while the substance is as much concealed from their view, as the objects of sight from the blind man.—Prof. Long. of W. R. College.

ENCOURAGEMENT TO WEAK CHRISTIANS.

The pious Richard Baxter thus encouraged his own heart to trust in God and rejoice in Jesus Christ:

"And now, O weak and faithless soul! why shouldst thou draw back, as if the matter was doubtful? Is not thy foundation firm? Is not thy way of life, through the valley of death, made safe by him that conquered death? Art thou not yet delivered from the bondage of thy fears? Hast thou not long ago found in thee the emotions and operations of his Spirit? And is he not still residing in thee, as the agent and witness of Christ? If not, whence are thy groanings after thy God, thy desires to be nearer to his glory, to know him or to love him more? Whence came all the pleasure thou hast had in his sacred truth, and ways and service? Who subdued for thee thy folly, pride, and vain desires? Who made it thy choice to sit at the feet of Jesus, and hear his word, as the better part, and count the honors and preferments of the world but dung and dross! Who breathed in all those requests thou hast sent up to God?—Overvalue not corrupt nature, it brings forth no such fruits as these. Remember what thou wast in the hour of temptation, how small a matter has drawn thee to sin. Forget not the days of thy youthful vanity.—Overlook not the case of thy sinful neighbors, who, in the midst of light, still live in darkness and hear not the loudest calls of God. It is no work of Christ's Spirit, that has made thee to differ. Thou hast nothing to boast of, and much to humble and also to be thankful for. Thy holy desires are, alas! too weak; but they are holy. Thy love has been too cold; but it is the most holy God whom thou hast loved. Thy hopes have been too low; but thou hast hoped in God, and for his heavenly glory. Thy prayers have been too dull and interrupted; but thou hast prayed for holiness and heaven. Thy labors have been too slothful; but thou hast labored for God and Christ, and the good of mankind. Though thy motion was too weak and slow; it has been God-ward, and therefore it is from God. O bless the Lord, not only for giving thee his word, and sealing it with uncontroled miracles, but also for frequently and remarkably fulfilling his promises, in the answer to thy prayers, and in great deliverance of thyself and of many others; and that he has by regeneration been preparing thee for the light of glory! And wilt thou yet doubt and fear, against all this evidence, experience and foretaste?"

PRESIDENT EDWARDS' RESOLUTIONS.

Resolved, that I will live as I shall wish I had done, when I come to die.

Resolved, to live so at all times, as I think best in my most devout frames, and when I have the clearest notions of the things of the gospel and another world.

Resolved, to maintain the strictest temperance in eating and drinking.

Resolved, never to do any thing, which if I should see in another I should count a just occasion to despise him for, or to think any way the more meanly of him.

Resolved, to obtain as much happiness to myself in the other world as I possibly can, with all the power, might, vigor, vehemence, yea violence, I am capable of, or can bring myself to, any way that can be thought of.

Resolved, to strive to my utmost every week to be brought higher in religion, and to a higher exercise of grace, than I was the week before.

TRUE AND FALSE PIETY.

But few can be found in a Christian community that do not pay a sacred regard to religion, or make some pretension to piety. The heart, unrestrained by religion, naturally inclines to sin; and men left to follow the inclinations of the carnal heart, advance quickly to the greatest degrees of sin.

A variety of influences, however, some of which are almost continually operating, cause certain pious emotions in almost every heart. The mortality of friends and acquaintance—indications of one's own approaching dissolution—the word and spirit of God—and christian influences—each produce serious reflections, and excite certain pious emotions. Other causes likewise produce similar effects. The effect and duration of these impressions are, perhaps, the most correct means of ascertaining the actual state of the heart in the sight of God; and of distinguishing between true and false piety.

On this question it is possible for men to deceive both themselves and others, and rest in a fatal error relative to their acceptance with God. Sometimes their pious emotions are fluctuating. They are excited by various causes, and last only while the cause that excited them exists. They sometimes call forth resolutions of reformation; at others, produce a momentary change; and in other cases exert a lasting influence over the life and conduct. The great advantage to be obtained by the possession of true piety, and the loss sustained by its absence, are of too much consequence to allow the least indifference.—The happiness or misery of the soul in the eternal world is pendant on this.

Professions of piety, that are accompanied with obedience to the divine law, hatred to sin, and an undeviating discharge of the duties of religion, are such as will secure the favor of God and the salvation of the soul. Such a person can say with the Psalmist, "How love I thy law! It is my meditation all the day." He is filled with holy contemplation, and finds unalloyed pleasures in studying the character of God.

Occasional professions and exhibitions of piety, may come from a heart that is right in the sight of God; as also be the result of external circumstances, and arise from sinister motives. Of two persons making such professions, one may be accepted of God, and the other rejected.—One acts under the impulse of the fear of eternal punishment; the other because of his love of holiness and virtue, and his hatred of sin on account of its intrinsic odiousness. Their declensions to sin arise from different causes. One turns to it because it is agreeable to his inclinations. The other falls into it through inattention to the unholy influences that surround him. While one delights in sin and "rolls it as a sweet morsel under his tongue," the other abhors it as the enemy of God, and his own soul, and cries out "O wretched man that I am! who shall deliver me from the body of this death." The one loves God and religion because of their intrinsic excellence; the other (if at all) because of the reward to be obtained. One performs the duties of religion because of his love for them; the other, from the hope of the advantage that may be secured thereby.—As to the real character of such, it is not difficult to form a correct opinion. The scriptures speak of certain who forsook all and followed Christ, and of others who followed him for the sake of the 'loaves and fishes.'

Professions of piety in a time of uncommon excitement, can not always be regarded as evidence of a renovation of heart.—It may then be impossible to distinguish between true and false piety. Time only can accurately determine this. The true and false may seem alike sincere and zealous, and exhibit equal evidences of piety, while the heart of the one and the passions of the other only are affected. The days of declension will distinguish between the friends and enemies of God.

Professions of piety that are made from motives of personal interest, involve the soul in greater guilt; yet the sequel of some men's conduct shows that such professions are sometimes made. By such, the external duties of religion are attended to just enough to attract the notice of men, while the heart is filled with all uncleanness and sin. Such professions are transitory. They may for a while cast a mantle of sanctity around the person, and greatly advance his unholy purposes, but will eventually work his destruction.

It becomes those who think they stand to take heed lest they fall—to examine well the hope within them, and not let the judgment first discover to them, that their piety was affected, and not acceptable in the sight of God.

PROFANITY.

It would seem incredible, did we not know the fact existed, that any one should make use of profane language. So small an inducement can scarcely, if ever, prompt to the commission of any other act, as is held out for this. The judgment of God is denounced against all profanity. It is also one of the lowest, most unmanly and unnatural vices into which it is possible to fall. It betrays a deficiency in moral sensibilities—a littleness of soul—a lack of intelligence—a recklessness of decency and good manners, and a destitution of virtuous and ennobling sentiments. An oath never adds grace or dignity to manners—strength or force to conversation—manliness or praise to him who utters it.—It is always offensive to chaste sensibilities—degrading to him who uses it—and is a crime of such magnitude as eventually to bring upon the soul the everlasting curse of an insulted God.

We are informed by Br. Edwin Stillman that the revival in Genesee still continues. Since the Association, brother S has baptized seven persons—all of them were girls from the age of 9 to 14. Nothing can be more pleasing than to see the youth thus early embracing Christ.

WHO IS WISE?

I asked the statesman, Who is wise?—He replied, the man who best understands the fundamental principles of civil government.

The man of the sword responded, he is wise who can vanquish an army more powerful than his own.

The miser thought that every one knew, that the wise man was he who gets much and spends nothing.

The man of letters informed me, that he was wise who felt himself perfectly at home in the whole circle of the arts and sciences.

The phyician said, he is wise who is successful in removing the diseases of the human system.

I heard these and a variety of other replies, and being dissatisfied with all, I sought the Bible, and with augmented earnestness I repeated my inquiry, Who is wise? and I met this satisfactory answer—"He that winneth souls is wise."

STILL LATER FROM EUROPE

ARRIVAL OF THE ACADIA.

At an early hour this morning, through the kindness of Mr. Harnden, of the package express, we were put in possession of Liverpool papers of the 4th, and London of the evening of the 3d inst. which were received at Boston by the new steam packet Acadia.

This vessel has made a most splendid run across the Atlantic, as will be seen by the following paragraph, from the Boston Transcript.

The British and North American royal mail steamship Acadia, Captain Robert Miller, arrived at this port this morning at 9 o'clock, from Liverpool, which port she left on the 4th instant. She came up in fine style, being saluted from the Cunard wharf, the revenue cutter, &c., and was cheered from the wharves as she passed, an immense consourse of citizens crowding every point where a view of her could be obtained; passing up by the navy yard, thence down to her dock at the Cunard wharf. A salute of 100 guns was fired from Lewis's wharf, at 12 M.

Motwithstanding the Acadia was detained off Halifax eleven hours, in a fog, her passage is the shortest ever before made across the Atlantic. She arrived in the lower bay at 5 this morning.

The Acadia has sixty-three passengers from Liverpool, and thirteen from Halifax. She made the passage from the latter port in 34 hours.

In addition to our own files by this vessel, we have received late London and Liverpool papers, for which we are indebted to our correspondents, Messrs. Topliff of Boston, and Mr. Keefler of Halifax.

THE BOUNDARY.

The report of Col. Mudge and Mr. Featherstonhaugh had been communicated to Parliament, forming a volume of 88 folio pages. It had not yet been published, but the times of July 3] has a long and bombastic article about it, from which we learn that it "goes the whole figure" in supporting the pretensions of Great Britain, and even sets up a claim to portions of what has heretofore been recognized, without dispute, as a part of the state of Maine. We ought to be thankful, no doubt, that the whole of New England is not set down as British ground by the modest commissioners, Messrs. Mudge & Featherstonhaugh.

The following paragraphs are given as the conclusion of the report.

"We report, that we have found a line of highlands agreeing with the language of the second article of the treaty of 1783, extending from the northwesternmost head of the Connecticut river to the sources of the Chaudiere, and passing thence in a north easterly direction, south of the Roostuc, to the Bay of Chaleurs.

"We farther report, that there does not exist in the disputed territory any other line of highlands which is in accordance with the second article of the treaty of 1783, and that the line which is claimed on the part of the United States as the line of highlands of the treaty of 1783 does not pass nearer than from forty to fifty miles of the northwesternmost head of the Connecticut River, and therefore has no pretension to be put forward as the line intended by the treaty of 1783."

The Times gives the subjoined as the substance of the result arrived at by the commissioners.

They have satisfactorily ascertained by a strict investigation of the face of the country, by an industrious perusal and comparison of charters, treaties, transfers of territory, and other historical records, the absolute and indisputable conformity between the intent and spirit of the treaty of 1783 and the demarkations of territory originally contended for by Great Britain; that no portion of the "disputed" districts ever could, under the authority of the treaty, with any color of justice have been claimed by the United States; that the award of the King of Holland, which [illegible] the republic [illegible] territory," was [illegible] ous data, and on some [illegible] of facts which have been subsequently [illegible]; that the award of that Sovereign [illegible] ed by the parties, could [illegible] executed under [illegible] structure of the country [illegible] to physical and irremovable obstacles; that so far from the smallest fraction of the disputed territory falling within the line of the United States, a rigorous construction of some authoritative documents would actually prove a just title on the part of England to a portion of what has hitherto been regarded as part of the state of Maine itself, and that, in fine, the conclusions upon which certain official agents of the republic have rested the American case, instead of being the legitimate results of practical investigation, are unsubstantial inventions brought forward in the absence of all real investigation, conveying erroneous ideas of the nature of the country, and calculated to mislead not only their own authorities, but public opinion in the United States and in Europe, as to the merits of the question."

The interesting case of Heaviside vs Lardner was tried at Lewis, on the 1st of August, and resulted in a verdict of £8000 for the plaintiff. It seems pretty clear that Lardner's object was more mercenary than amatory, Mrs. Heaviside being entitled by marriage settlements to £[illegible] on the death of her husband, and to £[illegible] on the death of her parents. She and her husband are cousins.

FRANCE

A great commotion was raised at Paris by the convention signed at London, by the representatives of Russia, Prussia, Austria and England, and the envoy of the Porte, of which we had accounts by the last arrival: it was to the following effect:—

"The Sultan is to offer Mehemet Ali the hereditary succession of Egypt, and the life use of the pachalic of St. Jean d'Acre.

"If the Pacha does not accept the offer in ten days, the Sultan will then offer Egypt alone.

"If the Pacha still holds out, the four powers engage to force Mehemet Ali to return to his duty."

The Paris journals rave against England, for the course she has taken on the Eastern question, and especially on account of the convention signed by Russia, Prussia and Austria, to the exclusion of France. The French Government, too, is said to be very much incensed, and if we may believe the letters and papers, the good understanding between the two kingdoms is seriously endangered.

The Paris journals talked of nothing less than putting the army and navy at once upon the war establishment, and sending a force adequate to all emergencies into the Levant.

The French government had so far given way to the popular excitement on the Eastern question as to issue two royal decrees, dated the 29th of July—the first calling into active service, from the 5th, all the young conscripts of the second portion of the contingent of 1836, and all that are still disposable of the contingent of 1839; the second authorises the Minister of Marine to open extraordinary credits for increasing, by 10,000 men the effectual force of the navy, besides five ships of the line, thirteen frigates, and nine steamers. Admiral Roussin is also preparing an extensive promotion, in order to fill up the staff of the fleet so that, in every public department, as much energy is now displayed by the French Government, as if a war, on the most extensive scale, had actually been declared.

Notwithstanding these belligerent demonstrations the better opinion, both in England and France, was that peace would not be interrupted; and in this opinion we entirely concur. The tone of the latest French journals was considerably moderated.

Vigorous measures are adopted in Georgia to supply destitute families with the Bible. Query—Are all irrespective of color supplied?

Charters have been obtained for a rail road from Boston to St. Louis, a distance of more than 1200 miles. More than half of this will be completed next year.

An American Railway.—The Baltimore and Ohio railway will be 350 miles in length, extending from the tide waters of the Atlantic to the Ohio river.

Church Organs.—An English paper says that so general is the use of organs becoming in the parish churches of that country, that there are at the present moment not fewer than six hundred being built at the various organ builders in London.

Costly Gem.—In the jewelry establishment of Starr & Mortimer, Broadway, N. York, there is a single unset diamond, valued at $21,000!

A lad was arrested in Philadelphia on Thursday, for stealing a newspaper, and held to bail in the sum of $200.

17,592 emigrants arrived at the port of Quebec from the United Kingdom, up to the 18th ult.

Congress appropriated $4,250 for the Naval Asylum at Philadelphia, and $340,000 to complete the steamships now building.

Bringing him to Terms.—The New Haven Palladium has the following:—"An anecdote is told of a President of a Bank, in Rhode Island, who refused to give Mr Stillman the full price for a lock which he had made and put on his vault. Mr. S. accordingly locked it and gave the keys to the President, who endeavored, but without success, to unlock it. He then asked Mr. S. to open it, which he refused to do till the balance of the price was paid, as he had fulfilled his part of the agreement, having made and fitted the lock. It had the desired effect, and the mechanical enigma was solved to the no little merriment of the bystanders and the worthy President."

A Curious Fact.—According to the late report of the Warden of the State Prison, in Connecticut, the whole number of prisoners is 169. Of these 108 had been intemperate—and 78 had been rum-sellers.

One Hundred and Thirty-Pounder.—The experimental proofs of another large cannon, (130 pounder) made by Cyrus Alger & Co., commenced yesterday at South Boston Point, under the direction of Col. George Bomford, Chief of the Ordnance Department. This gun is considerably larger than the one experimented upon some months since. We hope we may be able to give further particulars, but those who are desirous to witness the operations of so potent and terrible a piece of ordnance, will have an opportunity by jumping into one of the South Boston omnibuses, as we learn the experiments will be repeated for several days.—Bost. Merc. Journal.

Indian Education.—At the recent opening of the Patsala, or Vernacular Seminary at Calcutta, not less than 450 scholars presented themselves to enter it, not gratuitously, but upon the payment of an annual fee. Three hundred more have applied for admission, but could not be received. The edifice is a noble one, constructed by native generosity, for the purpose of diffusing the knowledge and science of Europe over the country, through the medium of their own language.—Boston Recorder.

An Antediluvian Child.—A fossil child, between five and six months old, has been found in a quarry near Brussels. The bones were converted into silex, which struck fire with steel. The head, shoulders, throat, and belly, were perfect, and the neck exhibited evident traces of muscles. A fossil cocoa nut, quite perfect, was found by the side of the child.—Leeds Intel.

Coal in Michigan.—The Detroit Free Press states that a very extensive bed of bitumous coal of superior quality, has just been opened on the bank of the Shiawassee river, near the village of Corunna, Shiawasse county. A large quantity has already been taken from the bed.

Fruits of Fulton's Genius.—M. Salvany, in his report to the French Chambers on steam navigation, says that Great Britain possesses 740 steamboats of various powers, of a force in all of 64,700 horses, in addition to 70 steamers belonging to the Royal Navy.

A Second Daniel Lambert.—Richard Marco, laborer, of Dunkerton, near Bath, has a boy only twelve months old, of the following dimensions: Two feet nine inches in height; two feet one inch round the breast; two feet four inches round the stomach; one foot three inches round the thigh; twenty inches round the calf; head proportionately large, and rather well formed. The child walked by itself at six months old. Many persons have of late been to see the boy.—English Paper.

Carrier Pigeons.—Capt. Jones, of the ship Flavius of New York, who arrived at Newcastle, E. June 6th, from Antwerp, reported that on the 2d, at noon, in lat. 52 10 N. long. 3 25 E. a pigeon alighted on board, which was found to be a bearer of despatches from Paris, dated May 31, and also news from Spain; being a distance of 250 miles. The pigeon was probably exhausted during its flight, as it allowed itself to be easily caught on board the Flavias.

Right at last.—The official report of the opinion of the President in relation to the sentence of Commodore Elliot, shows that he remitted only half the forfeiture of pay decreed by the Court Martial. During the first two years only of his suspension he receives his usual emoluments.

Matrimonial Alliance by Steam.—On the last upward trip of the Cleaveland, a party of ladies and gentlemen came on board at the Nanitou island, with a view to take a trip as far as Chicago. Finding a clergyman passenger, a couple on board signified their desire to be united in the holy bands of matrimony, and the ceremony was accordingly performed in presence of all on board. The Rev. Mr. Allanson of Racine, W. T., officiated. The names of the nuptialized were Mr. Seymour S. Davis and Harriet L. Jackson.—Buff. Jour.

N. P. Trist, late U. S. Consul at Havana, has been acquitted by a Committee of the House of Representatives of the charges preferred against him of official mal-conduct. He was charged with favoring the slave trade, and oppressing the officers of American vessels.—Union Herald.

Steam Engine.—Mr. Norris yesterday exhibited at the Exchange his beautiful miniature locomotive, made as a present to the Emperor of Russia. It is one of the most beautiful and perfect specimens of machinery we ever saw, splendidly finished in all its parts. It weighs but sixty-six pounds, and has drawn four hundred and fifty six on a circular railway of seven and a half feet diameter. This gentleman has given to American engines immense reputation abroad.—Philadelphia American.

Post Office, Batavia, Aug. 12.

Mail Robbery.—This morning about 3 o'clock, the great mail from the West was robbed at the village of Le Roy, at the stage house, while the driver was changing coach and horses. He had thrown off the mail bags near the door, and while he was absent, one of the bags was taken off, (two being left.) The bag taken was the one put up at Buffalo for New York. It was found about half a mile from where it was taken, cut open, but containing probably all the newspapers and a few letters.—Some 40 rods distant, another parcel of letters was found, and in another place in the vicinity, another parcel. Some remained unopened, but the principal part were torn open and mutilated.—

Among the letters found was one from Geo. Smith & Co. Chicago, to Strachan & Scott, Wall street, New York, purporting to enclose a protested draft for $515 and $200 in U. S. Bank bills. We found the draft, but the money was gone.

Another letter was from G. W. Turner, cashier of the Branch Bank of Illinois at Galena, to F. W. Edmonds, cashier, New York, enclosing a post office draft for $468, 90, and a draft on the Merchants' Bank, Boston, for $1300. The post office draft was found, the bank draft not found.

Another letter from Geo. Smith & Co., Chicago, to Strachan & Scott, N. Y., containing two drafts $604,75, both found.—The robber has not yet been discovered.—A reward is offered.

Le Roy, Aug. 12, 1840.

I have succeeded in recovering a portion of the mail, very badly torn to pieces. I shall not be able to send it on before tomorrow. I have not yet been able to determine that anything of value has been obtained by the robber, except $200 in United States Bank Bills, a draft of $1300, and $600 to 760, both which last will probably be of no use.—Jour. of Com.

[The Robber was traced to this city, where he was taken, and the $1300 draft and other money was found on him. He was taken to Genesee county, for trial.]—(Utica) Bap. Reg.

The North Eastern Boundary.—The Woodstock Times expresses deep indignation at the purpose of the marshal of Maine, Colonel Parks, to make an enumeration of the people of Madawaska for the United States census. It is stated on the authority of a letter dated the 5th inst. that the marshal had arrived at the foot of Fish River, accompanied by Mr. Haines, editor of the Bangor Democrat, and had actually commenced operations on that morning. The Times thinks that the representatives of the British government will not tamely look on, and "suffer such an audacious violation of existing arrangements to pass without being noticed, in a manner becoming the usual promptitude of Sir John Hervey; nor yet to suffer those participating in such a flagrant violation of the laws of nations to escape with impunity." We do not see any occasion for so much excitement, as if the mere enumeration of the inhabitants were an exercise of jurisdiction. It is an act which does not disturb the occupations of the inhabitants of the disputed territory, nor does it add any strength to our claim. The same paper gives the following information of the movements of the engineers from England, who came out in the Brittannia for the purpose of completing the survey which was left unfinished last season.

"Captain Broughton, R. E., Mr. Featherstonhaugh, Jun., and Mr. Wightman, with a surveying party, arrived here last evening, from head quarters. After remaining a short time they proceeded en route to the disputed territory. We understand they will commence operations in the neighborhood of Grand Falls, thence they will proceed to Lake Metis, and thence to Quebec they will proceed to the S. W. and will in all probability fall in with the American party that have proceeded to the Kennebec."—Boston Daily Advertiser

Petrified Buffalo.—This extraordinary curiosity was discovered about two years since, by a party of trappers, belonging to Captain Rent's company, lying on the side of one of the beaver dams of the Rio Grande of the north, (a stream emptying itself into the Gulf of California,) whose waters it is said possess the petrifying qualities, in an eminent degree, its shores abounding in specimens of animal and vegetable productions in a petrified state.—The petrified buffalo is described by those who have seen it, to be as perfect in its petrification as when living, with the exception of a hole in one of its sides, about four inches in diameter, around which the hair has been worn off, probably by the friction of the water, in which it must have lain for ages past, to have produced such a phenomenon. The hair on the hump of the shoulders, neck, forehead and tail, tho' converted into almost a smooth surface, may be easily discerned. The horns, eyes, nostrils, mouth and legs, are as perfect in the stone as in their pristine state.

The country in which this rare specimen was found, is inhabited by the Esteaux, a roving tribe of savages who subsist, a great portion of their lives, on insects, snakes, toads, roots, &c. This tribe being particularly hostile to the whites, renders the acquisition of this curiosity not a little hazardous; notwithstanding this and many other difficulties to be surmounted, such as distance, expense, &c., our enterprising citizen Capt. Charles Rent, contemplates procuring and bringing it to the United States with him during the ensuing autumn.

The Jews of Damascus.—At a meeting holden in London, for the purpose of taking into consideration the recent treatment of the Jews at Damascus, with a view of adopting such a series of resolutions as should express the feeling of deep sympathy which were entertained by the merchants, bankers and others, citizens of the Metropolis, the Rev. Mr. Pieritz, a clergyman attached to the mission at Jerusalem, (who having been born a Jew, visited Damascus in order to give his testimony that the Jewish religion, so far from requiring murder, expressly forbids it,) gave the following as a list of the tortures which had been applied to the Jews:

1. Flogging. 2. Soaking persons in large tanks of cold water in clothes. 3. The head machine, by which the eyes are pressed out of their sockets. 4. Tying up tender parts of the body and ordering soldiers to twist and horribly dispose them into such contortions that the poor sufferers grew almost mad from pain. 5. Standing upright for three days, without being allowed any other posture, not even to lean against the walls; and when they fall down aroused up by the by-standing sentinels with their bayonets. 6. Being dragged out in a large court by the ears until the blood gushed out. 7. Having thorns driven in between the nails and flesh of the fingers and toes. 8. Having fire set to their beards till their faces are singed. 9. Having candles held under their noses, so that the flames arise up in their nostrils.

Gigantic Carriage drawn by Elephants.—Among the curiosities of the capitol was an elephant carriage, which had been constructed under the direction of the rajah, and in which his highness occasionally took an airing. It was sometimes used for the gratification of visitors at the residency. Six elephants were yoked and harnessed in this vehicle; their trappings and harness would be a load to a common horse: each elephant carried his Mahout or driver, behind his ears upon his neck. They moved at the pace which seemed for them only a smart walk, but so swift was their progress alonge the road that gentlemen mounted on horseback could only keep up with the carriage by making their horses gallop. The carriage had been built by a French coachmaker, from Pondicherry, and was only remarkable for its dimensions, which were sufficient to contain ninety persons. A musnud, or elevated seat, like an ottoman, was placed in the centre, to be occupied by the rajah and his personal friends; seats were ranged round the margin with the faces inward, and the shape of the carriage was an oblong. They tell a story of a general, some of whose early days were spent in confinement at the fortress of Soringapatam, that, on a visit to rajah at Mysore, about the time to sojourn here, he went out, by invitation, with the prince in this gigantic carriage: it was a royal pastime, and the rajah had given the hint to his servants to put the elephants to their quickest pace; but the effect of the velocity was such upon the nerves of the old warrior that he implored the interpositon of his highness to stop the carriage, or let him out. What would the old man have done in a railway steam coach.—Massie's Traveling Sketches in India.

Probable Piracy and Murder of Many Passengers.—The French ship La Lise, from the Mauritus for Bordeaux, was wrecked on the Agulhas Rocks, not far from the Cape of Good Hope, in February last. A great many passengers, both at the Mauritius and the Island of Bourdon, had embarked in her, relying upon her well known qulities, and the experience of Captain Lecacheux, who commanded her. From causes hitherto inexplicable, the captain, all the officers and passengers, and the cabin servants have perished, while the whole of the crew, including a man who had fallen before the wreck and broken one of his thighs, together with a man who had taken his passage in the forecastle, and of course lived and messed with the sailors, were saved, and have reached the Cape, and made a declartion as to the loss of the ship.

The English authorities, however, observing that the sailors had brought with them all their own effects, the trunks of the passengers, and other valuables, and that they were spending money very freely, entered upon a rigid inquiry. While this was pending, the sea cast on shore the captain and several of the passengers, who exhibited numerous wounds and bruises, evidently inflicted prevous to the wreck. Measures have accordingly been taken to discover the truth, and punish whoever may be found to have been guilty.

Correspondence of the Savannah Georgian.

Fort Holmes, (E. F.) July 31.

The Indians have apparently gone south, perhaps to plant a new crop, as it known that the recent operations of the 2d Infantry under Col. Riley were of such an energetic nature as to prevent them from planting. The summer scouts have destroyed immense plantations of corn, peas, beans, &c. all of which must be truly felt by the enemy, as upon them he evidently built his hopes of another winter fight.

The troops in East Florida are now arranged upon a line commencing at New Smyrna on the Atlantic, and extending to Fort Fanning, on the Suwannee. Nearly all the posts North of this line have been abandoned. A daring murder was committed on the 12th inst., at the hammock of Cow Creek, near Fort White. Sergt. Zeigler and corporal Sweatman of company B, 2d Inf. were returning from Fort Brady, the sergeant mounted, and the corporal on foot. At the place before mentioned, they were fired upon by a party of 21 Indians. The corporal undoubtedly killed, but the sergeant, it would appear, though badly wounded, fought until knocked down by superior numbers. The bodies of both soldiers were horribly mutilated, and in a manner too revolting for publication.

After the murder, the Indians blazed a tree, whereon they painted the figure of an Indian, under which they made twenty one marks, indicative of their number. Against the tree they placed an iron pointed arrow dipped in the blood of their victims. The next day they were pursued by a party of 25 men under Capt. J. R. Smith, but to no purpose. On the 16th inst. a party of 5 dragoons returning from Pilatka to Fort King, were fired upon by a large party of Indians concealed in a hammock four miles beyond this post; two men were wounded, one of them dropped from his horse, and to the credit of his companions be it mentioned, they stopped (although the Indians were hot on the pursuit, and manifesting their desire for blood by loud yelling,) and replaced their comrade in the saddle. The whole party succeeded in getting off. The officer, who pursued this party, says they were evidently the same persons who killed Sergt. Zeigler, as he found their trail leading from Cow Creek.

Singular case of Somnambulism.—A man, very respectable in his station as a working jeweller, lived with an only child, a daughter, in quiet and comfort, putting aside all his earnings beyond that which was applied to household expenses, in order to supply her dot when she would be married to a man in her own station; but for some time, some months, he had observed that he was robbed, that articles entrusted to him to alter, that gold given to him for the purpose of manufacturing into jewelery, vanished between the night and the morning. The poor man bore this for some months; but after having disbursed all that he had laid aside for his daughter's portion, in replacing articles of which he steeled his heart against all her protestations of innocence, and drove her from his presence.—On the following day he again missed an object of value, which she could not have purloined. The seconed night he broke a wine glass on the table of his bed-room, and having gathered the larger fragments retired to bed. Toward day-break he woke up, tormented by a pain in his foot, when he found that he had in it a piece of broken glass. This proved that he must have been standing upon the table, and he then remounted it, and was convinced that he was himself a sleep-walker, and that he had judged his child unjustly, and he found hid behind a cornice in the roof, immediately above the table, all the jewels and trinkets which he had lost. It is needless to add with what affection he again sought his child, or with what tenderness he restored her to that place in his bosom which she had never forfeited.—Paris Paper.

DIED,

At Preston, Chenango Co., N. Y., July 23d, 1840, Mrs. ASENITH TRUMAN, wife of Mr. Joseph Truman, aged 65 years

Mrs. Truman was born in Conn., New London co., 1775. She was the eldest daughter of Eld. Davis Rogers, who terminated his life and ministry in Preston, in a good old age. His daughter the subject of these memoirs, was early the subject of religious impressions, and while in child-hood often felt the strivings of the Spirit of God. Very early in life she became the subject of a saving change; the precise time is unknown to the writer. For about 27 years she has been a professor of religion, during which time she fully exemplified the high calling of God in Christ Jesus, by a blameless life, the highest proof of practical piety. In the neighborhood in which she died, she was among the first (even while in a literal wilderness,) who raised the suppliant prayer to God, and was one of the faithful few who reared a standard to the honor of Immanuel's name. Her cup in life was a mingled one, such as in general God's pilgrims inherit. In the providence of God, she was called upon to consign to the mansions of the dead, four beloved children: under which visitations she derived support from that religion, which (with her,) was a chief concern. During her own long and painful illness, patience and meekness were her constant attendants. Jesus was so precious that the valley she had to pass to enter the heavenly land appeared delightful. To the very close of life her confidence in God was unimpaired, and when on the very verge of the eternal world, (in possession of a calmness and serenity characteristic of a saint of God about to enter glory,) directed her friends to the hymn commencing, "On Jordan's stormy banks I stand, and cast a wishful eye," which she wished to be sung when she was dying, as containing the views she then had. She expressed some astonishment that her breath should continue so long while her spirit was ready for its flight, till at length the hoped for moment came—the chariot of the master arrived—she fell asleep in Jesus, leaving her companion and seven children to mourn her loss. Her funeral was attended on the Sabbath, 25th of July. The sermon was preached by Eld. J. S. Swan, of Oxford, from John xiv. 3. After which, her mortal remains were laid away in the "long home" to await the resurrection morning. There were in attendance numerous relations, neighbors, and christian friends, all appearing deeply to sympathize with the afflicted, and we trust conscious that "Precious in the sight of the Lord is the death of his saints." "Let me die the death of the righteous, and let my last end be like his." Comm.

POETRY.

THE CHILD OF EARTH.

BY MRS. NORTON.

Fainter her slow step falls from day to day,
Death's hand is heavy on her darkening brow;
Yet doth she fondly cling to earth, and say,
"I am content to die, but, oh! not now!
Not while the blossoms of the joyous spring
Make the warm air such luxury to breathe;
Not while the birds such lays of gladness sing;
Not while bright flowers around my footsteps wreath.
Spare me, great God, lift up my drooping brow!
I am content to die—but, oh! not now!"

The spring hath ripen'd into summer time,
The season's viewless boundary is past;
The glorious sun hath reach'd his burning prime;
Oh! must this glimpse of beauty be the last?
"Let me not perish while o'er land or lea
With silent steps the lord of light moves on;
Nor while the murmur of the mountain bee
Greets my dull ear with music in its brow;
I am content to die—but, oh! not now!"

Summer is gone, and autumn's soberer hues
Tint the ripe fruits, and gild the waving corn;
The huntsman swift the flying game pursues,
Shouts the halloo, and winds his eager horn.
"Spare me awhile to wander forth and gaze
On the broad meadows and the quiet stream,
To watch in silence while the evening rays
Slant thro' the fading trees with ruddy gleam!
Cooler the breezes play around my brow;
I am content to die—but, oh! not now!"

The bleak wind whistles, snow showers, far and near,
Drift without echo to the whitening ground;
Autumn hath pass'd away, and cold and drear,
Winter stalks on, with frozen mantle bound.
Yet still that prayer ascends:—"Oh! laughingly
My little brothers round the warm hearth crowd,
Our home-fire blazes broad, and bright, and high,
And the roof rings with voices glad and loud;
Spare me awhile! raise up my drooping brow!
I am content to die—but oh! not now!"

The spring is come again—the joyful spring!
Again the banks with clustering flowers are spread;
The wild bird dips upon its wanton wing:—
The child of earth is numbered with the dead!
"Thee never more the sunshine shall awake,
Beaming all redly through the lattice-paine;
The steps of friends thy slumbers may not break,
Nor fond familiar voice arouse again!
Death's silent shadow veils thy darken'd brow;
Why didst thou linger?—thou art happier now!"

SCENE ON THE OHIO.

THE SOLITARY GRAVE—BY REV. J. TODD.

Beneath yon tree where rolls the flood,
Ohio's gentle wave,—
There stands the stone still marked with blood,
And there the stranger's grave.

* * * It now rained in torrents, and I took shelter under the branches of a huge hemlock which stood near the river. Seated upon a decaying log, I was in a fair way to rest, and even to sleep, for not a drop of rain could penetrate the covering of the giant tree whose arms were spread over me. Just then the hunter's dog came bounding toward me with cheerful look and wag of the tail, which seemed to say, 'you are just what I was looking for.' He opened his deep mouth, and a single bay brought his master to my side. His hard, weather-beaten yet kind countenance, lighted up as he gave me his sinewy hand; but the smile and the light passed away in a moment, as the sheet lightning of summer will flash across the face of the cloud and be gone in an instant. I had never seen him so moody before, and for a long time sat silently watching him, to see if the clouds which I saw, were those which precede, or those which follow a storm.

In a short time the paddles of the machinery of a steamboat were heard, and in a few moments more she was in sight—a vast floating ark moving with amazing rapidity and grandeur. The shower had driven the passengers under cover, and though she was crowded with human beings, yet scarcely one was to be seen. I gazed upon it as I would upon a moving thing in a beautiful diorama; they were all strangers to me. It is astonishing to notice how differently we look at a moving steamboat full of entire stangers, from that which we know contains one being whom we know and love! The boat moved on as heedless of the hunter, his dog and myself, as we could possibly be of her. We had not spoken a word since she came in sight; but just as she rounded a point above and was going out of sight, the old man broke out—

'Ay, ay, she can double the point safely enough now, and go puffing on as proudly as a boy with a new rifle, but I have seen the day when she would not dare go so near that point, or if she did she would be glad to be off at any rate. She's a grand creature though, and goes like a hound.'

'What are you thinking of, friend Rogers? What day are you thinking of, when that point was so dangerous? The trees and the banks look to me as if there had been no great alteration here since your day.'

'No, no, the banks and the trees stand just as they did. I said nothing about them, but you yankees are always for skinning the bear before you have caught him, and this you call drawing inferences.'

"Well, well, I own I was on the wrong scent for this once, but do tell me, the story, for I cannot but draw the inference that you have some story connected with that bend of the river.'

At once the face of the old man became sad and melancholy. He was silent again and I began to repent that I had pressed him. He leaned upon his well-tried rifle, and I thought I could see his keen eye moisten.

'Did you notice that I felt bad when I came and found you here?'

'Yes I noticed that you were silent, but I did not know it was because you found me here trying to keep dry under this hemlock.'

'On the wrong scent again! But look this way. Do you see that grave down in that little hollow, with a stone at its head?

'I do, indeed, and wonder I had not seen it before.'

'It is easy to see things when they are shown to us. I have pointed out many a deer to a young hunter when he was just going to see it, and wondered why he had not. But that grave, and that point, and my story, all are connected. The story, however, is short, and now that we are here, I must think it all over again, and I may as well think aloud and let you hear it.'

'It was many years ago, long before such a thing as a steamboat was heard of, or even dreamed of, that the event happened. I hope, no one seeing me then would have thought that I should ever have become this withered old man.'

'As straight as a rifle, and as strong as a buffalo, and with an eye and an ear as keen as an eagle's,' said I.

Yes, I can split a ball on the point of a knife at two hundred yards, but this will not be long—my hand sometimes trembles. But don't you talk if you want to hear my story.'

'Go on, and I will not interrupt you again.'

'Well, it is now nearly forty years since I first saw the glorious Ohio. I shouted when I first saw it, I have loved it ever since, and when I die, I hope I shall be buried on its banks. On a certain day, I engaged to go down the river to Kentucky with Captain Ward, as he was removing his family to the East. The journey was long, and at best would be tedious. I went as a kind of pilot, for I was well acquainted with the river, and all points of danger. The country was full of Indians, and no settlements of any note had been made in Ohio. The whites and the Indians too, were continually making war upon each other. I do not know who was the first to blame. The whites killed the most, and the Indians were most cruel. We purchased an old crazy, square built boat, between forty-five and fifty feet in length, and about eight or ten feet wide. We contrived to spike on a single pine plank on each gunnel, and this was the only thing we had to defend us. We had a heavy load, furniture, baggage, horses, pigs, fowls and ploughs, besides nearly a dozen people. These consisted of the captain, his wife and their children, a widowed sister and son, besides several men to manage the boat. When we left, we were fearful lest the Indians should attack us from the shore, but we know that by keeping in the middle of the river, we should be beyond the reach of their rifles or could be in a few minutes. Thus we passed on for a several days, till we supposed we were beyond the haunts of the Indians. One day, just at sunset, after we had become tired with rowing, we let our boat drift lazily and carelessly along the current. We were just getting ready to put up for the night. The widow was getting out the provisions, and making arrangements for our supper. The captain and the nephew had hold of the oars, and moved them only just enough to allow me to steer the boat.'

'Rogers,' said the captain, 'suppose we put in this side of the point, and tie our boat to one of those trees, and there encamp for the night?'

It's a right good place, captain, and I like it. Besides, I thought a few moments ago, I heard wild turkeys over the hill, and I should like to have one for supper.'

'So we put in toward the shore, and had got within about fifty yards of that point around which the steamboat had just passed, when I heard a stick crack as if broken by the foot.'

'A deer,' said the captain.

'No, no,' I shouted, 'row, row for life, or we are all dead.

'At that instant, down rushed scores of Indians to the shore, with a shout that made the hills across the river echo it back again. The murderous creatures rushed down to the water's edge, and presented their guns, and opened a heavy fire upon us. In an instant the young man snatched his rifle, and raising up his full length, fired at the nearest Indian, who had a shabby head dress. The Indian fell, and so did the young man at the same instant. As he fell, the captain brought the boat round and still nearer. The Indians yelled, the women screamed, the horses were falling and plunging, and bullets were flying thick around us. Yet above all the voice of Capt. Ward rose cool—'Rogers, take my oar.'

'I took it, and he at the same instant seized a piece of plank and rowed to such purpose, that in a few minutes we were out in the river, beyond the reach of their rifles. We knew they had no canoes, being on a hunting excursion, and that we were then safe. But oh, what a sight! the horses were all dead or dying, one child badly wounded, the boat half filled with water, and the young man in his blood at the bottom of the boat. By this time the coolness of the captain was all gone. He lay down by the side of his nephew, whom he loved as his son, and exclaimed, 'O John, John! O Lord have mercy, have mercy! I have brought the dear boy to his death!' But the widowed mother! She was pale as a sheet; but she came to her son, raised his head in her lap, and opened his bosom where the blood was coming still. He was yet alive."

'John,' said she, in a sweet voice, as if speaking to a babe, 'John do you know me?'

'My mother,' said he in a whisper.

'Can you swallow, John?' said she, putting her hand over and dipping up some water from the river.

He tried but could not.

'My son, do you know you are dying?'

'Yes, mother, but are you hurt?'

'No, no; but don't think of me. Can you pray with the heart now, my dear son?'

He looked up a moment, and gasping, said, 'God be merciful to me a sinner, for the sake of——'

'Jesus Christ,' said the mother; for he was gone. She bent over him a few moments as if in silent prayer, then kissed his lips, and for the first time tears filled her eyes. Till that moment you would have thought she had been talking to a child just going to sleep—her voice was so calm and so mild. She was a widow, and this was her only child, and a noble fellow he was. But she was a religious woman. I never saw religion like that before or since. It was all—God has done it, and he cannot do wrong.

'We lay off the river till dark, and then silently came to the shore on this side for the night. We dared not to light a candle, lest the Indians should see it. We milked our only cow and fed the children, and got them asleep. We then brought the body of the young man up the bank, and when the moon rose up, we dug that grave which you see yonder. We had to be careful not to make a noise, nor even to weep aloud. But after we had opened the grave and were ready to put the corpse in in, the widowed mother spoke.

'Is there no one here that can offer a prayer as we bury my only child? There was no answer. We could all sob, but we had never prayed for ourselves. She then knelt down and laying her hand on the bosom of her boy, she, in a subdued voice, uttered such a prayer as few ever made!—She was calm as the bright waters at our feet. And when she came to pray for the whole of us—for the poor Indians who had murdered her boy—when she gave thanks to God that he had so long comforted her heart with her son, and when she gave thanks that God had given her such a son to give back to him—it was awful!—we could not sob aloud! You preachers talk about sublimity, but if this was not it, I do not know what it is. Well there we buried him, and there he sleeps yet. In the morning I got up at day light, and came up here to place that stone at the head of the grave. It was bloody, for his head had rested upon it. I found the mother was here before me—perhaps she had been here all night. She was trying to do the very thing, and so, without saying a single word, I took hold and helped her to put the stone at the head of the grave. It is now nearly sunk in the ground, but it stands just as we placed it.

When we had done, the widow turned and said, 'Rogers,' but tears came and I was thanked enough. I have sat on this log many times, and thought over the whole scene: and though the mother has been in the grave many years, yet I can see her even now just as she looked when she turned to thank me, and I can hear her voice just as she spoke to her dying boy. I have never seen such religion since."

'Well, Rogers, though you have never seen such a call upon a Christian since, may I not hope that you have felt something like it?

'I am an old sinner, and have a hard heart,' and the tears ran down his cheeks.

We conversed a long time, and it was good to do so. As we rose up and cast a last look upon the grave, and upon the spot where the Indians fired, I said—

'Rogers, would you like a picture of this story?"

'I have it, sir, on my heart, and need no other; and yet, perhaps my children might understand it better if they had one. But the story don't need a picture.'

'No, nor would the picture need the story.'

POLISH LITERATURE.

The language and literature of Poland have advanced to their present very high degree of perfection in an equal ratio with the increasing misfortunes of the country, during the last fifty years. This phenomenon appears so extraordinary that it deserves the serious consideration of every reflecting mind. What, indeed, should seem more unfavorable to the progress of a nation's language, than its political annihilation, and the incorporation of its dismembered provinces with several foreign states, each respectively intent upon destroying every vestige of its former nationality? Yet, it is a fact that Polish literature is actually now reaching its zenith, and at no former period could Poland ever boast of more distinguished men in every department of science, learning, and political eminence. Since the third partition of 1795, all the public museums, the library of Warsaw, numbering 200,000 works, that of the Society of the friends of Science, scarcely less rich, and Prince Czartoryski's Library at Pulawy, containing invaluable materials connected with Polish history, and not fewer than 20,000 English works, were after the melancholy events, of 1830, carried off for the second time to Russia. Yet these unpropitious circumstances, so far from retarding, have promoted the growth of national literature; and Polish works of sterling merit have been lately published, not only in several parts of Poland but St. Petersburgh, Moscow and Vienna. In fact, the hitherto unsuccessful attempts made for the recovery of independence, have invigorated instead of weakened the moral energies of the Poles, and that ardent feeling of patriotism which in former times was principally confined to one class, now animates alike the inhabitants of every cottage and palace in Poland. That feeling alone, without admixture of Jacobinism, democracy, or any other political theory, promts the rich and the poor to submit to every sacrifice for the restoration of their country. Their literature is more intimately connected with the history of their incessant political struggles, than is the case with any other nation: is a most potent weapon, which they now understand how to use. The time may yet come when the following passage shall have ample realization, though not designed for them, even on earth, as it assuredly will in heaven—"In this time shall the present be brought unto the Lord of Hosts of a people scattered and peeled, and from a people terrible from their beginning hitherto; a nation meted out and trodden under foot, whose land the rivers have spoiled, to the place of the name of the Lord of Hosts, the mount Zion. Isaiah, xviii. 7.—Foreign Quarterly Review.

FOR THE FARMER.

From the New Genesee Farmer.

HINTS FOR THE MONTH.

The wheat crop being gathered, farmers should now spare no pains to procure clean seed for the succeeding crop. The best varieties of wheat should be sought, and the seeds of all weeds, especially of chess, carefully cleaned out.

Weeds should not be neglected at this season. Corn should be cleared of them, late in the season though it may seem. It will save much labor next year. A piece of ground was kept clear of weeds during the season; another, adjoining, but imperfectly; the following year the mangel wurtzles on the former piece were cultivated with very little labor, on the latter they were overrun with rank weeds.

Canada thistles will need attention, that they do not ripen their seed. Field thistles in pastures should be destroyed. Mullins eradicated.

Root crops, too often neglected in this month, should be kept clean.

Underdraining on wet grounds, is best performed about this time. Farmers, to cultivate their fields profitably and satisfactorily, should have all parts equally; all wet portions should therefore be made dry by ditching.

Open drains are useful only in carrying off surface water, covered ones for wet grounds and springs. Open drains are necessarily shallow, or else very wide, and always occupy land; covered ones may be easily and cheaply made of any required depth, and occupy no land. Stones covered with slabs and then with straw, are an excellent filling where soils are friable and consequently apt to fall in.

Brush drains are made in soft soils where stones are scarce, by placing freshly cut branches of trees with the leaves upwards, and then filling in the earth.

Many farmers become discouraged with ruta bagas, from the great labor of hoeing at this time. To avoid this difficulty get the ground thoroughly clean before sowing the seed. Begin this fall, and plough and manure the ground; next spring plough and harrow several times at intervals. The weeds will be thus killed and the ground made in a first rate condition, and the subsequent culture will be very trifling. By a similar course we have seen turnips raised at the cost of only a cent and a half a bushel. Don't give up before another fair trial.

OF
THE CASKET,
AND PHILADELPHIA MONTHLY MAGAZINE.

THE great increase of the subscription list of the Casket, which has been nearly doubled since the commencement of the last volume, warrants the most extensive improvements on the first of July 1840, at which time a new volume will be commenced with increased vigour. Nothing need be said of the firm basis on which the Casket stands, it being already the oldest magazine in the country, and has maintained its popularity, in the face of all opposition. It is to be found upon the centre tables of families making literary pretensions from Maine to Georgia.

TYPE—EMBELLISHMENTS.

The Casket is printed with a clear and beautiful type, upon the finest white paper. The illustrations are not surpassed by those of any periodical, at home or abroad; and beside the monthly steel engravings, a quarterly plate of colored Fashions has lately been added. The style of these embellishments is unequaled, and they are always accompanied by an appropriate sketch. No wood cuts disgrace the work. Whatever appears in the Casket, is of the first order of art.

The volume will be with the first of a series of splendid mezzotint engravings, prepared expressly for the work, by the burin of Sartain, who deservedly stands as the best engraver of the kind in the United States.

LITERARY CHARACTER.

The literary character of the Casket is well known. It is wholly original, of the highest order, and sustained by writers of the first rank. Essays, Tales Sketches and Travels, compose its prominent prose articles; while the poetry is equalled by that of no other magazine of like character. The variety for which the Casket is celebrated, shall suffer no diminution; but on the contrary every exertion shall be made to increase its interest.

Several Romances of the Revolution have already appeared, and others shall follow in the course of the volume, presenting when finished, a complete picture of the manners, and a historical account of the great battles of that time. Thus, the Casket, instead of being filled with sickly sentimentalities, aims at a true delineation of human nature in every variety of passion.

The series of thrilling nautical sketches, entitled Cruising in the Last War, and which are rated by the contemporary press, equal to the celebrated sketches from 'Tom Cringle's Log,' will be continued and the 'Leaves from a Lawyer's Port Folio,' which have attained a deserved celebrity, will still furnish attraction to the Magazine.

We shall furnish the readers of the Casket with some valuable papers from entirely new contributors. The author of [illegible] will give the first of a number of Sketches in the July number. We count upon his [illegible] graceful pen to do much in maintaining the popularity of the Magazine. In addition to the variety already embraced in the pages of the Magazine, our 'Syrian Letters,' the first of which appears in the June number as introductory, will [illegible] and add warmth to its pages. They are from an [illegible] used pen.

FASHIONS.

The Fashions are published in the Casket quarterly, or as often as any really new style arrives from Paris. The engravings are colored and executed from original designs. No old worn out plates are retouched and then published as the latest fashions. The truth of our designs may be tested by comparing them with the latest description of dresses in London and Paris. They are universally admitted to be the finest specimen of engraving and coloring afforded by any Magazine in the country.

The expense of getting these up [illegible] is great, but we shall in no wise abate the quality. [illegible] The readers of the Casket [illegible] these fashion plates as an extra. They [illegible] the regular and choice engravings which always accompany the work.

TIME OF PUBLICATION.

The Casket is published on the first of the month in every quarter of the Union. The most distant subscriber consequently receives it on that day as well as those who reside in Philadelphia. In all the principal cities agents have been established, by which means subscribers in the vicinity can receive their copies free of postage.

TERMS.—Three Dollars per annum. Or Two Copies yearly for Five Dollars, invariably in advance, post paid. No new subscriber received without the money, or the name of a responsible agent.

Editors who may copy this prospectus and will send a copy, marked with [illegible] address to the Saturday Evening Post (which will save postage on newspapers) shall be promptly furnished with the work. To be particular in this matter, we should like a copy of the paper marked, to be sent to the office, that no mistake or delay may occur.—Editors are served with the Magazine from the [illegible] the advertisement is inserted. We mention this as many inserted the advertisement at the close of the last volume, and expected all the back numbers.—This of course we could not be expected to grant.

TIME TO TAKE FOOD.

Man as created, is susceptible of numerous impressions from surrounding matter, as well as from the exercise of the various functions of the body. That which demands our more particular notice at present, is denominated hunger. It serves to give notice of the want of nourishment, and always proves true to its office when nature is suffered to take its course, which induces us to believe that the GREAT AUTHOR of man's existence intended that he should eat to live.

But from present circumstances we should be led to believe that the order was entirely changed, inasmuch as an appetite has been cultivated that often complains of being weak or wanting, requiring the food to be nicely dressed and highly seasoned with some stimulating condiment that shall rouse the dormant energies and enable him to partake. And why? Because he has not waited the warning of sentinel hunger. The style of dressing and manner of cooking, induces him to partake at unseasonable times and in unreasonable quantities, (it is always an unreasonable quantity when nature does not call for it,) and thus the appetite is rendered weak or entirely destroyed, inasmuch as the digestive apparatus is not suffered to recover from the effects of a previous load, ere it is summoned to receive another, and the conclusion we have arrived at, is, that man lives to eat.

By thus eating, he entails upon himself the horrors of terrific dreams, a loathing of exercise, and the tormenting pains and depressions of the truly miserable dyspeptic, and doleful indeed is the tale of woe by him who eats when nature declines, as is always the case when he eats before he hungers.

We see that he who eats only to satisfy the call of nature as made known by hunger, knows not the pains of indigestion, and feels not the thousand ills that afflict the tortured gormand.

The food designed for man by nature, is free from the irritating stimulus of spices, easy of digestion, producing no pain, giving health to the functions and vigor to the body, with peace and tranquility to the mind.

Then why continue the practice of eating when not called by nature, thus loading the body with infirmities and increasing the cup of human misery? Obey nature and the sum of human suffering will be many times diminished, days will be added to life, and usefulness increased. The physicians bill will no longer haunt, nor the noisy din of the emperic perplex, but health and ease attend the down-hill of life, rendering sweet the decline of age, and pleasant the vale of death.

HAPPY DEPARTURE OF THE "INFIDEL RECLAIMED."

Died, in Rindge, N. H., April 24, 1840, THOMAS JEWETT, M. D., aged 69. He was the subject of the Tract 351 of the American Tract Society.

The writer of this is not a stranger to the solicitude that was felt in view of publishing in a permanent form, and for extensive circulation, such an account as is given in the Tract above mentioned, while the subject of it is living. But in the Providence of God, I have with many others, lived to witness, with great satisfaction, the spirit and conduct exhibited by the "Infidel Reclaimed," while he lived, and also to witness, and record to the glory of sovereign grace, his peaceful, his triumphant death.

In regard to the general character which the subject of this obituary notice maintained after his conversion, it is sufficient to observe that he abundantly sustained all that is stated respecting him in the published account, fulfilled all the hopes of the friends but none of the predictions of the enemies of truth. "He adorned the doctrine of God our Savior in all things."

It would be interesting to describe the character of one, whose deportment every way was so entirely in accordance with the spirit and precepts of the gospel; but only a few of the more prominent christian graces will be mentioned.

Dr. Jewett ever manifested a child-like simplicity and teachableness of mind, as pleasing as it is rare. As this dependent, confiding, docile temper was very conspicuous at his conversion, so he maintained to the last hour of life, a remarkable willingness to be instructed and guided in all things relative to his spiritual concerns.

He cherished a warm attachment to the church and people of God.

As soon as was suitable after his conversion, he cast in his lot with the people of God, and from that hour loved the church with sincere and ardent affection, prayed for its peace, rejoiced in its prosperity, and mourned in its afflictions. His feelings were like those of the captives at Babylon, and he could, with entire sincerity, adopt their impressive language, "If I forget thee, O Jerusalem! let my right hand forget her cunning."

His affection for the house and worship of God were equally strong. This he evinced by a constant and seasonable attendance on all occasions of worship. In reference to a new place of worship just completed, and in the erection of which he had felt a deep interest, he said, "I had rather have a seat in that house than in any other place on the face of the earth."

He had an earnest desire to grow in grace and increase in usefulness.

Exceedingly watchful of his temper and feelings in all respects, and circumspect in all his words and actions, he made growth in grace and usefulness in the cause of his Redeemer, the great object of his life.—With this view he faithfully used the means of grace. Immediately on admitting a hope he instituted family worship, and maintained it morning and evening till his strength utterly failed. With the same desire, he devoutly attended on all seasons of worship, week days as well as Sabbath days; and aware of the tendency of promiscuous conversation on the Sabbath, to efface good impressions, he refrained as much as possible from a habit to which some are addicted, of talking away the intermission, and conscientiously walked in silence and thoughtfulness to and from the place of worship, morning, noon and night, alleging as a reason, that in his case it was the course best fitted to secure the object of attendance on the means of grace.

He took great delight in hearing the gospel. It was to him a joyful sound, and though as a man of some taste he could be pleased with a display of learning and eloquence, yet he rather desired "the sincere milk of the world that he might grow thereby." And as he diligently used the public means of grace, so he daily used the Bible, and prayerfully meditated on its blessed truths, he was nourished up for "everlasting life," and in the seven years of his Christian life, he made attainments in piety and knowledge, which might well humble many a professor of thirty years standing.

He felt great compassion for impenitent sinners, especially to the class to which he once belonged, and scarcely to his dying day did he speak of his feelings without uttering in some form his concern for their salvation.

In a word, he "fought a good fight, he kept the faith," and I may now add, he has "finished his course with joy."

The state of his mind in his last sickness, and in death, was such as might have been expected in the case of one who "in simplicity and godly sincerity: not with earthly wisdom, but by the grace of God had his conversation in this world.

As soon as he became seriously ill which was about three months before his death, he began to "set his house," and make all needful arrangements relative to his domestic affairs, and at length those which had respect to his funeral, with as much calmness as in the case of a common journey, and yet with all the solemnity becoming the subject.

In one of my first interviews with him after he became ill, and while he was able to leave his house he spoke substantially as follows: "I have had great comfort under your preaching, and I have now great peace; I am as happy as I can be; I have a strong hope; my hope is all in the merits of Jesus Christ, who has purchased my redemption with his own precious blood. The way of salvation appears wonderful, and I have great peace in meditating upon it. I sometimes look down to the world of wo, but I think I shall never go there. I have great compassion for sinners, and if you survive me, I want you to warn them to flee from the wrath to come." At another time in reference to the expression of an English infidel when dying, that "he was about to take a leap into the dark," the Doctor observed, "I am agoing to take a leap into the light. It is all light in heaven; they have no need of the sun, nor of the moon, for the Lord is their light, and I shall soon be there." Again—"I am failing in body, but in growth and comfort I am growing stronger and stronger every day. A door is open before me out of this world, and another is open before me into heaven, the New Jerusalem, the holy city, where are the angels, and where God is. O what seasons of joy are there! Christ has opened this door, and invites us to come. O that men would forsake their sins and come to Christ!" He was asked if he laid any claims to heaven on the ground of good deeds, "O no; I am a guilty sinner. It is a wonder that I was spared. I joined with the wicked in all their reproaches and injurious reports, against Orthodox ministers and Christians," and in other language which I cannot repeat, expressed as he frequently did, his abhorrence of his sins, and his admiring views of that rich and sovereign grace, which called him into the kingdom of God.

At another time he said, "I am wasting away, but I am not afraid of death nor of hell. God is with me. He will be with me in the dark valley. He will take my soul from my body into heaven. All is light—I seem to look right into heaven. I did not know before that any person could have such near views of God and heaven, as I have."

In the course of his sickness he exhibited remarkable patience and submission, though his sufferings for the last two weeks of his life were singularly distressing. He used his strength in praising God, and exhorting his brethren and fellow citizens, nearly two hundred of whom called on him, one or more at a time, in the course of his confinement. It is believed that he occupied for two months, three hours a day in conversation.

On one occasion he said, "What can I do better than to talk my life out for my fellow mortals? Christ poured out his life for a guilty world."

On one of the family rising to wait upon him he said, "I sleep under the banner of Christ—go, lay yourself down to sleep in his arms, I need no one to sit up, the presence of Christ overshadows me."

At another time,—"I have found him whom my soul loveth. I feel quiet and happy in his presence; I feel that I have done with earth, and have comforting views of Christ's goodness and love, and feel no choice whether to live or die, just as God wills. I lay myself in his arms, his spirit dwells with me. O the wonderful plan of salvation! I never sought the Lord, but he sought me, and found me, and my soul shall praise him forever."

Again—"Bless the Lord, O my soul, and magnify his name, for his wonderful kindness, his tender mercies to me a sinner. O the joy and peace in believing.—"Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither have entered into the heart of man, the things that God hath prepared for them that love him."

"Why was I made to hear his voice,
  And enter while there's room,
While thousands make a wretched choice,
  And rather starve than come."

"Blessed be the name of that Savior, who allowed me to enter before it was too late. O had I sought the Lord in my youth how much I might have enjoyed. All you, my children, remember your Creator, now—now—even to-day, and not abuse his tender care and compassion."

The last time I saw him alive, was two days before he died. He said, "I may live till to-morrow, but I wish you to read the 21st chapter of the Revelation, containing the account of the holy city. I wish to hear that once more before I die." As soon as the reading was closed, he said with great earnestness, "Is not that worth living for seventy years in such pain and anguish as I now endure? Yes, O yes: worth thousands and thousands of years of pain to obtain such an eternal inheritance. And I shall soon be there." On the morning which closed his life, he uttered some strong expression in regard to the burning thirst which he suffered, and then exclaimed, "I long to drink of the water that flows from the throne of God and the Lamb." To the question, "Do you long to be gone?" he answered, "Not till my work is done.—not till my heavenly Father is ready." Just before he ceased to breathe, and when he was supposed to be unconscious of his condition, he was asked, "Do you know that you are going?" he replied, "Yes. Christ is near at hand."

Much more of the same character might be transfered to this paper; but enough has been stated to indicate the state of mind in which the "Infidel Reclaimed" finished his earthly course—a state, as edifying to his fellow Christians, who were permitted to have interviews with him in his last days, as it was suited to show the truth of the Gospel, and the power of divine grace.

A CONTRAST.

BY THE LATE REV. MATTHEW WILKES.

Calculate the weights and measures
  Past, and present, and to come,
Of your worldly, sensual pleasures;
  State at large the mighty sum;—
Tell me, are they not a bubble,
  Blown by sin's fantastic breath,
Agitated now with trouble,
  Bursting soon in endless death!

Calculate again the measure,
  Past, and present, and to come,
Of the Christian's holy pleasure;
  State at large the mighty sum:
Tell me—is it not a river,
  Ever flowing, ever free,
God alone the gracious giver;
  Stop—and drink, and happy be.

FREEDOM OF CONSCIENCE.—To Liberty, in matters of religion, all the nations of the world have an indefeasible right and title by the blood of Christ, who, by the purchase and virtue of his death and resurrection, is become the sole Lord and Ruler in and over the conscience—for to this end Christ died, rose, and revived, that he might be Lord both of the dead and living; and that every one might give an account of himself in all matters of worship under God to Christ alone, as their great Master, unto whom they stand or fall in judgment: and in those things they are not to be oppressed or brought before the judgment seats of men? Why should'st thou set at nought thy brother in matters of his faith and conscience, and herein intrude on the proper office of Christ, since we are all to stand at the judgment seat of the Son of Man, whether governors or governed, and by his decision only are capable of being declared with certainty to be either in the right, or in the wrong.—Henry Vane.

Though God loves converted ones never the worse for being such great sinners before; yet they should loathe themselves so much the more for being such sinners before they were converted.

No cloud can overshadow the Christian, but his faith will discern a rainbow in it.

From the Morning Star.

ASHAMED TO BE A CHRISTIAN.

There is no stronger evidence of the depravity of man's natural heart, than that astonishing pride which makes him scorn to be a christian. With as much propriety, might the wheat be ashamed that it is not tares, the diamond that it is not a pebble, or the respectable young man that he is not a horse thief or a midnight robber. But alas, how many infatuated sinners there are, who, though convinced of their guilt and consequent danger, look upon it as a disgrace to be distinguished in any way from rebels against God, and continue boldly to identify their characters as such, whenever any expression of their real views is called for. They shudder to break away from God's enemies and join his friends. They thrust from them with scorn, the only balm of human wo, the only solace of human grief. They are so ashamed to submit to God, that they choose rather to make their bed in hell, than to accept on his terms, a seat in heaven—a robe of celestial purity—a crown of unfading glory—a heap of gold—and palms of victory. On this rock, thousands have dashed, and thousands more are wrecking their eternal interests. Reader, are you of the wretched number? O escape, while there is hope. Dash from your bosom this Satanic feeling, or you are lost, irrecoverably lost, and O, eternally lost!

INVOCATION.

Bear me from the earth away,
  Spirits of the joyous skies!
Heavenly airs around me play;
Seraph voices seem to say,
Sister spirit, come away!
  Sleeper, from the dust arise!"

Come! with all your shining train,
  And dissolve this frail abode—
Charm away all earthly pain;
Break my spirit's weary chain,
For it long in bonds hath lain,
  Fainting 'neath a heavy load.

Bear me where all pain is done,
  Blessed messengers of God!
Bear me to a cloudless sun—
Bear me where bright waters run,
With glad music in their tone,
  And no shadows on their flood.

I would flee to some calm spot
  Smiling under peaceful skies,
There to share a glorious lot,
Where the bright world changes not,
Where all wrongs shall be forgot,
  And Affection never dies.

Bear me where no pain can come—
  No dark dreams from troubled sleep—
Where undying flow'rets bloom—
Where no willow decks a tomb—
Where deep hearts may find a home—
  Love at last forget to weep.

I am one whose flesh is weak,—
  Bowed beneath Affliction's rod—
Born to suffer—yet be meek—
Here is not the rest I seek;
Oh! the winds of earth are bleak—
  Take me, take me up to God!

THE WHOLE CREW CONVERTED.

The following fact was communicated by a respected brother who has been laboring among seamen in the port of New York:

The William Hannington, Capt. Bell, master, left Newcastle upon Tyne, about the 1st of April last, with a crew of fourteen men, laden with coal for the United States. A lady belonging to the Baptist chapel in Newcastle, feeling a deep interest in seamen, put into the hands of the captain, a few days before leaving port, a package of tracts and magazines for the crew. "I took them," said the Captain, "and according to her wishes, distributed among the hands, until the whole had gone the rounds among them. In a very few days, after losing sight of the Highlands of Scotland, the second mate, a well-bred and intelligent young Scotchman, came to me and said, "Sir, I hardly know what is the matter with our men; but your tracts have produced a feeling among them that I have never seen before. If you have any doubt on the subject, go look into the forecastle and see for yourself." I stepped down and sure enough every man was reading with an engagedness as though his very life and soul were in it. On returning to the cabin, the mate continued, 'Sir, they wish the Bible read to them, and to-morrow, (meaning the Sabbath,) they wish to obtain your permission to hold a religious service among themselves in the forecastle.' I can have no objection to that I am sure, I remarked, but who will lead them, mate, seeing none of us make any professions that way? 'I shall make my best endeavors,' was the reply, 'and I suppose others will do the same.' Very well, I said, there is a prospect of fine weather, make all snug, I will now take the helm, and let every one that wishes, attend the service. The arrangements were made—the Sabbath came—a meeting among themselves was held, morning and afternoon. A privilege for a prayer-meeting was again asked for in the evening. I objected—'But,' said the mate, 'you had no objection all day, why object now?' My objection is, I replied, that you do not hold the meeting in the forecastle, but in the cabin, where I may have a spice of a privilege with you myself, since I have accommodated you all day by standing at the helm. Accordingly, in the evening every man came down into the cabin. I took the Bible and read a chapter, and called upon the mate to pray. In a moment all were upon their knees. The mate proceeded a little way, but soon choked up with tears, and broke down. The cook then undertook it, and he soon swamped in the same way. I then said to one of the apprentice boys, Billy, cant you pray for us? The little fellow began, and made an excellent sweet little prayer, and seemed to get along the best of any of us. The fact is," said the captain, "we were all overwhelmed with a sense of our sins, and as there was not one of us that had made any profession of a religious experience, we made rather lame work at first; but, I do hope that God in his mercy, has heard our poor petitions, and converted every man on board. As to myself," said the captain, "it is my intention, if it please God, to connect myself with his people, and with the church, of which my praying wife is a member; and I suppose it is the probable intention of others to do the same."

THE TEN COMMANDMENTS.

Though the ten commandments were given to the Jews particularly, yet the things contained in them are such as all mankind from the beginning were bound to observe, and therefore [illegible] tion, they and the tables on which they were engraven, and the ark in which they were put, were distinguished from the rest of God's ordinances, as containing the covenant of the Lord. And though the Mosaic dispensation be now at an end, yet concerning these moral precepts in it, our Savior declares that "one jot or one tittle shall in no wise pass from the law till all be fulfilled." To comprehend the full extent of these commandments, it will be requisite to observe the following rules. Where any sin is forbidden in them, the opposite duty is implicitly enjoined; and where any duty is enjoined, the opposite sin is implicitly forbidden. Where the highest degree of any evil is prohibited, whatever is faulty in the same kind, though in a lower degree, is by consequence prohibited. And where one instance of virtuous behavior is commanded, every other, that hath the same nature and the same reason for it, is understood to be commanded too. What we are expected to abstain from, we are expected to avoid as far as we can, all temptations to it and occasions of it; and what we are expected to practice, we are expected to use all fit means that may better enable us to practice it. All that we are bound to do ourselves, we are bound on fitting occasions to exhort and assist others to do when it belongs to them; and all that we are bound not to do, we are to tempt nobody else to do, but keep them back from it as much as we have opportunity. The ten commandments, except two that required enlargement, are delivered in few words; which brief manner of speaking hath great majesty in it. But explaining them according to these rules,—which are natural and rational in themselves, favored by ancient Jewish writers, authorized by our blessed Savior, and certainly designed by the makers of our Church Catechism to be used in expounding it,—we shall find that there is no part of the moral law but may be fitly ranked under them.—Bp. Secker.

THE MONITOR'S CHURCH HINTS.

MOSTLY SELECTED FROM MATTHEW HENRY'S COMMENTARY.

Can we expect that he will be true to his friend, who has been false to his God. 1 Kings, 22: 30.

Better buy wisdom dear, than be without it.

Experience is said to be the mistress of fools who will not learn till they are taught by experience.

We should learn to avoid bad associates, from others' ruin, not our own. 1 Kings, 22; 19.

He is never safe that has God for his enemy. 2 Kings, 1: 2.

We should be thoughtful of our present duty than our future prospects. 1 Kings, 1: 2.

There is nothing gained by contending with God.

If we would prevail with Him it must be by supplication.

If we would not fall before Him we must bow before him.

No one ever found it in vain to cast himself on the mercy of God. 2 Kings, 1: 13.

God's works are well worthy our notice. 2 Kings, 2: 7.

INDUSTRY.—"There is one precept," says Sir John Reynolds, "in which I shall be opposed only by the vain, the ignorant and the idle. I am not afraid that I shall repeat it too often. You must have no dependence on your own genius. If you have great talents, industry will improve them—if you have but moderate abilities, industry will supply their deficiency.—Nothing is denied to well directed labor."

ENDURANCE.—Many there are who regard a brave endurance as a great virtue; and so it is if it springs from a right source—but if its supports are fixed on the baser passions of our nature, it is a positive vice.

When we see others better than ourselves, we should not grieve, but rejoice, that they are better than ourselves; yet we should not rejoice, but grieve, that we ourselves are no better.

Life is a flower garden, in which new blossoms are ever opening as fast as others fade.

EVIDENCE OF CHRIST'S RESURRECTION.—It has been well contended against infidels, that if the body of Christ had really remained in the sepulchre, the Jewish rulers would have produced it in public, for the purpose of refuting, in the most convincing manner possible, the doctrine of the resurrection; and that with respect to the common cavils about the watch, the severity of the Roman discipline, (of which none could have been better apprized than the soldiers,) the poverty of the disciples, which removed them from the offer and acceptance of it could have been practicable—together with every attendant circumstance, are ample demonstrations that it must have been removed in a supernatural manner. The credibility of the history is likewise increased by the fact, that not one of the Evangelists cites any eye-witness of the act of the resurrection, but merely those of its reality; whereas, had not the the Gospels been intrinsically genuine, and had their authors been inventors of the [illegible], the Gospels would probably have described the ACT itself, and their writers, like those of the Apocryphal, would have launched at once into accounts [illegible] and absurd.—[illegible] Review.

FOR THE YOUNG CHRISTIAN.

ANGELS JOY WHEN SINNERS REPENT.

Suppose one of your little brothers should fall into the river, and there sink down under the deep waters, and before he could be got out he should grow cold and pale, and seem to be dead. Your father takes the little boy in his arms, and carries him home, and then they wrap him up in warm flannel and lay him on his bed. The doctor comes and goes into the room with your father and mother, to see if it is possible to save the little boy's life. The doctor says that nobody may go into the room but the parents. They go in and shut the door, and in a few minutes the question is to be decided, whether or not the child can live. Oh! then how would you go to the door [illegible] with a step soft as velvet, and hearken to know whether the dear boy lives! And after you had listened for some time, treading softly and speaking in whispers and breathing short, the door opens and your mother comes out, and there are tears in her eyes! Is he dead?—says one, in a faint, sinking whisper—is he dead? Oh! no—no—your brother lives and will be well again! Oh! what a thrill do you [illegible]! What leaping up in gladness! Now there is such a joy in heaven over one sinner that repenteth. The sinner has been sick, but the gospel has been taken as the remedy, and he is to live for ever. Do you wonder that the angels rejoice at it?—Rev. J. T. [illegible]

He who forwards these selections, [illegible] places among them the following beautiful meditation on some of the beauties of that world which a God of mercy "hath made so wondrous fair."

Doth not the pleasantness of this place carry in itself sufficient reward for any time lost in it? Do you not see how all things conspire together to make the country a heavenly dwelling? Do you not see the blades of grass, how in color they excel the emerald, every one striving to pass his fellow, and yet they are still kept of an equal height? And see you not the rest of those beautiful flowers, each of which would require a man's wit to know and his life to express? Do not these stately trees seem to maintain their flourish in old age, while the only happiness of their being clothed with a continued spring, because no beauty here should ever fade? Doth not the air breathe health, which the birds, delightful both to the ear and eye, do daily solemnize with the sweet concert of their voices? Is not every echo thereof a perfect music? and those fresh and delightful brooks, how slowly they slide away, as loath to leave the company of so many things united in perfection, and with how sweet a murmur they lament their forced departure.—Drake, 1629.

From the Youth's Friend.

WITNESS TO THE SAVIOR.

The Heavens gave witness. A new star passed through the sky at his incarnation; and at his crucifixion, for three hours the sun was darkened.

The winds and seas gave witness, when, at his word the tempest was hushed, and rough billows smoothed into a calm. At the same word the inhabitants of the waters crowded around the ship, and filled the net of the astonished and worshipping disciples.

The earth gave witness. At his death, and at his resurrection, it trembled to its centre.

Disease gave witness. Fevers were rebuked; the blind saw their Deliverer; the deaf heard his voice; the dumb published his glory; the sick of the palsy were made whole; and the lepers were cleansed at his bidding.

The grave gave witness when Lazarus came forth, and when many bodies of the saints which slept arose.

The invisible world gave witness. Devils acknowledged his divinity and fled from his presence. Angels ministered unto him in the garden, the desert, and the tomb. A multitude sung an anthem in the air in the hearing of the shepherds; and as our risen Lord ascended up to glory, they accompanied him.

O yes, he is, as the Apostle affirms, "The great God, even our Savior."

FOR THE MINISTER.

From the Charleston Observer.

DEVOTEDNESS AND ZEAL NECESSARY FOR SUCCESS IN THE MINISTRY.

A DISSERTATION BY ONE OF THE STUDENTS IN THE THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY AT COLUMBIA.

If purity of motive, sincerity of heart, the love of souls and the glory of God, should combine their propelling influences to move a Christian from the ranks of his brethren towards the office of the holy ministry; and if Christians deem it necessary that he should possess natural abilities, mental acquisitions, and skill in imparting knowledge; then a question of great importance arises, should he be a man of devotedness and zeal?

We might answer in the heart-felt sentiment of the zealous Apostle, though he understand all mysteries and knowledge, and could speak with the tongues of men and angels, yet if ye have not these two characteristics, he will be as sounding brass and a tinkling cymbal.

Ministers are not to be mere shining, intellectual, but burning lights.

The cold winter's sun, even in mid-day splendor, never produces fruit. It is the warm, vivifying, moving rays of the summer's sun, that awakens the latent energies of the earth, decks the valleys with flowers, and causes the fields to waive with golden harvests.

That a minister of the Gospel should ever turn aside to "make tents" or "serve tables," neither the Saviour, his Apostles, nor the venerable Fathers of our church, ever seemed to anticipate. In former days of genuine piety, filial confidence, and ardent zeal for the glory of God, ministers seemed to think that they were engaged in a great work, and could not come down. Neither did they seem to anticipate that any after them, upon whom the mantle of Elijah should fall, would ever think of knowing any thing among men save Jesus Christ and him crucified.

And why should not ministers be wholly devoted to their work? If the farmer, the mechanic and the merchant, should be zealously engaged in their respective employments; if the teacher, the physician, the lawyer and the statesman, must be engrossed in their callings, in order to have reputation and success; then, every conceivable reason assigned in these cases, may with the additional interests, and imparted force of eternity, be urged to show why a minister should be wholly devoted to his great office.

Is the preparation of the spirit of man, for a few fleeting and uncertain days of respectability and usefulness among men, of more importance than its preparation for mansions of bliss and society of angels forever? Is the amassing of fleeting wealth and fading honors for these perishing bodies, a more inspiring object, than that rich and glorious inheritance, which is incorruptible, undefiled and fadeth not away? Are the petty trifles and transient interests of this brief span of existence, of more importance than the amazing and momentous interests of eternity? No. Then, none but a downright Atheist can entertain the least shadow of a doubt, that a minister should be devoted, time and talents, soul and body, to his sacred duties.

Again: the nature of his studies renders it necessary that the Christian teacher should be wholly devoted to his calling. Such a man has not to do with things seen and temporal—but unseen and eternal. He has not to expatiate upon this little sphere of tangible materiality; but to explore the hidden recesses and winding labyrinths of our own mysterious nature—to learn our intellectual capacities, and indissoluble relations to the moral government of God.—He has risen by laborious mental abstraction, and penetrated the glorious regions of uncreative purity, and survey by an eye of faith, the trascendent glories of his infinite perfections and unfathomable wisdom, and matchless mercy displayed in the plan of salvation. In all these high and mysterious themes, he must be so familiar that upon a moment's warning, he may be enabled to give a reason for the hope of the Christian.

Again: look at his incessant, arduous, and almost numberless duties. He must be thoroughly armed to meet at every point the heretic, infidel, and atheist, who would come in and "devour, if it were possible, the very elect."

He must, in many places, preach three or four times a week, attend the counsels of the church, stand between contending brethren, go from house to house, instruct the ignorant, visit the sick, watch over the dying, stand by the grave and pour out his sympathies with bereaved parents and tender relatives; and, amidst all this, endure the slanders, contradictions and cruel mocking of ungodly men. Well may the inspired Apostle exclaim, who is sufficient for these things! Such duties might well appal the angel Gabriel. No wonder men shrink back from such high and weighty responsibilities. No wonder you often see ministers, with trembling frames, sink to an untimely grave. Hence, every thing which can be conceived of in reciprocal acts of kindness and mutual interests, for time and eternity, demand that a minister should be expected to know nothing among men save Jesus Christ and him crucified.

But while he is thus devoted, he should possess consuming zeal in the performance of all his labors. Ardent zeal is commendable in any good cause. We love it in school boys—commend it in the teacher, extol it in the lawyer, and praise it in the statesman; and when we reflect upon the momentous interests of eternity, we must more than admire it in the minister. Hence the minister who has the burning spirit, is like a flaming two-edged sword, piercing the very thoughts and intents of the heart. Without ardent zeal, we have no right to hope for success in the ministry. This is abundantly plain from the fact that God always selects zealous spirits to accomplish great ends.

When the system of will-worship and idolatry come to be overturned, and the kingdom of Christ to be established in the earth, he raised up and thrust out into the vineyard, an ardent Peter, a zealous Paul, a melting John, and an eloquent Apollos. And when those to whom he had committed the sacred oracles, had gone back into ignorance, bigotry, superstition and idolatry, he converted and called into the ministry, a laborious Calvin, an undaunted Knox, a determined Luther, and a thundering Whitfield. And thus in each successive era of the church, he has called into his vineyard more or less of these devoted and zealous spirits, who have subdued kingdoms, wrought righteousness, obtained promises, stopped the mouths of lions, quenched the violence of fire, escaped the edge of the sword, waxed valiant in fight and turned to flight the armies of the aliens. Hence, our only hope for success in the ministry, is found in the track of these flaming messengers who have gone before. Now in order that you may attain to the same useful ends my beloved young brethren, let us pray most earnestly, and resolve most solemnly, that, by the grace of God, we will nobly strive to be always zealously affected in this good cause. Let the world call us bigots, madmen, and enthusiasts; it makes but little difference, for thus they called the inspired Prophets, holy Apostles, and bleeding martyrs. Since it is an admitted principle that men should be zealous in proportion to the value of the object for which they labor, therefore every minister should possess that zeal which will be as fire in his bones, burning with unextinguishable ardor.

Thus let us reflect for a moment upon the worth, and mysterious and wonderful powers of the soul; capable of making new discoveries, treasuring up knowledge, and expanding forever, of going back into a past eternity, expatiating on the present, and almost living amid future scenes of immortality.

But see these noble energies of mind clad in Christian virtue. Thrilled with divine love and gratitude, they grasp in their sympathetic arms the first and last of these living kindred spirits. But they stop not within the confines of this little world to waste their energies among living intelligencies, but with the light of divine revelation, they penetrate the veil of eternity, and mingle their sympathies with holy angels and glorified spirits. But still more expanded and enraptured in their holy feelings and sympathies, they cannot find their full portion until wrapt in the sublime contemplation of the infinite perfections of Jehovah. O the greatness, the grandeur and sublimity of the redeemed spirit! And these are the bright jewels which devoted and zealous ministers are, instrumentality, to rescue from the corrupt mass of human nature, as it rolls on its dark pollution to the ocean of despair. No wonder the zealous Apostles could say, we can "endure all things for the elect's sake," and "lay down our lives for the brethren." No wonder the angels are round about us zealously looking on with outstretched necks, and rejoicing when they see one of these bright jewels snatched from the grasp of the destroyer, and placed in the Redeemer's crown, to shine as the stars forever and ever.

AURICULAR CONFESSION.

Before we can form an adequate conception of the mischievous influence of auricular confession, in crippling the mind and enslaving the vulgar, it is necessary to examine the character assumed by the Romish priest, who sits on his inquisitorial throne in the confession-box.

1. He partakes in the eyes of his dupes of the character of infallibility. 'The church,' they are taught is infallible. He is her mouth-piece, and parish oracle; being one of that mystic body, which they are told is infallible, when collected in priestly parliament. This naturally elevates him into a supernatural being in the opinion of the crowd; and gives him an awful importance in their debased minds.

2. The validity of all sacraments depends upon his intention!!! For example: tho' he went through all the usual genuflections and manipulations at the mass, it is held that no consecration really takes place unless the priest INTENDED to consecrate. Again, no sinner, we are told, is absolved from sin, although the priest pronounces absolution, unless truly and absolutely he intended absolution!!

3. It is blasphemously taught that the priest can bring the Godhead visibly and bodily into any particular place by the word of his mouth: i. e., every popish priest can bring a piece of dough into any one's house, and then and there turn it into the very body, blood, soul and divinity of Jesus Christ, to be seen by the family, capable of being touched, smelled, tasted, and handled.

4. He is described in the children's catechism as 'a mediator (mediator is the word) between God and the people.'

5. He says he can bind or loose on earth and it shall be bound or loosed in heaven.

6. It is declared, as we have already hinted, that the priest fills the offices of judge, physician, father, counsellor, and teacher.

7. His name is rendered awful by connection with the name of the Deity: the words of the Confiteor (the act of confession) runs thus: "I confess to Almighty God," &c. [viz. saints and angels,] "and to you, O! holy father." It is an obvious law of the human mind, that men, ignorant and undisciplined, are prone to regard with superstitious feeling, objects associated with others that demand their homage. The two objects become compounded or inseparably connected together in the mind; and the ideas raised by the greater are transfered to the meaner.

Let the reader now pause; and, connecting the extraordinaay claims of the priesthood here noticed, with the nature of the jurisdiction exercised in the confessional, say whether auricular confession is not calculated to subjugate and prostrate the intellect?—Eclectic Review.

UNIVERSALISM.

The renunciation of Universalism by the Rev. Mr. Whittaker, of New York city, has created great excitement both in the city and elsewhere. In the subjoined note addressed to the Trustees of the society, Mr. Whittaker gives the reason why he could no longer preach the doctrine of Universal salvation:—

To the Trustees of the 4th Universalist Society, Duane St.

DEAR BRETHREN:—I hope you will excuse the liberty which I have taken in addressing to you these few lines, on a subject which I deem of infinite importance.

It is now about two years since I first commenced my labors among you, and you will not deem it an instance of vanity, if I say that my efforts to advance the cause of Universalism have been generally approved, and signally successful.

To this, you have frequently born testimony, and for which you have had my warmest acknowledgements.

But in looking calmly and dispassionately at the result of my ministrations, there is one drawback to my happiness—one source of disquietude, which weighs heavily upon my mind.

By the providence of God, I have recently been led to ask myself the following important questions:

What have I done towards promoting practical piety among my congregation?

Have I induced them to become a deeply religious people—a praying people?

Alas! I am constrained to answer these questions in the negative, and to take unto myself shame and confusion of face.

Now, if the doctrine I have preached be the truth of God, ought I not to have expected a different result?

What, then, is the unavoidable inference? —Why, that Universalism is not a scripture doctrine.

Perhaps you may think this a hasty conclusion, but I assure you, it is not so.

I have been led by the Spirit of God to investigate its claims—I have prayed to the Almighty that he would enlighten my understanding, and lead me to a knowledge of the truth and blessed be his holy Name, he has heard, and answered my petition.

I can truly say, that I now see and feel the importance of personal religion, in a manner that I have never done before; and I ardently beseech the "Giver of every good and perfect gift," that he may open your eyes, and give you to see that Universalism is but a "cunningly devised fable," calculated to darken the mind, harden the heart, and induce mankind to wander from the paths of righteousness and peace.

Such being my convictions, I can advocate it no longer; and I beseech you, as you hope for mercy at the bar of the Almighty, to renounce it immediately.

Do not, I pray you, suffer yourselves to be deluded by a sentiment, which is dangerous and licentious in all its tendency. By renouncing it, you lose nothing, for if it is true, you in common with the whole world, will be saved—but if it is false,—Oh! remember—remember—the awful consequences!

But I must close, and may the Lord grant, that you, together with my dear congregation, may soon be led to see and feel the necessity of an interest in the atoning blood of Jesus, which is the ardent prayer of your sincere friend,

WM. WHITTAKER.

New York. July 21st, 1840.

Mr. W. has been a preacher among the Universalists since 1832, and for the two last years he has labored in New York city. Since his renunciation, he has been represented by the Universalist press as unworthy of confidence, fickle, foppish, inefficient and destitute of ministerial qualifications. Rev. Mr. Sawyer, of the Universalist church in New York, has given a "statement of facts," relative to his renunciation, in which he represents that there was much dissatisfaction existing with him in the society, and that the Trustees had lost confidence in him as a pastor, and in fine, that he renounced Universalism because he could not receive a support.

The following extract from the N. Y. Evangelist, will show in what estimation Mr. W. was held by the Universalists previous to his renunciation.

"But it is to Universalists themselves that we are principally indebted for all that we know of Mr. W. previous to his change of faith. While a resident of Hudson he received many pressing invitations to preach elsewhere. Under date of Oct. 28th, 1833, the Rev. Otis A. Skinner, then pastor of the Third Universalist Society in Baltimore, which he was about leaving, wrote to Mr. W. urging him to visit B. in order to supply his place. "I hope," he says, "that you will conclude to make the visit, because I know of no one who I think would suit the place as well." What had become of all their popular preachers? Where was Mr. Sawyer at this time? Would he have suited as well? It seems not.

In June, 1836, Mr. W. was urged by a letter from Mr. B. B. Mussey to visit Boston, with a view to become the pastor of the 5th Universalist Society of that city. In that letter Mr. Mussey assured him that "it was the wish of all with whom he had conversed, that the society should extend to him an invitation to come among them," and added, "I think there is no doubt the society will." Having declined this entreaty, he received a "unanimous" call in January following to settle in Poughkeepsie. In March, 1838, the Rev. Asher Moore, then pastor of the Universalist society in Hartford, Ct., being about to resign his charge, wrote to Mr. W. and urged him to come to Hartford, and preach as a candidate. In that letter he says, "From all that I have seen and heard of you, I can think of no one who would better suit the Universalist Society of Hartford. I think that you would be the very man for Hartford. And I know that the society will place very great reliance upon my judgment in the selection of a suitable person to take my place." Such was the reputation of Mr. W. at that time, (from all that was then heard of him,) that Mr. M. could think of no one, not even Mr. Sawyer, that would suit better.

The Rev. L. S. Everett, pastor of the church in Baltimore, being about to change his location, wrote under date of June 22d, 1838, to Mr. W. at Hudson, as follows:—

"I have had some correspondence with Br. Moore of Hartford, about coming here, but I do not think that his talents are exactly adapted to the taste of the people here. He is sensible, but not brilliant—he cannot sustain the cause here. Now, Br. W., I do believe from what I have heard of you, that you would suit the people here as well as any man in the denomination.—And should you desire to come here, and I can find another location, I will do my best to secure you the situation.—They pay me a hundred dollars a month, regularly and promptly, and they will pay my successor the same."

We are informed that Rev. E. N. Harris of Boston, has also renounced Universalism, declaring that he could preach it no longer. If the doctrine of Universal salvation is wrong, (as we certainly believe,) —if it is not calculated to make men better and holier, we cannot regret that its defenders are forsaking it. The interest of the immortal soul are too great to be trusted to an uncertainty. Smaller matters may be treated lightly, and as their relative importance requires. But he, who without the strongest possible assurance of the correctness of the doctrine, will presume on the mercy of God and trust for salvation on the benevolence of God, without holiness of heart, is most unwise. If conscience upbraids—if the word of God causes doubts to arise, it will be well to heed these monitions, and make sure preparation for the judgment-day.

We do not impeach the honesty of those who differ from us in this subject. We candidly believe that there are many Universalists that labor to exercise the holy principles of the Gospel, and do the will of God. But we greatly fear that some have embraced this doctrine without fully examining the evidences of its correctness. If such persons should eventually fall under the wrath of God, they cannot regret it as their misfortune, but must consider it their crime.

Our objections to the doctrine are,

1. It does give license to sin. All who embrace this doctrine may not take the liberty, yet some do, and others may and still indulge the hope of salvation. It is more easy for the natural man to perform vicious than virtuous actions. To sin, is easy, it is natural, and men unrestrained by the Gospel which requires holiness of heart, will continue to sin and delight in it. And if these can be assured that their salvation is certain, we believe most men would follow the natural inclinations of the heart. If salvation is free to all, irrespective of moral character, then there is no motive to induce men to be holy and exercise all of the ennobling principles of the gospel—there is no incentive to self-denial and obedience to the divine requirements.

2. The doctrine is not congenial to the renewed heart. We have never known a person just born of the spirit of God to embrace this sentiment. Such persons can see the justice of God in their condemnation; but cannot see how the attributes of God can be made to harmonize in the salvation of the impenitent. Unaffected, impartial love, possess the heart of the new-born Christian. It extends to all men, and creates a fervent desire for their salvation. It extends to God, and rejoices in the purity of his character—the holiness of his throne —and in the determination of God to act impartially, and to give to all a just recompense, according to their work.

3. We believe it to be contrary to the scriptures of truth and the genius of religion. We are aware, however, that this doctrine is declared to be founded on the scriptures. We readily admit that numerous passages may be brought to the aid of such a sentiment. There are others that are expressly against it. But we cannot persuade ourselves that the scriptures are discordant and actually teach doctrines that are contradictory. Perfect harmony is discoverable in the precepts and doctrines taught in the word of God. If so, partial and universal salvation are not both inculcated in the sacred writings. Consequently we are persuaded that those passages that may be brought to the support of this doctrine, when taken in connection and made to harmonize (as they certainly do,) with the whole word, will be found to give little or no evidence that all men will be saved.

An impartial examination of this important question, can not bring injury to any; it may be of invaluable service to some. To be absolutely certain of right, is better than to indulge a doubt.

It will be infinitely wise to have a scriptural assurance of eternal life in that day, "When all that are in their graves shall hear the voice of the Son of God, and come forth—they that have done good, to the resurrection of life; they that have done evil, to the resurrection of damnation.

CORRESPONDENCE.

For the Register.

"Let him that is taught in the word communicate unto him that teacheth in all good things."—Gal. vi. 6.

I have often thought while looking upon the various characters composing the church of Christ on earth, of the words of the Apostle to the Philippians, where he graphically describes the situation of many that were in the church, and doubtless of many in the present day. This was a subject that weighed so heavily upon the mind of the Apostle, that he often told them of it, and while writing to his beloved brethren, the Philippians, knowing the end of those characters and the effect of their influence upon the church, he could not mention it without "weeping." Phil. iii. 18—19. And who that has drank at the same fount of inspiration with the honored Apostle, while they look upon the many branches of the church can refrain from weeping also? Dear reader, have you ever beheld the moral desolation, (the effect of neglecting the principles of this text,) that with its blighting influence prevails in so many congregations of religious worshippers? If not, let me direct your mind to one religious assembly, in which you may behold a miniature of many in the present day. The body that I have selected as an example, is sufficiently numerous and wealthy, not only to sustain the gospel ministry among themselves, but to do much beyond the bounds of their society in sending the Bible and the gospel to the heathen. But do they do it? It is a matter of doubt whether five out of the hundred ever contributed any thing to circulate the Bible out of their own families, or to spread the gospel either at home or abroad. They have had a minister with them the most of the time since they were first organized into a church. Have they communicated unto him as the gospel requires? They have not. The minister undoubtedly entered the ministry from a sense of duty and in the fear of God; but knowing this, (which a man never ought to know,) that he had assumed an onerous duty, weighing like this—to support his family—prepare for all his ministerial duties—and do his part, or more, in defraying the expenses of the church—he was necessitated to bend those powers of his mind, which should have been spent in a deep research into the truth, and in watching the flock and warding from it every appearance of evil—in devising ways and means to meet his necessary expenditures. The consequence has been as is usual in such cases. The current of his thoughts being by the neglect of the church, impelled in business; he is so little prepared on every occasion for administration, to meet the requirements of the age; that his labors, instead of proving like the gentle zephyrs of the fruitful breeze, have become like the glaring of the sun—the tender herbage is nipped in the bud—the young leaves are shriveled and dry—and he that walks there, (as he may in a thousand other places,) will feel the heart-sickening sensation of being in a pestilential atmosphere, and a barren waste. Contention and calumny create a miasm, that hangs with fearful, deadening weight upon the pulpit, altar, and seats of the tabernacle dedicated to the service of God. A few attend the ministrations of the pastor upon the Sabbath. Do those heart-burning looks of distrust and dislike, that burst from the eye of the preacher as it wanders o'er the little congregation, bespeak the presence of Christ? And that unspread table, where no bread has been broken for months—where no refreshing of the memory with the emblems of the Lords body broke for sinners meets the eye, and calls the thoughts for a space from earth to Heaven—makes the cold blood of despair rush with fearful force to the heart. "Oh! that my head were waters and mine eyes a fountain of tears, that I might weep day and night for the slain of the daughters of my people." Some may ask with astonishment, Can a church be thus? Even thus—and herein you see a full comment upon the language of the Apostle. "He that soweth to the flesh, shall of the flesh reap corruption." Gal. vi. 8. What more fearful comment would you require, than to see a corrupt ministry, and a corrupt church? The word came to Israel by Hosea iv. 9—10. "And there shall be, like people, like priest: And I will punish them for their ways, and reward them for their doings. For they shall eat, and not have enough: they shall commit whoredom, and shall not increase: because they have left off to take heed to the Lord." And now my brethren, if the situation of your church is not as bad as the example I have produced before you—if you are not in the practice of communicating to your minister of the blessings which God puts into your hands as stewards: Remember! "that he that soweth sparingly, shall reap sparingly," and but little fruit will surely bring to want. If you have any desire for the prosperity of your churches, the salvation of your children, kindred and neighbors, and the glory of God, hold up the hands of your minister—communicate unto him in all your good things." I do not ask you to pamper him, to worship him, nor to love him more than you should love the representative of the Lord whom you profess to love. If your minister is a true shepherd, he will care more for your spiritual good than you care for his temporal. When you call him to become your minister, you take from him the means that men in other stations possess of administering to their own and their family's comforts and wants. Do you plead that he is recompensed in the honor of his calling? He that is faithful to his trust, seeks not the honor of men, and he cannot to any good degree attain it. If he devotes his time solely to the pleasures and the profits of literature, he must neglect the spiritual interest of his flock. If he devotes his time to manual labor, he cannot be prepared to defend the truth and enforce the doctrines of the Bible successfully. If he gives his mind to speculation in any article, he enters the whirlpool of worldly-mindedness, and besides neglecting the interest of the church, his preaching comes upon you like mountains of ice. Thus the [illegible] seems of the extent of his calling. He looks upon his connection with the world. And being left to look in vain for that assistance he is entitled to expect from his brethren, he spends his own substance, breaks under the accumulated cares of church and family, and falls into an untimely grave, leaving his family in destitution or falls into the general current, to the further fulfilment of the prophecy, "It shall be unto them like people, like priest." Perhaps, my brethren, you have never thought of this while you have enjoyed the blessing of this life, and take no pains to ascertain the extent of the sorrow of the humble minister. If you will not feed and clothe the minister of Christ, Would you do it to Christ himself if he was with you? If not, Can you love him? Do you not "glory in your shame?" But it is said that if a man does nothing but preach on the Sabbath, and devote the rest of the week entirely to labor, "it is as much his duty to preach as it is mine to hear." If that is his choice, I admit it. It is neither his duty to preach, nor yours to hear as a general thing. However powerful a man may be in the pulpit, he can there perform but a small part of the duty incumbent on the servant of the church, and that church under ordinary circumstances, that enjoys nothing more than the labors of the minister in the pulpit, can never be prosperous in an eminent degree. Besides, to expect the minister to toil through the week, and to step into the pulpit with an holy unction fitting him for the occasion, is to ask a miracle. You say, "he is called of God, and therefore God will do it." I admit that he may be called of God; if so, God has placed the means before him, and bid him use them; and you are as strongly required to sustain him in getting and giving instruction, as you are to perform any other work.

Afflicting Calamity!

FALL OF THE DRAW OF THE STATE ST. CANAL BASIN BRIDGE.

SATURDAY EVENING, 8 O'CLOCK.

Our city is the scene of a most distressing and calamitous Dispensation. At 5 o'clock this afternoon, just as the Steam Boats were departing for New-York, and when hundreds of People were crossing the Bridge over the Canal Basin, the Draw broke and precipitated from SEVENTY TO EIGHTY PERSONS and three or four horses and carts into the Basin! They fell about twenty feet into twelve feet water. The struggle for life, among the sufferers, was brief but awful! We shudder at the horrid recollection of it. Hundreds of citizens, with a dozen boats, sprang to the relief of their drowning fellow-citizens.—At 7 o'clock 21 dead bodies had been recovered, of which we can only learn the names of the following:—

James Hinman, Constable, of this city.

John Driscoll, Palmyra, Wayne county, in the employ of Jackson & Co., forwarding merchants, New-York.

John B. Lyons, Tobacco Pedlar, of this city, 27 years old.

Samuel S. Henderer, son of Jacob Henderer, Columbia st., 14 years old.

Charles Kittle, son of Sybrant Kittle, of this city, 20 years old.

Roderick Davidson, an interesting and promising youth, employed in this office, 16 years old.

James Quackenboss, a boy belonging to the Boat Mohawk.

Mr. Cavener, an Insane Man from Westmoreland, Oneida county, under the charge of Mr. Stevens and Orin I. Fuller, of Rome, on his way to Hudson. Cavener and Fuller were lost and Stevens saved.

James Van Buren, of German Flatts, a Canal Driver who was assisting Fuller to get Cavener to the Boat.

Joseph Welsh, Hack-Driver, of this city.

Wm. L. Morey, of Burlington, Vt.—[This person was identified by Alexander Robinson, of Easton, Washington co., who was with him at the time of the accident, and had his arm broken.]

Samuel Fisher, Lamp-Lighter, of this city.

Francis Rogier, Laborer, of this city.

—— Wood, a boy about 14 years old, of this city.

Thomas McDowell, of this city.

H. L. Hoffman, of Fultonville.

Smith Matthews, of Troy, formerly Bar-Keeper at the Eagle-Tavern.

The body of a man not yet identified.

A part of the draw fell after most of the sufferers were in the water, from which many were injured. Others were wounded by the struggling horses. The body of Mr. Hinman and that of a boy show severe wounds.

Capt. Jacobs, of the Boat Col. Little-John, who was assisting with the Insane man, though in the midst of this destructive scene, was saved.

James Henry, Book-seller, fell out-side of the crowd and saved himself.

Among the Hats recovered, was one with a Letter directed to "Jonathan Hart."

Mr. Carr, of the Pearl-st. House, was slightly injured but saved himself.

Thomas Greene, of the firm of Rathbone, Chapin & Greene, who was surrounded by struggling men and horses, swam out.

A young man (Samuel H. Ransom,) saved himself and an old man who was exhausted and sinking.

Mr. Wilson, Juliet, Illinois, son of J. Q. Wilson, of this city, swam out.

Capt. Morgan, of a Canal Boat, saved himself.

A man, whose name we could not learn, was saved with a broken arm.

Daniel Gavit, Engraver, swam out.

Several Cartmen, among whom we recognised David Terry, John W. Butler, Charles Rock, John Stackpole and Peter Simonds, saved themselves and horses.

This dreadful loss of life was occasioned by the refractory conduct of the Insane man who was refusing to go with his keeper. His resistance drew a crowd which blocked up the passage until the mass of People and Carts became too heavy for the Draw. Officer Hinman, the moment the Draw gave way, was endeavoring to disperse the crowd.

A large number of citizens continued their search for the bodies until dark.

Medical gentlemen continued their efforts to restore life until hope expired.

Several bodies were recovered within five minutes after the fall, and we can only account for the abortiveness of every effort to resuscitate life by supposing that the persons lost were injured by the fall or wounded before they sunk.

Our Medical men, (among whom we noticed Doctors Coggswell, Armsby, Van Olinda, M'Naughton, Hinkley, Staats, O'-Callaghan, J. W. Bay, and Van Buren) were prompt and untiring in their efforts to restore life. In two or three instances respiration was slightly effected, but all finally sunk.

The Mayor, who was early on the spot, assisted to save two boys who were nearly exhausted.

Among the citizens who made praiseworthy efforts to save lives and recover bodies, were Col. Groesbeck, Robt. L. Kearney, John McCardle, Edward Brinkerhoff, S. M. Fish, J. E. Gavit, David Terry, Jr., Elijah Brainard, James McGuire, Miles Joy, and several others whose names do not occur to us.

SUNDAY, 5 o'clock, P. M.

The search for bodies in the Basin was resumed this morning. It resulted in the recovery of Samuel A. Chamberlain, a youth 11 years old, whose parents were staying at the Hudson-st. Temperance-House.

The bodies of unclaimed sufferers were taken to the City-Hall last night, from whence, at 1 o'clock, after an impressive Prayer by the Rev. Dr. WYCKOFF, they were consigned to the Tomb.

The remains of these STRANGERS were followed to the Grave by the Governor, the Mayor and Common Council and a large concourse of citizens.

The Funeral of Mr. DRISCOLL and that of Mr. Chamberlain's Son were attended simultaneously, the former from the New-England Tavern and the latter from Mr. Churchill's Temperance-Hotel.

At two o'clock the Funeral of Mr. HINMAN was attended by a large concourse of citizens. He was a good citizen and valuable public officer.

The Funeral of Mr. LYONS, who was a worthy and much respected young man, was numerously attended at 4 o'clock.

At 5 o'clock, Funeral Processions from every part of the city, were moving in sad and solemn silence towards "that bourne from whence no traveler returns."

The Funeral of CHARLES KITTLE, a much respected young man, was attended by the FIREMEN and many other friends.

That of RODERICK DAVISON was also attended by numerous friends and among them the Sunday School associates to whom as indeed to all who knew him he was greatly endeared.

The Funerals of JOSEPH WELSH and JAMES REARDEN who were industrious, respectable citizens were numerously attended by their friends.

Life, in several instances was almost miraculously preserved. A son of Mr. GALLUP was going to the Boat with a package of money. As the draw was settling he clung to the boot of a man who himself held by a timber and both were thus saved!

Sergt. LOVELL, of the U. S. Recruiting service in this City, was among the first who fell in the water. He received two severe bruises on his head, from the falling bridge which made him quite delirious for several hours. In attempting to get out of the water, a horse struggling to extricate himself, kicked him several times on the side and thigh which threw him into the water again. He finally succeeded in getting out of the water but is still suffering very much from the blows on his head and side.

John White fell in on the North side of the Bridge—went to the bottom and finally got hold of a fragment of the draw standing upright, by means of which he got to the surface on the south side, and was extricated. Mr. White could not swim.

Charles Moseley was rescued with a dangerous wound.

Simon Gunliff, a blacksmith, has a broken thigh.

Richard Easton, a youth, in sinking had his coat torn off by a horse whose hoof grazed along his back. He caught the horse's foot and was brought up by it. He was then caught by a sinking man from whose grasp he with difficulty extricated himself. Mr. Radcliff, who was also "swimming in his agony," afterward caught hold of him, and they were rescued together.

IN COMMON COUNCIL,—Aug. 23.

Present—The Mayor and Messrs. Benedict, Bleecker, Boardman, Groesbeck, Hewson, King, Kirkpatrick, McClure, McElroy, McIntyre, Merrifield, Nolson, Robinson, Russell, Ten Eyck, Van Vechten, Whelpley.

The Mayor having briefly stated the facts connected with the partial destruction of the State Street Bridge, yesterday afternoon, and that the Board had been called together this morning for the purpose of taking into consideration and adopting such measures as might be deemed necessary for the relief of the families and friends of those who had been visited by this afflicting dispensation of Providence; the following resolutions were offered by Ald. Groesbeck, and unanimously adopted:

Resolved, That a committee of ten be appointed to take the proper steps to recover the dead bodies, (if any) still in the Basin, and to adopt such measures as they may deem necessary to relieve the distresses of those suffering under this awful calamity, and that the expenses incurred under this resolution be paid by the Chamberlain on the order of the Chairman of the Committee.

Resolved, That the bodies of those persons unclaimed by their friends, and now lying in the City Hall, be buried under the direction of the said committee, and that as a mark of respect this Board will, in a body, attend their funeral.

The following persons were appointed the committee: Messrs. Groesbeck, Hewson, Bleecker, Merrifield, Benedict, Nelson, Robinson, McMullen, McElroy, McIntyre.

On motion of Asst. Ald. WHELPLEY,

Resolved, That this Board deeply deplore the loss of JAMES HINMAN, one of our most worthy and efficient police officers, who lost his life whilst in the discharge of his duties, and as a tribute of respect will attend his funeral in a body.

Resolved, That the Clerk of the Board furnish the family of the deceased with a copy of the preceding resolution.

IMPORTANT FROM MEXICO.

By the schooner Emblem, which arrived at this port yesterday from Matamoras, we have received letters and papers of that port to the 1st instant, and dates from Mexico city to the 16th of July.

Urrea, the late Republican leader had escaped from the dungeon of the Inquisition, roused the people, attacked and captured the city of Mexico, and made President Bustamente a prisoner. Bustamente subsequently got his liberty, and called the centralists to the rescue; and, as will be seen by the details below, a general battle is yet to decide which party shall remain master of the capital.

MATAMORAS, July 30.

An extraordinary express arrived here on the 25th, three days from Tampico, bringing the important intelligence that the city of Mexico was in the hands of the Federalists.

In my last communication, you recollect, I spoke to you of Urrea, giving you an account of that General since his escape at the battle of Acajete. It appears that he was lately released from imprisonment, followers immediately flocked around him, and the spirit of rebellion issued forth in the very heart of the capital.

On the 15th, Urrea, assisted by his coadjutors, Gomez Padrasa, ex-Vice President, and Gomez Farillas, attacked the Palace, and after a bloody engagement, in which 300 men are reported to have been killed, Bustamente was taken prisoner. Before dark, the city of Mexico was in the hands of Urrea, who declared himself in favor of Federalism; and he will sink or swim in the cause he has espoused. Subsequently, the Seminary, the Cathedral, and the Diputacion were taken possession of; these, with the Palace form the four corners of the great square.

On the 16th, the latest intelligence received, Bustamente was given his liberty; and the Centralists were collecting their forces to make a desperate resistance.

Upon the occurrence of these important events, Santa Anna left Vera Cruz immediately in la diligencia for the Capital.

Generals Wall, Condea, and Canalizo, have left here for the city of Mexico. There is a very small force here, under the command of Empuedo, and Matamoras, I assure you, is in a very defenceless state. Arista, who was expected here, is reported to have left Tampico for the Capital.

All this is glorious news for Texas. I hope they will not attack this place; for her independence is now upon the eve of being acknowledged, and it is necessary that she will act with great caution at this moment.

AUGUST 1, 1840.

The express arrived night before last from Tampico, and I have dates from the Capital up to the 23d ult. Urrea still had possession of the Palace, and los casos publicos that command the great square of the city, and appearances at that date are of rather a gloomy feature for him.

Santa Anna, it appears, was eager in his proffers of assistance to the Government, but was informed that the revolutionists could be subdued without his aid. He is at Puebla.

Many of Urrea's followers were about to throw themselves upon the leniency of the Executive, fearing the result of their operations, but were told that none need be expected, the sword should determine the result.

The 5th regiment of cavalry, which were taken prisoners by the Federalists, had made their escape, and again joined the ranks of the Centralists.

By a private letter, of great respectability, from the city, I learn that upon the first attack of the pronunciodos they sustained a loss of 100 killed, 60 wounded, and 35 made prisoners, and that they met a similar fate on the 22d.

I have seen a private letter of the 8th of July, from a gentleman of high standing, which says that New Mexico had declared in favor of Texas, with the Commandant General, Amijo, at their head. There is a flying report that San Luis Potosi had declared in favor of the Federalists, but I place no confidence in it.

Yale College Commencement.—On Sunday evening, 16th inst. Rev. Dr. Beecher delivered a discourse on the subject of Education for the ministry; and on Monday evening, by request, a discourse on "Edwards on the Will" vindicating that author from the charge of fatalism.

On Tuesday morning, Rev. Dr. Barnes, of Philadelphia, delivered a finely written address before the society of the Phi Beta Kappa, on the progress and end of Science.

The afternoon and evening were occupied by the students of the Theological Seminary in speaking on various subjects.

The Theological class now graduating consists of thirty-two.

Wednesday morning and afternoon were occupied with the usual exercises of commencement, at the close of which, the degree of A. B. was conferred on 99 members of the graduating class; the degree of A. M. on 56; the degree M. D. on 20; and the degree of LL. D. on Junius Smith, Esq., of London. No D. D.'s were conferred.

The Comico and Clerum was preached on Wednesday evening, by the Rev. Leonard Bacon, on the text, "Take heed to thyself," particularly applied to the ministry.

The graduating class was the largest ever graduated at Yale, except one class which consisted of 100. No one could be present at these various exercises, without a deep impression of the powerful influence exerted by these Institutions on the character and destinies of our country.

American Mechanics.—The Mechanics in this country are fast equaling, if they do not surpass those of Europe. Mr. Holcomb, a self-taught artist in a small town in Massachusetts, has constructed some of the most perfect Telescopes ever made. One in the possession of an Academy at Albany, is said to be unrivalled for its beauty and accuracy. Mr. H. is now constructing one for the Girard College in Philadelphia, which will surpass in size, if not in exquisite power of observation, the celebrated Telescope of Herschel. We saw in the upper part of this city the other day, a beautiful astronomical apparatus designed for Williams' College, inimitably finished, and embodying more various uses than any other apparatus ever constructed. It was made by Mr. Phelps, a modest and worthy brass founder.—Troy Mail.

Bunker Hill Monument.—45 thousand dollars is the sum required to carry the Bunker Hill Monument to the height originally contemplated, 220 feet. The Newburyport Herald says, that two gentlemen, Mr. Amos Lawrence, of Boston, and Mr. Truro, a wealthy and liberal citizen of New Orleans, have pledged themselves to give $10,000 each, towards it, if the remaining $25,000 is raised during the present year.

Curious and Important Discovery.—We see it stated in a foreign periodical, that Signor Bertelli a rich landed proprietor in Piedmont, has discovered a method by which he can make silk worms spin red or blue cocoons at pleasure. So that the silk thus obtained is dyed naturally with the one or the other of these colors, and not only of surpassing beauty but indestructible. Signor Bertelli keeps his discovery a secret; but it is supposed to consist in some particular preparation of the mulberry leaves on which he feeds his worms.—Mer. Jour.

Very great distress prevails at this moment among the peasantry in the West of Ireland, particularly in Galway and Mayo. Some of the landlords, residents and absentees, have contributed considerable sums to the alleviation of this melancholy state of things. The price of provisions was, however, fortunately falling in the markets.

The Long Island Rail Road Company have completed their road to Hicksville, 27 miles. They are in possession of the means of extending their road twenty miles toward Greenport, which brings their road nearly opposite New Haven, and ten miles beyond Bridgport. It is therefore very obvious that a ferry boat at Bridgport to cross the Sound, can put all their passengers upon the Long Island Rail Road, with only seven miles of land carriage, from Port Jefferson on the Sound to the rail road over a very good road already constructed.—The width of the Sound at this point does not exceed eleven miles; and it is perfectly navigable, with good harbors.—Courier.

Suicide.—A person apparently about 70 years of age, and in the most abject circumstances, committed suicide at Setauket, Long Island, on Tuesday evening last, by taking a quantity of opium. He lingered about twenty four hours after taking the fatal drug.

DIED,

POETRY.

THE MISSIONARY'S DEPARTURE.

Go, take the wings of morn,
And fly beyond the utmost sea;
Thou shalt not find thyself alone,
Thy God is still with thee;
And where his Spirit bids thee dwell,
There, and there only, art thou well.

Forsake thy father land,
Kindred and friends, and pleasant home,
O'er many a rude barbarian strand
In exile though thou roam;
Walk thee with God, and thou shalt find
Double for all thy faith resign'd.

Amidst the dawn from far
Be thine expected presence shown;
Rise on them like the morning-star,
In glory—not thine own;
And tell them, while they hail the sight,
Who turn'd thy darkness into light:

Tell them, His hovering rays
Already gild their ocean's brim
Ere long o'er heaven and earth to blaze,
Direct all eyes to Him—
The Sun of Righteousness, who brings
Mercy and healing on his wings.

Nor thou disdain to teach
To savage hordes celestial truth,
To infant tongues thy mother speech,
Ennobling arts to youth;
Till warriors fling their arms aside,
O'er bloodless fields the plough to guide:

Train them, by patient toil,
To rule the waves, subdue the ground;
Enrich themselves with Nature's spoil,
With harvest trophies crown'd;
Till coral reefs, midst desert seas,
Become the true Hesperides.

Thus, then, in peace depart,
And angels guide thy footsteps;—No,
There is a feeling in the heart
Which will not let thee go:
Yet, go—thy spirit stays with me;
Yet, go—my spirit goes with thee!

Though the wide world between
Our feet conglobe its solid mass,
Though lands and waters intervene
That I must never pass;
Though day and night with thee be changed,
Seasons reversed, and clime estranged.

While these enchant thine eye,
Oh, think how often we have walk'd,
Gazed on the glories of our sky—
Of higher glories talk'd,
Till our hearts caught the kindly ray,
And burn'd within us by the way.

Those hours, those walks are past!
We part—and ne'er again may greet;
Why are the joys that will not last
So perishingly sweet?
Farewell! we sweetly meet again,
In life or death;—farewell till then!

GEOLOGY.

Geography and Geology are sister sciences, as both describe the earth. The one tells where mountains and other portions of the earth are; the other tells what they are. The one describes the situation and the other the ingredients or materials, with the order of their arrangement. The one cannot be fully understood without assistance from the other.

Among all the sciences, no one is more simple or easily understood, or better calculated to employ, entertain and instruct children; and few if any, more useful to farmers, mechanics and others, than some of the first elements of "PRACTICAL GEOLOGY." No science probably displays in a more wonderful manner, the power, wisdom, and goodness of the Creator of the Universe.

A large portion of the twenty-five specimens here described, can be found in every part of the world; all, and many more, may be obtained, with a trifling expense and trouble, as a part of a "FAMILY CABINET" for each of the two millions of families in the American republic.

Quartz is the most common and abundant ingredient in mountains, rocks and soils, is the natural deposit of gold and other metals; the necessary and principal ingredient in the manufactory of glass; and, under different forms and colors, is known by the names of jasper, carnelian, calcedony, agate, amethyst, topaz, opal, and other gems. The different kinds of quartz, found in abundance, are called milk quartz, smoky quartz, blue, red and yellow quartz, according to their various colors. Quartz, in all its varieties, is hard, and scratches most other minerals, and, of course, cannot be scratched by them. Gun flint, and the common smooth, hard pebbles found in nearly every part of the globe, are varieties of this common, abundant and useful mineral. It is the only mineral which is found every where.

No. 1. Milk quartz is nearly pure, or free from iron and other substances, which give color to mineral, also to animal and vegetable substances.

No. 2. Smoky quartz, which is colored by iron, is of various shades, and sometimes transparent.

No. 3. Red, or jaspery quartz, has a larger proportion of iron than any other variety. Jasper is a gem, and is beautifully polished.

No. 4. Felspar is intimately and extensively combined with quartz, in the formation of mountains, soils, &c., and is essential in the manufactory of porcelain or China ware. It is scratched by quartz, and breaks more in the form of plates or small tables. It is commonly reddish, and sometimes flesh colored; also nearly white.—When reduced to powder, it is more like clay, and less like sand than quartz when pulverized.

No. 5. Mica, frequently called isinglass, is combined with quartz and felspar in the formation of nearly all the high mountains upon our globe. In some parts of Russia, and other countries, it is used for windows, in the place of glass.

No. 6. Hornblend is less hard, but more tough and difficult to break, than quartz or felspar. It contains a large portion of iron, is of a dark green or black color, and enters largely into rocks, ledges and mountains in various parts of the globe.

No. 7. Granular lime is much used for marble; and is abundant in many parts of the world.

No. 8. Compact lime is of finer texture, and more recent formation, than granular and does not receive as fine a polish. One variety, found in Germany, is used for lithographic printing.

No. 9. Green serpentine is an abundant rock, and sometimes a good material for the walls of houses.

No. 10. Yellow serpentine is interspersed with the green, but not as common, nor as good for buildings. Precious serpentine, which is frequently yellowish red, receives a beautiful polish and is hence used for ornaments of various kinds. Serpentine can be cut with a knife.

Serpentine is the common rock at Hoboken, and is found in long ranges in Pennsylvania, Maryland, Virginia, &c. Serpentine ridges are the deposits of chrome ore.

No. 11. Compact gypsum is a common variety of this rock, which is ground and used by the farmers for manure. When very compact, fine, and translucent, it is called alabaster, which is wrought for ornaments.

No. 12. Selenite, or christalized gypsum breaks in thin plates or leaves, and is frequently as transparent as glass. Gypsum can be scratched by the finger nail.

No. 13. Talc is sometimes called French chalk.—It has a greasy or sopy feel, and and commonly a light color, and is softer than gypsum.

No. 14. Coarse granite is supposed to be the substance formed when God said "Let dry land appear." It is composed of quartz, felspar and mica, the last frequently sufficiently large for windows.

No. 15. Fine granite is a common, valuable material for the walls of houses.—The ingredients are like those in the coarse, except finer.

No. 16. Gneiss is a slate granite. From the position of the mica in gneiss, it is split with ease into large slabs, fit for floors, side-walks, bridges, &c.

Nos. 17 and 18. Mica slate resembles, gneiss, but contains no felspar, being composed of quartz and mica. The surface is frequently undulating, as in No. 23. Beautiful crystals of garnet and staurotide are sometimes deposited in the mica slate in great numbers.

Nos. 19 and 20. Sienite has the same ingredients as granite, except the hornblend takes the place of mica. The most noted quarries of this rock are in Quincy, Mass., which furnished the material for the Bunker Hill Monument, and for houses in great numbers and value in nearly every sea-port in the country.

No. 21. Greenstone is composed of hornbled and felspar intimately combined, and constitutes rocks, ledges and mountains, in various parts of the world. It is green or black, not easily broken, but much used for buildings.

Nos. 22 and 23. Sandstone composed of cemented grains of sand, is much used for building, and is the only material fitted for grindstones. No. 22, is from quarries in the Lyceum Village, Ohio, which furnish the best grit for grindstones, and various other uses.

No. 24. Puddingstone or conglomerate, is composed of cemented pebbles of various sizes and qualities, and is frequently found with sandstone. In many places it is common and abundant, if not the only rock. When the pebbles are not rounded having sharp corners, it is called breccia, like the pillars in the capitol at Washington, D. C.

No. 25. Soapstone is composed of talc and quartz, and is extensively used. It can be readily cut into slabs with a common saw, hewed with an axe, turned in a lathe, smoothed with a plane, and thus wrought into almost any form which its uses may require.

From small beginnings, like the few specimens here described, thousands, and tens of thausands, of large and valuable cabinets have grown, and numerous thorough minerologists and accomplished naturalists have arisen; while those who commence with large and expensive collections seldom acquire any considerable knowledge of the subjects to which they relate. And among the many thousands who have attended full and able lectures on geology and minerology, few, if you can distinguish one mineral from another, except those who have formed cabinets for themselves; while children, in great numbers, in all parts of the country, by the aid of a few specimens, and two or three excursions to collect them, are as familiar with all the common rocks and most of the minerals, as with the articles of table furniture. A teacher once said to his boys, that all who had their lessons at the time mentioned, might go with him on a geological excursion. He afterwards remarked, that several of the boys, for the first time in their lives, got their lessons, and at the time specified. Many thousand similar cases might be named.

These facts, and thousands of others of a similar character, afford sufficient proof, that—whether the practical sciences, the "useful branches," as some are disposed to call them, such as reading, writing, and arithmetic, or the preservation of morals, are concerned—collecting, arranging, studying and describing specimens of geology, and other departments of natural history are among the most useful exercises which teachers and parents provide for their children.

FOR THE CHILDREN.

WHAT DO I OWE MY MOTHER!

'Caroline, I believe you cannot go to school to-day. Little Lucy is not well, and needs all my time and attention, and if you can stay with the baby, and amuse him, it will be a great relief to me.'

Caroline stood quite still while her mother was speaking, but she did not lay aside the shawl and bonnet which hung upon her arm. It was very plain that she did not feel willing to do as she was told.

'Did you say I must stay at home?' she asked.

'No, I did not say must. I said, however, that I should like to have you do so.'

'Oh, mamma, you know how I do love school, and how hard is is to stay away!'

'Yes, my dear child, I know it, and I never wish you to remain at home, unless it is necessary. You may go, if you wish.'

Caroline hesitated a few moments. At first she resolved to lay aside her shawl and her books, and give up pleasently too, a whole day to little Johnny. But several of her school-mates were just passing; they called to her to come out, and she ran to tell them that she was not to go that day.

'Oh, I wouldn't stay at home,' said Jane. 'Your mother won't care if you don't, and we shall care a great deal if you do.'

Again Caroline hesitated; her companions drew her along with them, and in a few minutes they reached the door of the school-room. It was a sad morning for poor Caroline. She could not forget that she had left her poor mother alone, with the care of several children, and conscience again accused her of selfishness and ingratitude. She hastened home the moment school was dismissed. The little babe was crying in its cradle, while Lucy, so sick as to need constant attention, lay upon her mother's lap, disturbed by the cries of the infant, yet trying to soothe and comfort it.

'Now how much good I might have done,' thought Caroline, 'if I had only staid at home! And after all, what did I get by going to school? In the first place, I missed in the lessons which I thought I had learned so well, and then my inkstand must needs come tipping over on my new dress which mamma set up so late to finish last night. Poor mamma! how pale and tired she looks!'

Caroline was now glad to do any thing in her power, The baby was soon quieted, Lucy fell into a gentle slumber, and her mother, pleased with her affectionate endeavors to atone for her folly, smiled tenderly upon her.

Caroline spent the afternoon in amusing little Johnny and rocking Lucy. She felt happier than when she sat at her desk at school in the morning. 'Mamma,' said she, 'I am afraid I am very selfish, and though I feel sorry now, that I was so naughty this morning, I am not sure that I shall not do just so again.'

'There is a story I have been thinking of telling you,' said her mother, 'and as Lucy is asleep, and baby is quiet, I think I can find time for it now.'

'Well, mamma, I hope it will begin with, "Once there was." I like stories that begin so.,

'Ah, well,' said her mother, smiling, 'once there was a little baby lying without food or clothes'——

'What, a real, live baby, mamma?' interrupted Caroline.

'Yes, a real, live baby, just as weak and helpless as any little infant ever was, and therefore in great want of some kind friend, to take care of it.'

'Poor little thing! I dare say that somebody had stolen it from its own mother, and left it there. Well, did any body find it? Was it dressed in nice, soft clothes, and fed?'

'Oh yes; a lady who loved her children and had none in her own family, called this little stranger her daughter, and from that moment never ceased to watch over it with the utmost tenderness. The little one gave its kind friend many a sleepless night, and many a day of weariness and anxiety. When it was sick, it was nursed with unceasing care; when well, it was taught every thing that a little girl should learn.'

'And did she love the good lady who took care of her, and who loved her so much?'

'Oh yes. As she sat upon the carpet among her little toys, she would say, 'Dear mamma! how I do love you! When I grow up I will try to do every thing for you. I will never let you work any." By-and-by she was old enough to go to school, and her mamma would sit alone all day, sometimes making dresses for her little girl, and at others preparing some new pleasure for her. By-and-by there were other children added to the family. They needed a great deal of care. And now it was that their sister might have saved her mamma from a great deal of care and anxiety.—But instead of this, she seemed to feel it a great hardship to rock the cradle, to amuse the baby, or to asisst the little ones in any way.'

'Oh, mamma! how ungrateful! After all that kind lady had done for her!'

'She very often declared that she should like to have some other mother who would be more indulgent.'

'That was very unkind, I think.'

'Sometimes she wished that she was the only child, so that all the little favors which were now distributed among so many, might be hers.'

'Oh, how selfish! I'm sure that if any body had taken me when I was a baby, and fed and clothed and taken care of me, I should think I could never do enough for my mamma. But what was this little girl's name?'

'Caroline.'

'Oh, was it? And what was the name of her mamma. I mean the lady whom she called so?'

'Her name was Hersy.'

'Oh, mamma! Is the story about me? Was I that baby? Have you done all this for me, and have I been so ungrateful?—Whose baby was I then?'

'You were my own dear little baby, Caroline.'

'But mamma, (oh how glad I am that you are really my mother,) I thought all the time you were telling the story, that the baby was left out of doors somewhere, and that made it seem worse. I never thought before, any thing about the gratitude I owe you, mamma. It seemed as if all your love and kindness came as a matter of course. You did not tell half the kind things you have done for me, nor half the naughty words and actions which you have seen in me. Dear, good mother, I mean to try to be better, and if I am tempted to be ungrateful again, I will remember the poor little baby.'

FOR YOUNG MEN.

A WARNING VOICE.—A writer in the Knickerbocker draws, in the subjoined brief sketch, a revolting picture. Yet how many young men are chasing butterflies, things of a day! 'How unaccustomed to the world, to that of the heartless and false doll of dress, whose every word is for effect, and every thought a desire for admiration; who can sacrifice domestic pleasure, and follow fashion and vice—vice of thought—who lives only in crowds and is miserable alone—who loves pleasure supremely takes husband for his carriage and house, and enters matrimony for the liberties it allows her. There are such women; the idlers of the ball-room, the belles of the watering places. They enjoy butterfly celebrity, and then decay early in mind and body, victims to fashion or worse. What thoughts must linger around the bosoms of such women on their dying beds, as they think of their neglected God! Young men know not what they follow, as they glide on in the wake of the syren of the dance. They are the false lights which meteors hold out to draw the tumbling ships upon the rocks. They lure us on with the music and the pattering of tiny feet, and jeweled fingers and false smiles and false hearts; and when the victim is caught, like the vailed prophet, they display their awful hideousness. No, no! Love is found in gentle hearts. It dwells not amid the riots of pleasure; it dies in the glare of splendor, and cannot live in a heart devoted to dress and weak follies; it is more matured in quietness than loud applause, or the world's praise. Give me the sharply defined feelings of a young and timid girl, and I leave you the professions of the gaudy coquette. Give me the beaming glances of a liquid eye, and I yield the bright and flashing blaze of proud beauty to others."

INSTINCT OF ANTS.—In the swampy regions of Xaraes, in La Plata, where the innundation of the Paraguay commences, the ants, which are in vast numbers there, have the sagacity to build their nests on the tops of the trees, far out of the reach of the waters—and these nests are made of a kind of adhesive clay, so hard, that no cement can be more durable, or impervious to the weather.

LYING.—There was a famous problem among the stoics, which ran to this purpose: "When a man says 'I lie,' does he lie or does he not? If he lies, he speaks the truth; if he speaks the truth he lies." Many were the books written upon this wonderful problem; Chrysippus favored the world with no fewer than six, and Philetus studied himself to death in his vain efforts to solve it.

THE AIMLESS.—It is dreadful to live without an aim—to be a wanderer without a purpose—hoping nothing from the future, and not daring to dwell on the past.

Never sign a writing till you read it, nor drink water till you have seen it.

OF
THE CASKET,
AND PHILADELPHIA MONTHLY MAGAZINE.

THE great increase of the subscription list of the Casket, which has been nearly doubled since the commencement of the last volume, warrants the most extensive improvements on the first of July 1840, at which time a new volume will be commenced with increased vigour. Nothing need be said of the firm basis on which the Casket stands, it being already the oldest magazine in the country, and has maintained its popularity in the face of all opposition. It is to be found [illegible] families making literary pretensions from Maine to Georgia.

TYPE—EMBELLISHMENTS.

The Casket is printed with [illegible] and beautiful type, upon the finest white paper. The illustrations are not surpassed by those of any periodical at home or abroad [illegible] engravings, a quarterly plate [illegible] lately been added. The style [illegible]

The volume [illegible] with the first of [illegible] splendid mezzotint engraving [illegible] for the work by the [illegible] stands as the best [illegible] of the art in the United States.

LITERARY CHARACTER.

The Literary character of the Casket is well known. It is wholly original, of the highest order, and sustained by writers of the first rank. Essays, Tales, Sketches and Travels, compose its prominent prose articles; while the poetry is equalled by that of no other magazine of [illegible]. The variety for which the Casket is celebrated shall suffer no diminution; but on the contrary every exertion shall be made to increase its interest.

Several Romances of the Revolution have already appeared, and others shall follow in the course of the volume, [illegible] of the manners, [illegible] of the great battles of that time. [illegible] true delineation of human nature in every variety of passion.

The series of [illegible] entitled Cruizing in the Last War, and which are rated by the contemporary press, equal to the celebrated sketches from 'Tom Cringle's Log,' will be continued and the 'Leaves from a Lawyer's Port Folio,' which have attained a deserved celebrity, will still furnish attraction to the Magazine.

We [illegible] the readers of the Casket with some valuable papers [illegible] number. We [illegible] graceful pen to do much in maintaining the great popularity of the Magazine. In addition to the variety already embraced in the pages of the Magazine, our Syrian Letter [illegible] appears in the June number as introductory, will interest and add worth to its pages. They are from no unpractised pen.

FASHIONS.

The Fashions are published in the Casket quarterly, or as often as any really new style arrives from Paris. The engravings are colored and executed from original designs. No old, worn out plates are retouched and then published as the latest fashions.—The truth of our designs may be tested by comparing them with the latest description of dresses from London and Paris. They are universally admitted to be the finest specimen of engraving and coloring afforded by any Magazine in the country.

The expense of getting them up is great, but we shall in no wise abate the quality [illegible].—The readers of the Casket are furnished with these fashion plates as an extra. They do not interfere with the regular and choice engravings which always accompany the work.

TIME OF PUBLICATION.

The Casket is published on the first of the month in every quarter of the Union. The most distant subscribers consequently receive it as early as well as those who reside in Philadelphia [illegible] principal [illegible] agents have [illegible] means subscribers in [illegible] receive their copies free of postage.

TERMS.—Three Dollars per annum, or Two Copies yearly for Five Dollars, in advance, in all cases, post paid. No new subscriber received without the money, or the name of a responsible agent.

Editors who may copy this prospectus, and will send a copy, marked [illegible] Saturday Evening Post, [illegible] newspapers [illegible] week. To [illegible] has a copy of the paper marked [illegible] that no mistake or delay may [illegible].—Editors are served with the Magazine in the [illegible] the advertisement is inserted. We [illegible] many inserted the advertisement at the close of the last volume, and expected all the back numbers.—This of course we could not be expected to grant.

REFLECTIONS IN A CHURCH-YARD.

BY GEO. BABCOCK CLARKE.

Destroyer, here the subjects of thy power,
In silence hush'd, far from life's tumults, sleep.
Nature was chill'd in the imbittered hour;
When mourners, trembling, pale, were doomed to weep!
I trace thy work, O Death, by many a heap,
Where dust is blending with inhumed clay;—
And inspirations, as devotion deep,
I feel, while coursing here my lonely way,
And hear in solemn echos, a responsive lay.

No larums rouse the unconscious slumbering dead!
The thunderbolts, driven fiercely from the sky,
Which thrill to living hearts in sudden dread;—
Pass, as the wrath of elements, unheeded by.
Oh! could ye hear the fragrant zephyr sigh!
Or see the tears by friendship shed alone!
Would not your guardian spirits hover nigh,
To quicken memory at her funeral stone,
Nor suffer these, once lovely forms, to waste unknown!

I read your names,—all strangers,—none to tell
Where Virtue, Genius, Beauty, found a grave;—
How ye endured earth's sorrows—how ye fell,
Or what the spirit sought o'er Lethe's wave.
All yield to Death, whose power can enslave,—
Can fetter tongues,—unloose th' immortal mind,
Which soars away to HIM who being gave,
Leaving the form, inanimate, behind, [assigned.
Where heaves the mound, each to its narrow bed

Oh hallowed rest!—fraught with the dreams of bliss
Repleto with wonders,—those shall life regain;
And dwell, perhaps, in brighter worlds than this,—
No more to feel the sting of mortal pain!
Yes, "in the skies the blest shall ever reign,"
Crowned with garlands of unfading bloom!
Even life's last enemy shall yet be slain,
Immured in darkness and infernal gloom,—
While hymns of praise resound for Victory o'er the tomb!

BROOKFIELD, N. Y.

RELIGIOUS.

"WHAT IS MAN?"

A question of capacious import, and worthy of the careful and protracted consideration of every individual of the species. It may be contemplated in a variety of aspects and relations, upon which we cannot at once, enter. There are two grand absorbing positions, in which he is presented by the Psalmist, in most affecting contrast: "thou madest him a little lower than the angels, and didst crown him with glory and honor. Man in honor abideth not; he is like the beasts that perish."

Here is brought to view the glorious destiny for which man was created; his authority on earth, as lord of the lower creation, and his immortality—a creature, indeed, but a creature who would not have tasted death, if he had not debased his nature, and polluted his moral by sin. But man abode not in honor. He sunk from elevation on which he was originally placed, became subject to death, like the beasts that perish.

It was a gloomy thought that the human frame, with its erect posture, symmetrical proportions, elastic and dexterous motions, curious wrought organs and fair complexions, should all be dissolved and mingle with the dust of the earth. But gloomy as it was, it was nothing compared with the darkness and dread which shrouded the prospects of his conscious spirit, his moral and intelligent nature, till the gospel dispelled the darkness, and eventually brought life and immortality clearly to light.

Through the mercy of God, and by the intervention of Jesus Christ, man may recover his lost dignity; yes, more than recover it. He was first made a little lower than the angels; he may now become "like the angels of God in Heaven." Provision is made in the gospel for a new life, a resurrection, not of the body only at the great day, but of the soul from its death of trespasses and sins. Christ by his atoning death, has delivered us from the curse of the law, and removed every impediment, arising from the veracity and justice of God, to our justification, and procured the mission of the Holy Spirit, to take away the obstacles which exist on our part, and make us his willing people.

And yet with the proffer of immortal honors before them—of a dignity beyond that of the greatest earthly potentate; of a happiness incomparably greater than the heart of man has yet conceived, the greatest mass of our race, and even of the inhabitants of Christian lands, cleave to the sordid and short-lived pleasures of sense, and aspire after the honors of a day; and no appeals from a fellow-man can alone induce them to change their course.

In view of the disclosures of the Gospel and of the treatment they receive from men, a writer a full century ago, exclaimed,—

"O blessed Revelation! that opens such wonders. O dreadful Revelation! if it opens them in vain. And are there those for whom they go for nought? Strange men! in possession of a blessing, the bare hopes of which supported the spirits of the wise, for four thousand years, under all the calamities of life, and terrors of death, and know they not that it is in their hands? Or knowing, cast it away, as of no value? A blessing, the very shadow of which made the body of the Patriarchal and Jewish religion! A blessing, after which the whole earth panted, as the hart for the water-brooks! A blessing on which the heavenly host were sent to congratulate mankind and bring the glad tidings into their transported hearts! A blessing, which was more than an equivalent for Paradise lost! and is this blessing declined, rejected, exploded, despised, ridiculed? O unhappy men!—The frailty of man is almost as incomprehensible as the mercies of God.

"And who will say, that he who declines, or falls from the noble and elevating object of contemplation above mentioned, and the glorious hope it inspires, into the barren field of amusement, and trifle; or into the bestial abyss of a few years' debauch, for his portion—who will dare affirm, that such a wretch differs not as much as reason and happiness, from the true Christian, as a quadruped differs, in form from a man? It is not form, but manners, which make humanity. The mould in which we are cast, only says what we should be; nothing but our conduct tells us what we are. What wretches are they who contradict their figure, and accuse nature of having set a wrong stamp on their lying clay? The most despicable and deplorable being under heaven, is a Pagan in a Christian land. He is like a rank growth of poison in Paradise. He confines that thought,—which should set out at the creation, and travel down with wonder and adoration, at every step, through the countless mercies and miracles of God for man, into nature's final dissolution, and then launch for a never ending voyage in a blessed eternity,—to the nothing of three score years, and the wretched means of annihilating that nothing, contracting that span. Lust exhausts; luxury overwhelms, and by heaping on fuel, quite puts out the fire."—Christian Mirror.

CHRISTIAN ENIGMA.

There is a small number of people scattered here and there in the world, of whom authentic history gives the following description.

They partake of flesh and blood, in common with the rest of mankind, and yet are not of this world, but are born from above.

Their members are mortified; yea, their bodies are dead, yet full of life, activity and vigor.

Their life is supported by seeing an object which is invisible, and which no man can see and live.

They walk not by sight, but still they walk in the light, and see whither they go.

There is in them more carefulness than in other people, and yet they are careful for nothing, and cast all their cares upon another.

Though they take no thought for to-morrow, yet they constantly look forward, and diligently provide for time to come.

While they cross and deny themselves, they invariably pursue their own pleasure and interest.

Their conversation is without covetousness, and yet they covet earnestly the best things.

They are content with such things as they have, and still ardently reach after some things which they have not.

They are so poor that they have nothing, and so rich that they have all things.

Though they are not their own, they are free men; though servants to all men, they are free from all, and under bondage to none.

They love their relatives, friends, and neighbors, yea, all men as themselves, and yet hate father and mother, brethren and sisters, wives and children.

Though they are subject to rulers, obey parents, and honor all men, yet they call no man father, or their master on earth, and will not be the servants of men.

They delight to be often alone, and when they are alone they are in the best company, and enjoy the sweetest communion.

Though they have put away all bitterness, anger and malice, there is in them for this reason the more indignation, the more revenge.

They bear all things, but fight daily; follow peace with all men, but contend earnestly, are engaged in a continual warfare.

They are without strength, but can do all things, and they are then strongest when weakest.

This seems perhaps a strange character, but it is a real one, and it is much to be wished it was more common. When it is general the world will be happy.

PREPARATION FOR HEARING THE GOSPEL.

1. Cultivate day by day a simplicity of heart and humility, and proper regard for the word of God.

2. Compose your mind on the evening before the Sabbath, for the solemn exercises of that holy day.

3. On Sabbath morning rise early. Let secret prayer and meditation be your first exercise.

4. Keep in a still and uniform frame all the Sabbath. Read little except the Bible: relish and digest what you read. But,

5. Take care that this is all done in a sweet and easy way; make no toil or task out of the service of God. Do all freely and cheerfully, without violent effort.

6. Keep your heart with all diligence, as you go to the house of God; look not hither and thither unnecessarily, lest your mind be distracted, and your devotion lost. Much less look about in the sanctuary, for this is a mark of disregard.

7. Ask, either at home, or in the sanctuary, for God's blessing upon yourself, the preacher, and all the hearers.

8. When you retire after service, remember your obligations to God for having heard his Word, and your responsibility for its improvement. Remember the perishing heathen, and ask that the gospel may speedily be preached unto every creature.

9. During the Sabbath, refrain from remarks of any kind on the preaching; and from censorious remarks refrain always, except when and where duty may call them.

10. Digest what you hear, and do it, which will be the best preparation for the next Sabbath, if you should live to see it.

Thus shall your Sabbaths fit you for an everlasting rest in heaven; and the manna on which you feed in the wilderness of this world shall sustain you, until you are permitted to eat of the tree of life, which is in the midst of "the paradise of God;" which may God, in his infinite mercy grant, thro' Jesus Christ our Lord, to whom be the glory in the Church for ever. Amen.—Schauffler's Sermons.

A NEGLECTED DUTY.

"Have you a flourishing Sabbath School? enquired a traveler of an officer of the church.

Why, no I cannot say that we have, " he replied; " it does not flourish as it ought."

What is the reason," asked the other,—Why has not your school prospered while others have been so much blessed?

I am sure I cannot tell, unless it is because the superintendent, or the teachers, are not faithful to their trust; perhaps they do not evince much interest in the eternal welfare of their pupils and consequently the children are not much benefited by their instructions.

You say, "perhaps,"—do you not know, do you not visit the school and see for yourself, whether the teachers do their duty, and whether all things are conducted properly?

"Why, no! I cannot say that I do; I have so much to do, to take care of my family at home, and to see that every thing is right there, that I do not get time to attend to the Sabbath school, and if I did, I do not see how it could do any good, for I am not qualified to teach; my own boys know almost as much about the Scriptures as I do myself."

"I presume that your neighbors think and act pretty much as you do," said the traveler, "and consequently the school is left to take care of itself. If it should be entirely discontinued, you would know it only by your children remaining at home.

Now, my dear sir, it is no wonder that your school does not flourish, and your children are not converted to God, for you cannot expect strangers to be more faithful to their souls than you are yourselves; the wonder rather is, that your school is kept together at all, that it has not long since become defunct. And I take leave of you with this assurance, that you need never expect God will pour out his blessings extensively upon your Sabbath school, as long as you and your fellow Christians do not more fully sustain it by your presence, your prayers, and your influence."

The traveler went on his way, and the good man profited by the instruction that he had received. The year rolled around and brought again the faithful traveler.—The officer met him with a joyful countenance and a hearty shake of the hand.—"You are right," said he: "we were to blame and not the teachers of the Sabbath schools that our children were not profited by instruction.—*S. FOR MOTHERS.

From the Advocate of Moral Reform.

APPEAL TO MOTHERS.

Christian mothers, our expectation for the future, under God, is from you. The deep fountains of feeling have been unsealed in your hearts by an Almighty hand, and the tender charities and sweet endearments of domestic life, constitute your world. Say—do you never tremble lest the clasping arms of your infant should be untwined from your neck by death, and the lent treasure recalled by Him who gave it? When the dear group gather round your knee to receive instruction, or to mingle their breath with yours in prayer, does no vacant place remind you of a beloved form now gone forever from your sight? Ah, yes; you are mourning over the grave of one who was a cherished part of yourself, and whose early removal has made your heart-strings bleed. But, sorrowing mother, what is your affliction compared with her's whose son or daughter, once as fondly loved and cherished as your own, has gone down alive into the pit, covered with infamy, and destined to inhabit the blackness of darkness forever? Ask that mother, as she weeps alone and refuses to be comforted, what would have been her feelings had the "living lost," died when an infant in her arms, compared to the anguish that is now consuming her vitals. Ah, this is sorrow that admits of no earthly alleviation; but with all its bitterness it is the lot of thousands, and it may be yours. No human skill or foresight can ensure your escape; no rank or condition in life shield you from danger; nothing but obedience to the plain command of God. One only way of safety is marked out for you to tread, and that a narrow one; all others lead astray. We entreat you for the children's sake of your own body, not to turn away from the consideration of this subject. By all you have borne and felt for them—by the tears you have shed, and the prayers you have offered, when none but God could hear, we ask you to examine the claims which the cause of moral purity has on you as Christian mothers. Your's is a charge compared with which the weight of empires sinks into insignificance. How can you render up your account with joy, if you have done all in your power to preserve from the contamiuation of vice, the immortals committed to your keeping?

But great as are your maternal responsibilities, you have others to sustain as members of society, which you can in no wise shake off. How have these been met!—The cry of the friendless orphans who have gone down to a shameful death in our midst; of the homeless and destitute who have been given, by Christian neglect and indifference, a prey to the devourer, has come up into the ears of the Lord God of Sabaoth, and the day of inquisition for blood is already appointed. Are you sure that your garments will be clean? Has your interest in the temporal and spiritual welfare of your domestics, and your influence over them, been such as you are willing to meet at the tribunal of Jehovah? Has no apathy or open contempt on your part led some that might have been saved by the efforts of the friends of moral reform, to think lightly of these efforts? Have you done what you could in this sacred cause, or has your influence been thrown into the scale of its avowed enemies? These are questions which must be met and perfectly considered, at another day, if not now. Remember the admonition once addressed to a woman under circumstances scarcely more solemn than our own—"If thou altogether holdest thy peace at this time, then shall their enlargement and deliverance arise from another place, but thou and thy father's house shall be destroyed."

Where, Christian mother, will you find a cause that appeals more directly to the best and purest sympathies of woman's heart, than the one we advocate? We plead for all that renders home attractive, or life desirable—for all that is lovely and of good report in this world, or precious in our expectations of another. We seek to guard that virtue which is inappreciably dear to God and man; without which existence is a burden, and death endless despair. We are endeavoring to remove an evil which robs god of his glory, and every year sends thousands of souls, for whom Christ died, down to the dark chambers of perdition.—Will you not join us? Do not listen to worldly opinions and influences, for they are perverted and wrong, but act in this case solely with reference to the great day of judgment. To you as an [illegible] in the presence of God, we put the question—how will you wish to have felt and acted when you stand before the Savior, and the millions of the lost—lost through Christian indifference and neglect, are sent away to everlasting punishment. If you would meet that day in peace; if you would hear the thrilling sentence, "come ye blessed," or escape the terrible sound, "depart ye cursed," we entreat you to look at this subject aside from the coloring which prejudice and false delicacy have thrown over it, as a matter in which you are personally and deeply interested. Do not seek to shelter yourself under the plea of limited influence or inferior abilities. Use the one talent you possess; throw all your influence, your [illegible] prayers and your alms into the scale of [illegible] right, and leave the result calmly with God. The wheels of his Providence are moving onward; if you are in the way of their progress you may be crushed, but cannot retard their majestic movement for an instant. Grant us, then, beloved in the Lord, as children of one common Father, as sisters in one blessed faith, a patient hearing, and until you have examined, refuse not to come up to the help of the Lord against the mighty.

FOR THE MINISTER.

PASTORAL VISITS.

Mr. Jones was the pastor of a church in a small country village. One pleasant morning he set off, as was his custom, to visit the families of his charge. He first entered the house of a humble family, the mother of which was a member of his church; but the father was an irreligious man, and but seldom seen at public worship. He conversed a few minutes with this pious mother, when her husband entered, and with the well meaning air of a very blunt man, addressed him thus:

"Good morning, sir; happy to see you. I had the pleasure of hearing you preach yesterday afternoon, sir."

"Yes! I observed that you were at church, and was pleased to see it."

"Well, Mr. Jones, I'm a plain man, and you must excuse me if I am somewhat plain in my way of talking. If you always preached as you did yesterday, I should go to meeting oftener. You preached without notes yesterday, and that is what I call preaching. When a man goes into his pulpit and reads off his sermon, why, I may just as well stay at home and read a sermon out of a book."

"I think, myself," said Mr. Jones, "that preaching extempore is on many accounts preferable to reading written sermons, but still extemporaneous preaching will not suit all. I should be perfectly willing to preach without notes all the time, if I thought it would be equally profitable to all my people."

"Well," said the man laughing, "If you will let me know when you are going to preach without notes, I will always come and hear you. But it is against my religion to go and hear men read, instead of preaching." After a little further conversation, Mr. Jones bade them good morning, and continued his walk.

The next door he knocked at, was that of a lawyer, whose manners and conduct were such as to show very distinctly that he had a most profound respect for himself.

"Good morning, Mr. Jones," said this respectful gentleman, in slow and courteous accents; "I am happy to see you this morning, and have an opportunity of telling you how much we were gratified with your forenoon sermon yesterday," [illegible] special emphasis on the word [illegible]—"That is the kind of preaching which [illegible] vates the people; it improves their minds; it cultivates their taste. A discourse well digested and carefully written, is substantial food for the mind. I think if clergymen have not time to write our two sermons a week, they had better exchange a little more frequently, so that they will never be under the necessity of preaching extempore."

Mr. Jones was a man of acute sensibilities. He felt such remarks, but under the tuition of his blessed Master he had learnt self-control. He was sufficiently acquainted with human nature to know the folly of arguing with such a man, and therefore he quietly waived the subject, and after a little further conversation, he bade the family good morning, and [illegible]

"How do you do, Mr. Jones," [illegible]

[illegible] I have [illegible] doctrinal sermons [illegible] your modern preachers are [illegible] of the way [illegible] marrow of the gospel [illegible] preaching that we want [illegible] public mind. Now, I have lived [illegible] years, Mr. Jones, and have seen the effects of all kinds of preaching, and you may depend upon it, that the great thing needed is, to have men well [illegible]. I think it would be a great improvement if you would preach doctrinal sermons rather more. Shall I not lend you this treatise, sir? perhaps you would like to look it over."

Mr. Jones smiled at the delicate hint which his good deacon supposed he was giving, and taking the book, endeavored to lead the conversation to subjects of practical godliness; and after uniting with his venerable deacon in prayer, continued his parochial visits.

He walked home to his study, discouraged rather than animated by his morning walk. Hardly had he entered, when a parishioner called who had been for some weeks absent from town. "I have come," said he, "to tell you the good news from Harlow. Oh, they have a most precious minister there. He is the most faithful, active man I ever saw. He is all the time visiting from house to house. It appears to me that such activity and zeal as he possesses, must be successful anywhere.—People cannot be unconcerned, when the importance of religion is urged so incessantly upon them in their houses."

As Mr. Jones did not consider it necessary to enter upon a defence of his views of duty, his good parishioner supposed that he had been rather too obscure in his hints, and was growing more personal in his allusions, when he was interrupted by the entrance of another visiter.

Mr. Henry, who last entered, was a gentleman of sincere piety, and a refined mind. He was fond of close reasoning, and shrunk from every thing that was not perfectly in good taste. After the usual salutations, he said, "I had the pleasure, Mr. Jones, of hearing Dr. Simpkins preach last Sabbath. He certainly is a most eloquent man. He is a most indefatigable student. You always find him in his study. I understand that he generally studies twelve hours a day. And now he has risen to be one of the most eminent men in the country. How wretchedly those ministers mistake, who fritter away their time by running about from house to house.—There is the minister of Harlow, for instance; they say he is a very friendly man, and talks very pleasantly in the family, but [illegible] no matter what text he takes, he always preaches the same sermon. The [illegible] who live in the study, and will devote their energies to the pulpit, are the men who do the most good."

Now Mr. Jones, though he loved his study, [illegible] it his duty to devote a portion of his time to parochial visiting; and as the two visitors [illegible] eagerly engaged in dispute, he pleasantly suggested to them the propriety of selecting some other time and place for the discussion.

[illegible] withdrew, Mr. Jones resolved, as he had done a thousand times before, that he would do that which appeared to [illegible] right in the sight of God, and [illegible] spiritual good of his people, [illegible] others to think and say what they [illegible]

FOR THE TRAVELER.

From the New York Observer.

"NO ROOM IN THE INN."

[illegible] pious traveler called to spend the [illegible] "Ah!" [illegible] Jesus was born, [illegible] because there [illegible] and I have been [illegible] years, and have [illegible] in the Inn." [illegible] distressed woman [illegible] complied with [illegible] knew that [illegible] prayer; that [illegible] Savior must be in the [illegible] the Inn, [illegible] to have family [illegible]

[illegible] It is delightful [illegible] to find in a public [illegible] strewed with religious [illegible] newspapers, showing [illegible] has made provision at [illegible] comfort of his pilgrims. [illegible] on retiring to your chamber [illegible] there, your companion [illegible] It is sweet to lie down [illegible] that the "angel of [illegible] about them that [illegible] that he will guard that [illegible] children sleep. And [illegible] that there are few [illegible] the voice of prayer is heard; [illegible] is a guest; where religion [illegible] and the pious traveler feels [illegible] his home. Such Inns are usually to be known before you enter by some sign that assures the traveler there is no spirit there, but the spirit of quietness, and order, and love. In a word, the sign of Temperance generally marks the Inn where there is room for Christ. I say generally, for I trust there are some cases where religion finds a shelter, from which intoxicating drinks have not yet been excluded. Indeed I know a landlord who, after shutting up, and before he quits his bar at night, prays so loud that all his neighbors know that selling spirits does not hinder him from prayer. But such praying men are rare; and when they are to be met with, the neighbors seem to have an uncharitable suspicion that their prayers are made for a pretence, and only serve to keep a little quiet a very troublesome monitor within. And with only here and there an instance of a praying landlord, it is too true that Christ Jesus finds the Inns in this country, as full when he seeks admission, as they were in Bethlehem of Judea.

It is a common thing for travelers on entering a public house, to look over the register of guests to see if any of their friends are there. It would be well to make an early inquiry if the Savior ever "turns aside to tarry for a night" in that place. Perhaps you might introduce him. When Dr. Payson was at the Springs, he called together the guests at the hotel where he lodged, and his delicate but faithful counsel, his solemn and fervent prayers, are felt to this hour by some who listened to them, though he has long since gone his "Father's house, where there are many mansions." There was room for Christ at that Inn. When he has once taken up his abode, all that offends him will quietly retire, and he soon finds himself surrounded by those only who would rather lie in a manger with Jesus, than in a bed of down without him. GOLDEN LEGENDS.

RECIPROCAL EQUITY.—The divine commandments although very concisely expressed, have had a most extensive meaning.—For example, take the eighth law of the decalogue; "Thou shalt not steal." That prohibition includes all injustice and wrong; every thing contrary to the law of humanity, reason and religion which affects the rights and property of another person.—Hence, many who are shocked at the idea of robbery, are intimate with the offence, and guilty of the crime which they avowedly abhor.

Let us apply the touch-stone of sincerity to our own hearts. Who attends without a monitor to the whispers of equity? Who is an advocate with himself, for every one who has a claim upon him? Who can be opposed by his inferiors, and feel no resentment? Where is the man who finds no inducement to do wrong, when he possesses the power to execute it? Whoever he be he is a master in the duties of social intercourse. Reason demands no additional sacrifice—and even religion pronounces him perfect in the second great commandment.

But rich men violate this law of love, when they withhold the right of the poor, or refuse to comply with the most equitable obligations.

When judges and lawyers pervert, refuse and delay justice, or load the obtaining of it with intolerable expense or insurmountable difficulties, they transgress the eighth commandment, and their injustice is of the very worst species, as it is a treacherous breach of trust—a robbery committed by a guardian!

When we abuse our superiority of whatever species or degree, and make our relative greatness to support us in doing wrong, we commit the double offense of dishonesty and oppression—and if we take advantage of a person's distress and necessities, we swell the wickedness, for we add cruelty to other iniquities.

A man is guilty of barbarous injustice when he designs by his acts, not to secure his own rights, but to ruin his debtor—and is ranked with the most mischievous oppressors, unless, an injury from avarice is less than misery inflicted through revenge. Remember the parable, Matthew xviii. 23—25.—Ogden.

INTERNAL ENEMIES.—If there were no enemy in the world, nor any devil in hell, we carry that foe within us, which if let loose, would trouble us more than all the world beside. 'Who shall deliver me from the body of this death?'—Sibs.

ALL IS VANITY.—Riches and abundance of the earth, load more than fill; and men's wealth only heightens their wants. The wealthy man oftener wants a stomach and rest, than the poor wants meat and a bed.—Fleming.

PRAYER AND SIN.—He who prays as he ought, will endeavor to live as he prays. Proverbs xv. 8. He who can live in sin, and abide in the ordinary duties of prayer, never prays as he ought. A truly gracious praying frame is utterly inconsistent with the love and reserve of any sin. 'If I regard iniquity in my heart, the Lord will not hear me.'—Owen.

WISDOM.—He is wise enough who hath learned the gospel. He is altogether out of his senses who seeks saving knowledge any where else—for in the word of Christ are all treasures.—Davenant.

THE MORALITY OF THE BIBLE.

It were no over bold opinion, that if the Bible were not the word of God, and could be proved to be not the word of God, it wo'd nevertheless be the most precious of books, and do immeasurably more for a land than the finest productions of literature and philosophy. We always recur with great delight to the testimony of a Deist, who, after publicly laboring to disprove Christianity, and to bring the scriptures into contempt as a forgery, was found instructing his child from the pages of the New Testament. When taxed with the flagrant inconsistency, his only reply was, that it was necessary to teach the child morality, and that nowhere was there to be found any such morality as in the Bible. We thank the Deist for his confession. Whatever our scorn of a man who could be guilty of so foul a dishonesty, seeking to sweep from the earth a volume to which, all the while, himself recurred for the principles of education, we thank him for his testimony, that the morality of Scripture is a morality not elsewhere to be found; so that, if there were no Bible, there would be comparatively no source of instruction in duties and virtues, whose neglect and decline would dislocate the happiness of human society. The Deist was right. Deny or disprove the divine origin of Scripture, and nevertheless you must keep the volume as a kind of text book of morality, if indeed, you would not wish the banishment from our homes of all that is lovely and sacred, and the breaking up, through the lawlessness of ungoverned passions, of the quiet and beauty which are yet round our families.—Rev. H. Melville.

As ye have therefore received Christ Jesus the Lord, so walk ye in him.—Col. ii. 6.

To be a professor and not a possessor; to have the form of godliness, and be destitute of the power, is to be a sounding brass, or a tinkling cymbal; nominally alive, but really dead. In a word, to be a Christian merely in name, is to be no Christian. If you have been made a partaker of the grace of God, though in ever so small a measure or degree, you will not rest satisfied until you can clearly discover that you possess Christ in your heart by faith. What comes from God, will lead to God. If you have the witness within yourself; if you are assured that Christ is formed within you the hope of glory, be careful that in your walk and conversation you wound not his cause and interest. Manifest unto the world that you are his true disciple; and though you have many enemies to encounter, yet remember he hath provided you sufficient armor, and hath declared his grace to be sufficient for you.—Be sober, be vigilant, fight manfully, and endure hardness as a good soldier of Jesus Christ. Apply to his fulness for all you stand in need of; he hath promised to give grace and glory, and to withhold no good thing from such as walk uprightly.

FOR THE CHILDREN.

From the Christian Intelligencer.

THE CHILD'S VERSE.

"I love those that love me, and those that seek me early shall find me."—Proverbs viii. 17.

What a delightful thought! God loves me! Yes; He so loved me as to give his only son Jesus Christ to die for me. It is that same Christ who loves me. The great, all-wise, every where present God, loves me! Loves me, a sinner—He first loved me. Loves me a little child. 'Suffer,' he says, 'little children to come unto me, and forbid them not.' Oh the mercy and goodness of such a God.

And then He says again, "Those that seek me early shall find me." That shall is a precious word. Not may, not perhaps will—but shall find me, How encouraging to seek after God! No fear of disappointment, no hindrance that I may not overcome. Shall find me! precious promise.

But there is a condition. I must seek him early. Before any thing else. While I am young. Perhaps as David and Samuel sought him when they were young.—And as others, who have lived while I have lived. Such as I have read of in the Sunday School Library.

Oh that I may have help from Him, to seek him! To seek Him aright. To seek Him with all my heart. I will seek Him,—in his holy word, in prayer; at his house, among his people.

Oh precious promise holy word!
That leads me now to seek my Lord.
Give me dear Lord thy saving grace,
That I may truly seek thy face.

THE SABBATH SCHOOL BOY ABOUT TO DIE.—The beloved superintendant of his Sabbath school wept freely as he kissed the dying boy. 'Do not cry,' he earnestly said, 'I am agoing to heaven. I cannot cry, because I want to die.' Seeing his sister weep, while his father was talking to her, he said, 'Father, don't make Libby cry, for I am agoing to Jesus.' Once on awaking from sleep, he said, 'Lord Jesus, receive my spirit.' His Father read and explained to him the Psalm beginning, 'The Lord is my Shepherd.' He listened with great interest and said, 'How true it is!'—Then, after a moment's silence, he exclaimed, 'How happy I am, father! I want to go now;' and then, raising his emaciated little arms, and extending them upward to the utmost of his power, he exclaimed, 'Come, Lord, come now, and receive my spirit!'

THE ARMS OF A FATHER.—But the night came—his last night this side eternal and glorious day. During the evening, he asked to have his bed made once more before he died, and once more, (ah! only once!) to lie in his father's arms. These had often been his refuge or his rest, not only in the days of nestling infancy, but in later years; and especially during the last seven or eight days of his life. While thus reposing his worn-out body—for the last time—he told his father in trembling accents, that in Christ's arms he next should lie. He now failed fast, but his mind seemed more than usually clear and matured. Boyhood seemed to have given place to manhood—the manhood of a serene and ripened Christian. At length the physical powers became almost unable to act as the instrument of the mind. The soul seemed to retire within itself to its own inner temple—as if to gather energy for the new song to which, ere the morrow's sun arose, it would be introduced. His voice became faint, and his accents incoherent. Pain had left him, for his end was to be peace. Half an hour before his death, he ceased to move. He seemed like a child asleep on the bosom of its mother. No distortion of face—no shivering of the limbs—no rattling of the throat, were upon him. He was walking down the valley with Jesus, upheld and strengthened by him. A soft, and even melodious moan, like the moan of a bright beaming infant, fell upon the silence of the room in which he met his victory—he gasped, slightly gasped, and awoke with angels and with God.

SABBATH SCHOOL CHILDREN AND THE VIRGIN MARY.—At the girls' school a Roman Catholic priest called lately with two ladies collecting for the poor. On learning that the school was evangelical, the priest began to question the children. "I hope you say your prayers, my dear children." 'We love to pray,' was the reply by a little girl ten years old. 'And do you frequently pray to the Holy Virgin?' 'Never sir.' 'But why not pray to the Holy Virgin?' 'Scripture teaches us that we must pray to God only, and not to his creatures that have no power.' 'What, the Holy Virgin have no power, and yet she is the mother of God!' 'We learn from the Bible, the blessed Virgin Mary was the mother of our Lord Jesus Christ in his human nature, (according to the flesh) but God can have no mother, he is the Creator of all." These simple and scriptural replies so baffled the priest that he left the room without bidding farewell to any one.

IDLE MINISTERS.

The minister of the gospel should be, of all men, the most industrious. His sacred calling—his solemn charge, and fearful responsibilities require it. If the attainment of necessary food and clothing, riches, honor, power, require industry, the salvation of souls does more. If any earthly motive can prompt to activity—if any fancied good can awaken dormant energies—immortal interests, a crown of righteousness and the joys of heaven will do it. A soldier that will lie at ease in the camp, or riot in luxury and mirth while an enemy is invading, is a soldier for pay and not for his country. A servant that will be idle, or neglectful of his employer's interests, shows the emptiness of his heart.

The minister that is slothful and inefficient has mistaken his calling, or misunderstands its nature. The Savior was not indolent when in the world. His disciples who learnt of him, and were commissioned to declare the gospel of the kingdom, were indefatigable in their labors. Those who enter the ministry now, have no less cause for devotedness. The commands of the Savior are as binding—souls are as valuable—the truths of the gospel are as precious; and if ministers are not as faithful and efficient, it is either because they have mistaken their sphere of action, or are ignorant of the responsibilities of the ministry of reconciliation.

God has ordained through the foolishness of preaching to save those that believe; consequently the destinies of immortal souls may rest with ministers. How happy must they be in the judgment day to find that souls have been saved through their instrumentality! On the other hand, how must the indolent minister feel when he sees souls cast away that he might instrumentally have saved!

Christ when on earth did not call to the labor the self-important and indolent; but he called and commissioned the humble and active, and such as counted not their lives dear unto them. He sent forth such as could bear reproach, and famine, persecution, nakedness and the sword. Such his service requires now. They were not proud of being ministers of Christ; but they could rejoice when called to suffer for his sake. Christ's true ministers now are not rendered self-important and proud because they are inducted into this sacred office. They are not rendered indolent because the laborer is declared to be worthy of his hire. Paul refused not to work with his hands, though he gave himself entirely to Christ. Christ's ministers now are not idle and at ease, while, perhaps, their wives or others are toiling early and late assiduously for their support.

The minister of Jesus has arduous and incessant labor before him, to feed and watch the flock, and persuade sinners to be reconciled to God; to wrestle with God in secret; to search out and understand the truths of the Bible; and to devise ways by which he may be successful in presenting the truth to the consciences of sinners.—He has no hours which he may spend idly. He should be diligent, and always exercise himself so as most effectually to promote the Redeemer's kingdom.

CATHOLIC EDUCATION.

The Catholics in New-York city are much engaged to obtain a portion of the Common School Fund. This we cannot regret. Ignorance is one of the strongest bulwarks of error and crime. Until it is expelled, we may expect that multitudes will be led by designing men. Long enough has ecclesiastical tyranny enslaved its thousands in the Catholic Church. It is time for the universal diffusion of knowledge among them, and we could heartily rejoice in seeing the ignorant Catholic instructed and freed from that superstitious reverence of "Fathers," "Priests," "Crosses," &c. which forbids him to investigate and decide between moral right & wrong. Let Catholics and Catholic children be educated, and we never need fear papal supremacy and power.

In proportion to the extent of correct knowledge, will superstition flee away.—In proportion as men investigate natural sciences they will be led to admire and adore the "First Great Cause."

A system of error and oppression can be best sustained by withholding information, and binding down the mind in its native ignorance. Catholics have told us that a worse thing could not be for the church, than for laymen to have the Bible to read, and be allowed to form their opinions of the doctrines and duties of religion therefrom. 'Tis true that nothing will do so much towards destroying a corrupt church. But we have yet to learn that a correct knowledge of the scripture has been a detriment to the cause of Christ.

We say, let the Catholics be educated.—Let them be taught to think and act for themselves. Let them understand the natural sciences. Let them study religion from nature, and from the word of God.—And then will they cease to bow before crucifixes, and relics. Then will they cease to worship the "Blessed Virgin,"—to pray to the "Saints"—and confess to Priests, and pay money for absolution, and for masses for the dead.

The Cortland Presbytery

Will meet in this village on Tuesday the 8th inst. The opening discourse will be preached by the Moderator, Rev. P. Lockwood, of Cortlandville, at the Presbyterian Church, at 2 o'clock, P. M.

The following are the nominations for Governor and Lieut. Governor of this state.

ABOLITION.
GERRIT SMITH, for Governor.
C. O. SHEPPARD, Lieut. Governor.
WHIG.
WM. H. SEWARD, Governor.
LUTHER BRADISH, Lieut. Gov.
ADMINISTRATION.
WM. C. BOUCK, Governor.
DANIEL S. DICKINSON, Lieut. Gov.

The late census of New Orleans shows a population of 100,000. A census taken in the winter would show a much larger number.

CORRESPONDENCE.

For the Register.

ST. PAUL'S SPIRIT OF ACCOMMODATION

Often it is said, 'St. Paul became all things to all men.' In conversation, this allusion is frequently made for the purpose of depreciating the claims of moral obligation, especially in reference to the duties of ministers of the Gospel. The practical application is made to the ministers thus:—'You had better not take a decided stand in defense of this or that unpopular doctrine, or for the support of that sin-rebuking course of action, for you know 'St. Paul became all things to all men.' The Apostle's expression is, 'I am made all things to all men.' His meaning is, as the context clearly evinces, (see 1 Cor. chap. 9th.) that he would deny himself, he would use all proper efforts to overcome the prejudices of the various classes of persons to whom he wished to gain access as a herald of the great salvation.

His language is—'For though I be free from all men, yet have I made myself servant unto all that I might gain the more.' To farther illustrate his principles of action, he mentions 'the Jews,' and those 'under the law,' and those 'without law,' then adds—'To the weak became I as weak, that I might gain the weak; I am made all things unto all men, that I might by all means save some.'

He designs to tell us, therefore, that he regarded the preaching of the Gospel for the purpose of saving souls, as his primary and soul-absorbing work; and to this calling he was resolved to make the plans of his whole life subservient. He did not intend to leave the impression on any mind, that he would lean a little this way, and a little that way, and a little the other in matters where truth and duty were at stake. His meetings, his preaching, and all his actions after he inquired, 'Lord what wilt thou have me to do,' furnish ample refutation of such an interpolation of his words.

Let us now look for a moment at

ST. PAUL'S METHOD OF TREATING DEFAMATION.

1 Cor. iv. 13. 'Being defamed, we entreat.' This manifests the spirit of Christ. It may sometimes be the duty of a disciple of Christ, and even of a minister of the Gospel, to appeal to the civil law for the protection of character; but ordinarily, to 'entreat,' and to live a holy life will guard the reputation of the Christian, and of the ambassador of Christ from permanent injury. The spirit of the world says, when defamed, prosecute and retaliate; the Gospel says—'Entreat.'

I cannot forbear to speak also of

ST. PAUL'S CITIZENSHIP.

Acts xxi. 39. But Paul said, 'I am a citizen of no mean city.' Ministers of the Gospel are citizens, and as such, they have duties to perform. The multitude sometimes need to be reminded of this truth, and ministers themselves are in danger of forgetting it. J. R. J.

INTELLIGENCE.

SUMMARY.

There are 58 Steamboats on Lake Erie with an aggregate of 15,000 tons. There original cost varies from $15,000 to $120,000 each.

Census.—In taking the census of the 4th ward of the city of Cincinnati, among other interesting facts, we find the following: "I found here a mother of 25 years of age, with a son of 11 years. I also met since I have commenced the census, a grandmother of 31, and another of 29 years. As a specimen of buckeye growth, there is one young man of 16 years, who measures 5 feet 9, and another of 15, of the height of 5 10 1-3 inches."

ST. LOUIS, (Mo.) Aug. 18.

Movement of Troops.—We understand that the 8th Regiment, Col. North, now stationed at Jefferson Barracks, below this city, has received orders to repair immediately to Prairie du Chien. The cause of this sudden movement, we understand, grows out of the conduct of the Winnebago Indians. A short time ago they were removed by General Atkinson, to the west side of the Mississippi. Since the troops left they have all returned to their former lands and refuse to return back to the lands assigned them. It is quite probable that some difficulty may yet grow out of the unwillingness of some of the Chiefs to migrate. The troops leave to-day or to-morrow.

The 8th was ordered to Jefferson Barracks to recruit before going to Florida. We understand that a large number of them are on the sick list. They have had but little time to recover from the fatigues they have lately undergone in the North, removing these same Indians.—Republican.

We are pleased to learn that the Utica and Detroit rail road Co. have again commenced constructing the remainder of their road in this city. The balance is now under contract, to be finished by the 1st of January next. The enterprising proprietors deserve praise for their great perseverance in opening a thoroughfare to the best portions of our state. A daily stage now runs in connection with the road.—Detroit Daily Advertiser.

Trade of Baltimore.—The shipments of flour from this port to Rio de Janeiro, in all, the present month of August, we learn from Lyford's Commercial Journal, will amount to 40,000 barrels. This is a larger aggregate than has ever been shipped hence, in any previous season, to that quarter. The Tide Water Canal, although yet in its infancy, has contributed materially toward furnishing the supplies of wheat from which this flour has been manufactured by our city millers. Last year's wheat crop in the great Susquehannah Valley, was generally of superior quality, & the present crop, which will in a short time begin to descend through the new channel to this market, is said to be equally fine.—Balt. Amer.

FROM ST. HELENA.—Removal of the Remains of Napoleon Bonaparte from St. Helena to France.—We learn that H. B. M. ship Dolphin arrived at St. Helena, in 47 days passage, with despatches from England, for his Excellency the Governor, acquainting him that the British Government had granted permission for the disinterment of the remains of Napoleon Bonaparte, for transmission to France; and that His Excellency should make every preparation (at the expense of the British Government,) to entertain the Prince de Joinville, who is on his way in His M. C. Majesty's ship Artemis for this express purpose.

The Artemis was seen 40 days ago by the Dolphin.

Mosely Clapp has had a verdict for damages to the amount of $308 33 cents, given in his favor against the town of Orange, Mass., for a broken leg and other injuries sustained by being precipitated in a wagon, from a steep descent on the road, while turning out for another vehicle—there being no rail and the road being narrow. The verdict is doubled by the statute.

A trunk, belonging to the Hon. Mr. Nesbit, of Georgia, and which was lost in the North Carolina, has been picked up on Baldhead beach. And we see it stated in the Charleston papers that a portion of the wreck and a mahogany table has been found in the neighborhood of Georgetown, South Carolina.

The Globe says:—We understand that Major James D. Graham, with Lieutenants, Lee and Tom, of the corps of Topographical Engineers, have been ordered on the survey of the due north line of the North Eastern Boundary.

Steam Fire Engine.—We learn that the Mechanics Institute have awarded their gold medal to the inventor or rather the compiler of a Steam Fire Engine, and that the Fire Insurance companies have ordered one of the engines built at a cost of six thousands dollars. This plan is to keep the water in the boiler always hot by means of a permanent stove in the Engine house, and to keep two horses always harnessed ready to drag the engine to the place of work. In this way the machinery will be ready to work at once on arrival at the scene of action. This engine is expected to throw water to the top of any building in the city, and in such quantities as not to stimulate the fire, but put it out.—Journal of Commerce.

Gallant Conduct.—As Mr. Burnham was fishing yesterday afternoon, on the rocks in front of his well known residence, at Bloomingdale, he heard cries of distress and screams for help from some women a short distance from him. He immediately ran to the spot, and found three little girls bathing in the river, who had been carried out beyond their depth by the swell, as Mr. B. supposes, of a passing steamboat.

The old gentleman, upwards of 60 years of age, immediately pulled off his vest, and with his cloth pantaloons, thick boots, and hat on, plunged into the water and succeeded in securing two of them with his left arm, and with his right arm swam back to the shore.

He then returned and caught the third child by the hair of the head, as she was sinking for the last time; in returning with her to the shore, part of her bathing dress interfered in some way with his right arm in such a manner as almost to deprive him of its use.

By a vigorous effort however, he disengaged it and reached the shore, although almost overcome, and restored the three children, uninjured, to their almost desparing parents. Such gallant conduct is its own reward—the consciousness of having saved the lives of three human beings.—N. Y. American.

Extract of a letter, dated Tuscaloosa, Alabama, Aug. 14th:

"It has not been so sickly in this country for 20 years, as it is at present. About 50 in this city are down with the fever, and the disease is represented to be worse in the countries below this [illegible]"

We learn by a gentleman who arrived last evening with the mail line from the South, that the people of Southampton county, (Va.) were in a state of alarm on Sunday evening in consequence of an anticipated insurrection of the negroes. The passengers learned that a letter was received at a meeting-house near one of the stages of the mail line, from Hicksford, stating that the purpose of the negroes had just been discovered at the moment of writing the letter. As may be supposed, great alarm prevailed. No farther particulars were ascertained by the passengers. We find nothing on the subject in the Baltimore papers of yesterday, though the mail line passed through that city the evening previous.

In relation to the above subject, we find the following paragraph in the Baltimore Clipper of yesterday:—

"A rumor prevails in town to-day, says the Richmond Star of the 24th inst., that the negroes in a part of North Carolina [illegible] Petersburg."

We cannot give this as authentic, and it is, [illegible] much exaggerated, even if it has any foundation.—[illegible]

[illegible]

[illegible] cotton mills [illegible] Norwich [illegible] we shall become as busy as a place [illegible] as there is in New England or New York. [illegible] New London and Windham counties [illegible] the number to 115 or 120 [illegible] come in [illegible] the rest.

Horrid Massacre—Countless Lives Destroyed.—Some queer fishes were found in the garden at Willow Grove when the water was drawn off. But the queerest thing that occurred there or any where within this vicinity lately, was the inhuman massacre of a set of bats, which were discovered nestled in the roof and eaves of the house. A net was placed at a hole which was their entrance, and the bats were beaten out of the house into the net, and then beaten to death in the net. The net was filled a dozen times, and three whole bushels of these [illegible] were thrown into the river. A whole nation of the vespertilio was exterminated.—N. O. Picayune.

HARVESTS IN GREAT BRITAIN.

IRELAND. The Weather—The Crops.—Knowing the great amount of misery which a failure of the crops in Ireland is sure to entail on her people, it is highly gratifying to find that reports at our latest dates were good:—that although the [illegible] of the early part of the season might be fully realized, there are grounds for hope that the labors of the husbandman will be well rewarded, and the wants of man and beast bountifully supplied. In the present instance, such a dispensation will be more than appreciated, not only on account of the previous failures, but also, because, the habits of the people have undergone such a change as to require a greater supply of food than heretofore. Such a supply would be an additional stimulant to the cause of temperance, inasmuch as it will afford the means of supplying the real wants, without inducing a desire to gratify the artificial ones.—Emigrant.

SCOTLAND.—At this season of the year the most interesting topic of domestic news is usually the state and prospects of the harvest that is ripening, and getting ready for the hand of the reaper. Not only does the cultivator of the soil watch its progress with anxious hope and fear, but the merchant, the manufacturer, and the mechanic feel elated or depressed by the favorable or unfavorable reports of the growing crops. To the poor it is a subject of the deepest interest. A bad harvest to them is almost a matter of life or death. The prospect of winter is made terrible by the idea of dear bread, while it is stripped of half its gloom by the cheering belief that the land is blessed with plenty. It must, then, be highly gratifying to learn that there is the prospect of an abundant yield of the fruits of the earth; for although the ocean may roll between us and some of our "kith and kin," and years, many years, may have passed away, since we beheld those once familiar faces, time nor space cannot destroy those sympathies so dear to the human heart.—Emigrant.

The difficulties between England and France do not appear to have produced more than a momentary excitement in England. The tone of the press is remarkably cool, considering the importance of the result, if a rupture was seriously expected to grow out of the action of the "four great powers." This we take to be good evidence that there are no grounds to fear that the peace of Europe will, as yet, be disturbed. The remarkable moderation of the Tory papers show that there is a tacit approval of Lord Palmerston's policy in this instance. Otherwise there could not have been a better opportunity for giving his lordship, and the ministers generally a severe castigation.—Emigrant.

From the Boston Mercantile Journal.

We copy the following article from the Times this morning:—

"Singular and Suspicious Circumstance.—About two weeks ago, a young man, named George E. Kinney, residing in Ballard Place, died very suddenly with what was said by some to be the Asiatic Cholera. As he belonged to one of the independent companies he was buried with military honors. There was some suspicion however, as to the real cause of his death, and the body was disinterred, and examined by several distinguished physicians. A large quantity of corrosive poison (arsenic) was found in his stomach, and there could be no doubt that his death was procured from that cause.—Here the matter rests for the present.

Mr. Kinney was married some four years ago, to the widow of the late Rev. Enoch W. Freeman of Lowell. She had been previously divorced from her first husband. It will be recollected by many who read this, that her marriage to Mr. Freeman caused a great deal of discontent in the society over which he was a pastor, and was the occasion of much talk, and perhaps no little scandal. It will also be recollected that Mr. Freeman was taken suddenly ill on Sunday, just as he entered the pulpit, and died in much the same manner as Mr. Kinney. His death, too, was attributed to the cholera, but we believe no examination of the stomach was made. These circumstances have caused no little talk in the city and well they may. We, of course, draw no inferences from the facts we have stated, except to repeat that they are of a suspicious character, and demand further investigation."

We learn that the remains of Rev. Mr. Freeman have been exhumed, and the circumstances are of a nature to confirm the suspicion that he died by poison. The contents of his stomach will be submitted to a chemical analysis. It is said that Mrs. Kinney has absconded. She is represented as possessing great personal attractions and intelligence, but has never been remarkable for cultivating the moral sentiments. The whole affair, which has caused no little excitement in this city, will doubtless be strictly investigated.

By information gathered from the immediate friends of Mrs. Kinney, we are perfectly satisfied that there is nothing that can be brought to substantiate the various reports and rumors abroad, respecting her. She is now on a vist to her late husband's friends, in the country, but will soon return, when a full statement of the facts will, no doubt, be laid before the public.—Boston Transcript.

DREADFUL NEWS FROM FLORIDA.

Indian Key Destroyed, and the Inhabitants Butchered by the Indians!!

Again it becomes our melancholy duty to record the cold-blooded butchery of men, women and children by the sanguinary Seminoles. Again have the treacherous savages bathed their tomahawks and scalping knives in human blood, burning houses and destroying property, and been allowed deliberately to retire in security to their fastnesses, to prepare for another attack on the defenceless inhabitants of Florida, whenever a favorable opportunity shall offer. These scenes may and probably will be reiterated time and again, unless some more energetic measures are adopted to drive them from the Territory, or the inhabitants flee from their homes and country, leaving the Indians in undisputed possession.

The intelligence of this most disastrous occurrence was brought to this port, by Capt. Kenyon of the schooner Victoria, arrived at quarantine yesterday, from Key West. He states that a wrecking vessel arrived at Key West from Indian Key, 7th inst. with a few of the survivors, who stated that a number of Indians in their canoes attacked Indian Key, on the night of the 5th inst., and after murdering part of the inhabitants and filling their canoes with plunder, burnt the whole settlement, consisting of about 30 houses, dwelling and stores. The Indians remained until noon on the following day, when they left for the main. The survivors were concealed during this time under a wharf, and left immediately after the Indians departed, for Key West. Our informant not having conversed with any of the survivors, is unable to give us a more detailed account. It was stated at Key West, that some two or three of the inhabitants of Indian Key, had made their escape in one of the Indian canoes, and arrived at Tea Table Key, in the immediate vicinity.

Union of the Canadas.—The bill which has lately passed in Parliament for the political union of these countries, is one of great importance. It gives an equal number of representatives to the 400,000 of the Upper Canada, and the 700,000 of the Lower province. The object is to neutralize the power of the French and Catholic population in the Lower province. The results will be doubtful. Still it is not designed that the will of a majority even of such a representation shall be the law of the land, as such restrictions are imposed upon their actions except when in direct unison with the will of the crown, expressed through the governor and council of its own appointment, as are designed to preclude every thing that resembles a local responsible government. This was distinctly announced both by the advocates and opposers of the bill. Lord Brougham was the only peer, (with, he said, one exception,) who declared that he should not regret the separation of the Canadas from the mother country; a separation, which he apprehended, would very soon take place. The mode in which this question and the one relating to the Clergy Reserves was discussed in the House of Lords, deserves encomium. Very little of party spirit appeared to interfere. Lord Wellington opposed the bill, but did not attempt to array against it the force of faction. Some of the amendments which he proposed were adopted almost without dissent: one we marked which he advocated, found only nine supporters besides himself. What a happy circumstance it would be for both Great Britain and this country, if every public measure could be discused according to its intrinsic merits, and legislators vote upon it independently of the opinions of party!—Bap. Advocate.

Lands of the United States will be publicly sold at the Land Office, at Genesee, in the State of Michigan, on the 9th of November next.

A public sale of United States lands will commence at the Land Office, at Chicago, Ill., on the 9th day of November next.—Another will commence at Palestine, in the same State, on the 16th of November next.

A public sale of lands belonging to the United States, will be held at the Land Office in Ionia, in the Sate of Michigan, on the 23d of November next, and another in Genesee, in the same State, on the same day.—Eve. Post.

Martial Law in Florida.—The town of Tallahasse, in Florida, was during the first week in this month, the scene of great excitement, and some peculiar Executive proceedings, which have occasioned a great deal of comment. The Tallahasse Floridian, an Administration paper published in the territorial capital, had, week after week denounced the Whigs as abolitonists, and the assailed party becoming at length exasperated, demanded the name of the author of the calumny. Some threatnings of personal chastisement directed against the culprit, as we believe, were seized upon by Gov. Robert R. Reed as a pretext for calling in the militia of the neighborhood, against which a committee of citizens remonstrated in a letter to the Governor to which he made what was deemed an insolent reply. His Excellency subsequently caused the arrest by his 'recruits' of some peaceble citizens, whereupon the drums beat an alarm, and the populace armed and organized, demanded, through a committee, of which Ex-Governor Duval was Chairman, the immediate withdrawal of the militia, and the release of the arrested citizens, to which the Executive deemed it prudent to accede.—New Yorker.

From the Savannah Republican, Aug. 21.

FROM FLORIDA

By the Steampacket Charles Downing, Capt. Dent, we have received the Jacksonville Advocate of Tuesday last, from which we extract the follwing—

INDIAN NEWS.

We have been permited to make the following extract from a letter to a gentleman of this place, dated Newmansville, Aug. 10th 1840.

Mr. John Delancy just arrived at this place from Fort Tarver, on Payne's Prarie, informs us, that while a negro fellow, the property of Mr. John Hope, was hunting in Tarver's Field, he discovered five Indians in the act of carrying off corn. The negro, being armed with a double-barelled gun, charged with slugs, immediately fired upon them. On the discharge of the first barrel, he killed one on the spot. The other four immediately fled, when he discharged the second barrel, wounding one severely. The truth of this may be relied on.

In addition to the above, we learn that on Wednesday of last week, four families were massacred in the vicinity of New River. Signs of about fifty Indians were seen. A company of dragoons had been started in pursuit.

It is also rumored, that on Thursday, seven Dragoons, with two women, probably soldiers' wives, were killed fifteen miles from Black Creek on the Newmansville road. We give this as a doubtful rumor, however.

Gold Ring.—A gentleman in Mississippi, writes thus to his friend in New York:

"In my visit through, Texas, I came into posession of a massive gold ring found upon the finger of a corpse by the way side, between Galiad and Gangals, just after the slaugter at St. Antonio. Upon the outside of the ring, in large embossed old English black letters, are the words "In memory of," and inside in running hand characters, "The Rev. Edward Williams, obt. 6th 1832"

The object of the present possessor of the ring in giving this information is to obtain a knowledge of the family connexions of the person whose name is inscribed.—"It would doubtless," he says, "be a mournful satisfaction to the surviving friends to receive this memento in form of friendship, and it would afford me great pleasure to be instrumental in restoring it."

China.—We have seen a Bombay Courier of 22d May, containing numerous letters from Singapore and Macon relating to Chinese affairs,—the dates from Macon being to March 26th, (no later than before received.) Several of the letters state that in consequence of the expected arrival of the British fleet, and the hostilities which would probably be consequent thereon, the American merchants had declined, or were about to decline, receiving further consignments. They mention that a circular to this affect has been, or was to be issued. Similar information is contained in a letter received in this city, dated Canton, March 22d. It states that the British Superintendent Elliot, in anticipation of the speedy arrival of the fleet, had advised the departure of foreign residents from Canton, and that the American merchants had issued their circular accordingly. The brig John Gilpin and other vessels were to be despatched immediately to the United States.

Letters have been received from the Muritas, dated Port Louis, 20th April, which state that a severe hurricane had visited that place. Seven small schooners were sunk: one totally lost, and all hands on board perished. Several large ships were lost outside. Four ships were driven ashore in the harbor, and all the other vessels in port are said to have sustained considerable damage. On shore the distruction is described to have been awful. Roofs of houses blown off, trees torn up by the roots, sugar plantations destroyed, and a number of lives lost in the ruins. The whale ship Arabella, Capt. Bishop, is reported to have put in to stop a leak' on the 17th April, but we do not see her name reported as having sustained damage, or otherwise, during the hurricane.

A large portion of the pine country, on the Wisconsin river, purchased by the government from the Chippewa and Meeominee Indians, will be offered for sale at the land office at Mineral Point, on the 5th of October next. Since the purchase was made, a great amount of capital has been invested by individuals and companies in the erection of saw mills on the St. Croix. Chippewa and Wisconsin rivers, and their branches. We are informed by one who has taken the trouble to count them, that upward of a hundred large rafts of pine plank, shingles &c., had passed Dubuque since the breaking of the ice in the spring on their way to the towns below, and that very large quantities of lumber yet remain at the mills. Building materials in our towns on the Upper Mississippi are becoming cheaper and more abundant every day.—Iowa News.

FROM TEXAS.

The steam packet Columbia, Capt. Windle, arrived at N. Orleans, bringing dates from Houston to the 8th inst.

The Houston Morning Star says,—"According to the Austin Sentinel, a detachment of the Eederalists have marched upon Laredo, which is in possession of the Central forces. It is expected that they will take the town with ease, and be ready to join the main body in an attack upon Matamoras."

The schr. of war San Antonia had arrived at Galveston.

The Houston Times of the 5th inst. says:—"By a gentleman who arrived this morning from Victoria, we learn that the Canales and his army are at San Patrico; his force is said to be 900 men of which number 300 are Americans, all well armed and equipped for battle; 400 Mexicans and 80 Americans left about 10 days since for the neighborhood of the Rio Grande to attack a party of Centralists who were said to be advancing towards San Patrico.—Carbajal has been despatched by Canales to Galveston."

There was a battle lately fought on the Rio Frio, between the Camanche and Lipan Indians, in which the latter it is said killed thirteen, took seven or eight prisoners and sent them to Bexar.

Every thing is quiet at the city of Bexar.

The body of a man named Silas Ferguson was lately found murdered on the road leading from Houston to Montgomery.

Steam Boat Miami Lost.—We regret to learn by the Louisville mail boat of this morning, the total loss of the stemboat Miami. She struck on the same ledge where the Danube was lost last autumn, and on which so many boats have been lost. She was broken a little abaft the midships, and her stern part has fallen into fifteen feet water. She was one of the very low pressure boats on the western waters, and was built at Murraysville, about a year since, at an expense of 14,000 dollars. The steamer Platte, from St. Louis, took off her passengers, and as she is expected here to-day, further particulars, may be learnt on her arrival.—Cin. Chronicle, Aug. 18.

Connecting the Atlantic and Pacific.—That the Atlantic and Pacific oceans will soon be connected by a ship canal across the Isthmus of Panama, now seems certain. An enterprising Company in Paris, after taking the necessary preliminary steps, has sent out a ship freighted with engineers, laborers, tools, &c., and it has probably by this time arrived at the mouth of the Charges, ready to commence active operations. The New-York Evening Signal remarks, that there are now about 9000 persons per annum, on an average, passing and repassing in connexion with the western parts of South America. It must be evident that the number will be greatly increased when the time of transit shall be reduced more than one half, and the expenses correspondingly reduced.

Purse Pride.—It is to be lamented, that the national character of the English is pride, and the meanest of all pride. Even a poor lord is despised, and to increase his fortune a necessitous peer will condescend to marry into a rich citizen's family. An overweening affection for money, an idolatrous worship of gain, have absolutely confounded the general intellect, and warped the judgment of many to that excess that, in estimating men or things, they refer always to that "What is he worth?" or "What will it fetch?" Were we to point out a person as he passes, and say, "There goes a good man, one who has a vice"—he would scarcely be noticed; but exclaim, "That man is worth £500,000," and he will be stared at till out of sight.

Destruction of Ternate by an Earthquake.—Ternate is among the largest of the Molucca or Spice Islands, and belongs to the Dutch.

"On the morning of the 2d of Febuary, at half past 8 o'clock, the air appeared dark and threatening; a strong north-west wind, accompanied by heavy rain, drove the clouds impetuously along; and every thing seemed to indicate some extraordinary phenomenon, which in fact soon followed, for a thick smoke soon arose from the crater, accompanied by a loud subteraneous noise, like thunder, while boiling lava and hot ashes burned and destroyed every thing on which they fell. If the appearance of the phenomenon was striking in the day time, it was still more so in the evening, when the stones ejected from the crater could be distinguished among the flames, which frequently rose to a great height. This destructive eruption lasted twenty-four hours and ended with a frightful subteraneous noise, which made the inhabitants fear that the ground would give way under their feet. The noise was so great that persons close together could not hear each other speak. Passing over some days we come to the 14th of Febuary, 1840, which proved so disastrous. At half past 12 at night a loud noise was heard, accompanied by a slight trembling of the ground, which grew every moment more violent, and awakened inhabitants from their sleep. As the shock became more violent most of the people left their habitations. At half past 3 in the morning, whilst the rain fell in torrents, a violent shock was felt; the people could hardly keep their feet, the houses were shaken, and most of the buildings fell. In many places the earth opened, and immediately closed again. Nothing was left undamaged, and on the 15th of Febraary, nature seemed to have attained the highest point of fury. An extremely violent shock was felt, men and animals hastened to the water side, and filled all the boats without distinction of rank. The fears, especially of the women, were so great that some went a great distance through the water, in order to reach a boat to escape being swallowed up by the earth, which opened from time to time. When the fury of the storm was past; and the poor inhabitants had in some measure recovered their fright they perceived how complete was their ruin. Men's possesions were laid waste; the most costly spices and numerous other productions were spoiled and buried under ruins; not a piece of furniture saved, and not one stone house in all Ternate remained standing. Even Fort Orange which has withstood several earthquakes for these two hundred years, has given way to this occasion, and truly the welfare and importance of Ternate to our Government is lost. The private injury is estimated at 900,000 florins. The shocks were felt at Gildo and Tideri, but no damage was done; thanks to heaven no lives were lost. Most of the people will leave the island and settle elsewhere.—Dutch papers July 28.

POETRY.

THE CRUCIFIXION.

BY J. G. WHITTIER.

Sun-light upon Judea's hills!
And on the waves of Gallilee—
On Jordan's stream and on the rills
That gather to the sleeping sea!
Most freshly from the greenwood springs
The light breeze on its scented wings;
And gaily quiver in the sun
The tall, green plums of Lebanon!

A few more hours: a change hath come,
Dark as a brooding thunder-cloud!
The shouts of wrath and joy are dumb,
And proud knees unto earth are bowed!
A change is on the hills of Death;
The helmed watchers pant for breath;
And turn with wild and maniac's eyes
From the dark scene of sacrifice!

That sacrifice!—the death of Him—
The high and ever-holy one!
Well may the conscious heaven grow dim,
And blacken the beholding sun!
The wonted light had fled away,
Night settles on the middle day;
And Earthquake, from his cavern-bed,
Is waking with a thrill of dread!

The dead are waking underneath!
Their prison-door is rent away!
And ghastly with the seal of death,
They wander in the eye of day!
The temple of the cherubim,
The house of God, is cold and dim:
A curse is on its walls;
Its mighty veil asunder falls!

Well may the mighty holds of Earth
Be shaken, and her mountains nod;
Well may the sheeted dead come forth
To gaze upon a suffering God!
Well may the temple-shrine grow dim,
And shadows veil the cherubim,
When He, the chosen one of Heaven,
A sacrifice for guilt was given!

And shall the sinful heart alone
Behold unmoved the atoning hour,
When Nature trembles on her throne,
And Death resigns his iron power!
Oh! shall the heart, whose sinfulness
Gave keenness to His sore distress,
And added to His tears of blood,
Refuse its trembling gratitude!

From the New Yorker.

A VISIT TO THE NATURAL BRIDGE, IN SCOTT COUNTY, VIRGINIA.*

Natural Bridge, Scott Co., Sept. 30, 1836.

We arrived here this morning, after traveling twelve miles from Estilville; following the winding of a small creek under Clinch Mountain until we came upon Clinch River itself, which we forded, and then followed its margin for two miles. The road along the river was very beautiful, as the mountains closed in on both sides, leaving a pretty valley through which the river flowed. We then reached Neel's where we alighted, put up our horses and dined.

Under the direction of a very obliging man named Hale, who attends the store here, we started for the Natural Bridge.—The road passed up Stone Creek for about two miles, until the guide took us around a hill to meet the creek above. Soon we entered into a ravine, whose cliffs were so abruptly steep as almost to startle one approaching. We gained the creek again, and following its course, it disappeared within a deep cavern that seemed to open full before us in the face of the precipice. Above and around the mountains hemmed in the creek, and you stood in a chasm filled with masses of rock and darkened by the heavy foliage which covered the trees growing on the spot. As you approach the apparent cavern, it suddenly seemed to extend itself to an enormous size, the arch at its summit acquires increased elevation, and, as you are about to enter, you find around you an immense portal, whose massive superstructure had caused you to miscalculate the distance below. As soon as you enter, you find the light losing its brilliancy towards the interior, and, when it has almost disappeared, a faint glimmering from the other side is the first indication that the structure above you is actually a bridge across the chasm. As you advance you find the stream has entirely disappeared, not a drop of water exhibiting itself to the eye; yet all around you are indications of the powerful action of water. Masses of rock are tumbled about in the wildest confusion, worn as smooth as marble by attrition, and the sides of the cavern are wrought by the same action into hollows and eddies equally smooth.

As you continue to advance, the light becomes so faint around you that you must now pause to feel your way. A moment's repose, however, enables the pupil to dilate, and here you have before you an entirely different exhibition of Nature's grandeur. You now find that you have wound your way so far in, that the direct rays of light are entirely lost; and as you look both ways the rays reflected from each outer opening, seem to advance but a little way, leaving in the middle just so much light as to make the darkness visible, and to clothe the whole scene with an air of mysterious magnificence. The lofty arch above you seems converted into some mighty grained vault or gigantic portal, so deeply seated in the bowels of the earth as to be beyond the influence of the sun. The palace of Darkness seems exposed to your view, where she sits upon her silent throne, deep beneath the mountain rock, the very portals shrouded in mysterious and unearthly gloom. It is a spot where ancient Superstition would have planted altars to the Eumenides, or where the Hindu fanatic would delight to construct a second Euphantea to celebrate the horrid rites of his bloody Gods. But, as you advance, the scene is at once changed: again Heaven's blessed light meets the eye with all its beauty—it breaks upon you like the full dawn of a tropical morning, and you are ready to exclaim with the poet—

"Hail, holy light," &c.

A step farther, and the light presents almost a picture to the eye, as it is reflected by the parti-colored wall, which now begins to exhibit the stupendous front directly before you.

Here a large tree arrests your attention, lying in the bed of the stream, with the evidences around you of its being recently brought there by the water; yet still you can see nothing of the water itself, although you may examine the whole interior. At length you find yourself at the Southern outlet; you look up, and the arch of the bridge has advanced rapidly in height, until it has imperceptibly run up into the perpendicular precipice above. Now, for the first time, the water reappears, but in so minute a quantity that you are at once satisfied that the greater portion must find its way under ground. As you look up, you seem enclosed by an ampitheatre of abrupt and perpendicular cliffs frowning upon you on every side, with their high summits clothed with massive foliage.

Behind you is the arch of the bridge and as you turn again to view it, and see the stupendous elevation of the cliffs above the arch, and the massive burden of rocks and trees, you are overwhelmed with the sublimity of the same. As your eye continues to descend the bed of the stream, you see all around, nothing but precipices, surrounded in the distance by lofty mountains.

We descended the bed of the stream for a few hundred yards, and there, finding the precipices had been changed into steep sloping hills, we ascended to the summit along a very uncertain and dangerous footing. On reaching the summit, we found that the hill continued to ascend even for a considerable distance above the edge of the precipices, and that two roads were conducted across the chasm by means of the bridge which nature had thus provided. The hill is so thickly wooded that the cleft on both sides is screened from view unless you pass through the woods and approach the precipices on either side. This is a most dangerous operation, as the hill slopes so suddenly, that the footing is very uncertain; and an unfortunate slip would soon precipitate one into eternity. The distance, too, is so far across what would be called the width of a bridge, and the centre so much higher than the two edges, that you have no opportunity of perceiving the nature of the structure at one view. The subject is so vast that it must be taken in detail, and therein it essentially differs from the other Natural Bridge. There you see the whole structure at a glance—here you only discover that it is a bridge from continued observation and after traversing an extended space, as will be seen when I come to detail its measurements. But when you reach the precipice at length, and the eye ventures to look down, it withdraws at the instant with a shudder—it is woful to look down, and bold is the head and steady is the brain that can repeat the glance without faltering. Mr. Jefferson says that looking over the Natural Bridge in Rockbridge County, is a fearful undertaking, and that a mere glance causes many an adventurer a severe headache. What, then, should be the effect of this, of which the elevation of this is nearly double that of the other?

It is extremely difficult for the mind to form an adequate conception of the massiveness of this great Natural Curiosity.—The mountain through which the cleft or cavern is formed is probably about 500 feet high on both sides of the cleft, including both precipice and slope. The cleft itself at the upper end of the stream under the arch of the bridge, is 90 feet wide, and just outside of the bridge it is perhaps twice that width; this width continues increasing under the arch, until, near the southern outlet, it is as much as 115 feet. The height too, of the roof of the arch at the entrance of the stream, is at least 60 feet, and the superstructure of the rock above the summit of the roof is at least 300 feet of abrupt precipice, exclusive of the ascending precipice. The length of the cavern from the entrance to its escape is at least 600 feet, as its course is so circuitous that at one point, you have sight of all that portion of the way which precedes, some idea may be formed of the imposing effect upon the senses. When, too, it is remembored that the greatest human skill is required to spring an arch of 90 feet strong enough to support a simple bridge—and here is one, supporting a mountain with all its burthen of massive rocks and growing forests; and yet with such abutments and so powerfully constructed, that the mind in viewing it, so far from being concerned for its safety, considers the only thing wanting about it to be greater elevation and a wider space—a change that would weaken any other structure.

There are scarcely any two points in which the two Natural Bridges of Virginia can be justly compared. They appear to be of entire different characters—the one in Rockbridge remarkable for symmetry and elegance, that in Scott for vastness and solidity. The former can be understood and viewed at a glance—the latter is too vast for the human senses to compass, except, by observing parts. The height of the precipice in Rockbridge is 210 feet over the bridge; while the height of the bare precipice over the bridge here measured is 375 feet, and above this the hill continues to rise about 60 feet more in so steep a slope as to make the approach to the precipice a work of danger. The Natural Bridge is not more than twice or three times the width of the road which passes over it and supports but a few small trees, whereas this is more than 600 feet across and is covered with a forest of the largest and most thickly wooded growth, and is 620 feet in length across the chasm. The cleft at the Natural Bridge does not exceed 45 feet in width at the bridge, whereas here, at the outlet of the stream from the arch of the bridge, the cleft or ravine is about 600 feet across and is bounded on all sides by a perpendicular wall rising at the lowest points to a height of 375 feet. The two are entirely opposed in character, and indeed it would be unlike the economy of nature to produce two such curiosities of an entirely similar appearance. I confess that I was gratified at finding them so entirely different—each, an object the most interesting and curious of its kind in the world.

And yet the appearance of this bridge sets beyond a doubt the manner in which the other has been formed. Here are obvious to every apprehension, the means by which Nature has operated. The stream has worn its way through a hill of far greater magnitude than that at the Natural Bridge. Here you can see the fragments exactly as they have been tumbled down, the sides still exhibiting the wearing of water, and the bed strown with sand and rock and rubbish. The same horizontal stratified lime-stone has been detached by the action of the atmosphere of the frost and of the water, and the same semi-elliptical curve appears in the structure at the entrance. And although the stream of water exhibits at present no means sufficient for great results, yet the log of timber lying in the cavern, which our guide told us was not there at his last visit, and the masses of rubbish, showed that, even yet there were means within reach of the stream fully equal to considerable effects. I am persuaded that the constant action of these agents detaches, every year, masses from the sides and roof, and if my conjectures as to the eventual destruction of the other bridge be well founded, the same agents that destroyed that, will so operate on this, as to supply it place with another, in time similar in all respects, except an increased magnitude and grandeur.

The geological formation of the hill is lime-stone, stratified almost horizontally as far as the top of the cliff—the part above this is sand-stone, such as composes all the upper section of the mountains in those regions—and this portion of the hill is very steep, but with soil enough to support a thick forest. It was down this I had to descend, in order to take the measurement of the height of the precipice. I approached the edge of the cliff near a small Arbor Vitæ, and as I looked over to let down the pebble to which I had attached a string, the sight was most appalling. My vision being firm, however, I eyed the water below.—When I had ended the measurement and permitted myself to think of the chance of a single false step, I almost shuddered; yet to control the feeling, and withal, to procure a memento of the spot for friends at home from its most dangerous position, I leaned over the precipice and drew in a limb of Arbor Vitæ which hung out above the abyss, cut it off and secured it for removal. I then returned to my companions who had now come up, and we pursued our examination of the various points of observation on the summit, most of which have already been noted. When we got down again to the creek, we remarked more particularly the quantity of water which seems to flow in it a short distance below the bridge, and were surprised at the contrast. Here it is quite a considerable stream, although our guide assured us that it had received no accession from any other quarter.

We got back to Neel's just before dark, although we had started before 10 o'clock. Here we found our hospital hostess had prepared her stores for us, which we fell to work upon with right good cheer, discussing matters to her and our mutual satisfaction, and thereupon we proceeded to note down in our journal these impressions of what we had seen through the day.

ANOTHER LION FIGHT AT VIENNA.

Of late years, the truth of the accounts which have been so long current respecting the generous disposition of the lion, have been called in question. Several travelers in their account of Asia and Africa, describe him as of a more rapacious and sanguinary disposition than had formerly been supposed, although few of them have had the opportunity to make him a particular object of their attention.

A circumstance that occurred not long since in Vienna, seems however, to confirm the more ancient accounts. In the year 1791, at which period the custom of baiting wild beasts still existed in that city, a combat was to be exhibited between a lion and a number of large dogs. As soon as the noble animal made his appearance, four large bull-dogs were turned loose upon him, three of which, however, as soon as they came near him, took fright, and ran away. One only had courage to remain, and make the attack. The lion, however, without rising from the ground upon which he was lying, showed him by a single stroke with his paw, how greatly his superior he was in strength; for the dog was instantly stretched motionless on the ground. The lion drew him towards him, and laid his forepaws upon him in such a manner that only a small part of his body could be seen. Every one imagined that the dog was dead, and that the lion would soon rise and devour him. But they were mistaken. The dog began to move and struggled to get loose, which the lion permitted him to do. He seemed merely to have warned him not to meddle with him any more; but when the dog attempted to run away, and had already got half over the enclosure, the lion's indignation seemed to be excited. He sprang from the ground, and in two leaps reached the fugitive, who had just got as far as the paling, and was wishing to have it opened for him to escape. The flying animal had called the instinctive propensity of the monarch of the forest into action; the defenceless enemy now excited his pity; for the generous lion stepped a few paces backward, and looked quietly on, while a small door was open to let the dog out of the enclosure.

This unequivocal trait of generosity moved every spectator. A shout of applause resounded throughout the assembly, who had enjoyed a satisfaction of a description far superior to what they had expected.

It is possible that the African lion, when, under the impulse of hunger, he goes out to seek his prey, may not so often exhibit this magnanimous disposition; for, in that case he is compelled by imperious necessity to satisfy the cravings of nature: but when his appetite is satiated, he never seeks for prey, nor does he ever destroy to gratify a blood-thirsty disposition.

THE ATMOSPHERIC RAILWAY CARRIAGES.—It is upwards of a year and a half since we described the experiments made by Mr. Clegg, in the borough, on the mode of propelling carriages by means of exhausting a pipe or tube with which the carriages were connected, and then admitting the atmospheric air, and, as it were, forcing the carriages and train along, and thus suspending the necessity of gas, or any other power, for the conveyance of a train along a rail road.

These experiments were very successful; indeed so successful that few persons had any doubt about the ultimate success of the principle of the invention.

On Thursday, the experiments were exhibited on a large scale, on a rail road which connects, or is intended to connect the line of the Birmingham, the Bristol, and the Thames junction lines, commencing within a short distance of Shepherd's Bush, and running in a westerly direction for about three quarters of a mile.

The carriage put in motion with the persons on it, did not weigh much less than 12 tons, but it travelled with great ease at the rate of 25 miles an hour. The exhausted pipe or tube laid down, which was not the propelling agent, but the means of its development, was about nine inches in diameter. The engine by which it was exhausted—namely, a pump worked by steam, rendered it fit for the operations required, in about two minutes and a half, and from the index, that is quick silver employed at the termeni, it was ascertained that the operation was performed simultaneously at both ends of the line.

There was no noise, no smoke, and what is better, no danger of explosion, or of a power which could not be governed. In short the experiment was as successful as its warmest well-wishers could expect, and showed that the agency of steam is not a sine qua non on a rail road.

Without going into the minute history of rail roads, it may be as well to say, that this power may be applied to any rail road at a saving of about 70 per cent, and that it is of sufficient force to preclude the necessity of tunnelling. It is applicable to almost any gradients.

The experiments were attended by a great number of nobility, and by many scientific men.—Glasgow Argus, June [illegible] 1840.

PROSPECTUS
OF
THE CASKET,
AND PHILADELPHIA MONTHLY MAGAZINE.
THE great increase of the subscription list of the Casket, which has been nearly doubled since the commencement of the last volume, warrants the most extensive improvements on the first of July 1840, at which time a new volume will be commenced with increased vigour. Nothing need be said of the firm basis on which the Casket stands, it being already the oldest magazine in the country, and has maintained its popularity, in the face of all opposition. It is to be found upon the centre tables of families making literary pretensions from Maine to Georgia.
TYPE—EMBELLISHMENTS.
The Casket is printed [illegible] and beautiful type, upon the most white paper. The illustrations are not surpassed by those of any periodical, at home or abroad; and beside the monthly steel engravings, a quarterly plate of colored Fashions has lately been added. [illegible] States.
LITERARY CHARACTER.
The literary character of the Casket is well known. It is [illegible] of the highest order and sustained by writers of the first rank. Essays, Tales, Sketches and Travels, compose its [illegible] prose articles, while the poetry is equalled by that of no other magazine of the character. The variety for which the Casket is celebrated, shall suffer no diminution, but on the contrary every exertion shall be made to increase its interest.
Several histories of the Revolution have already appeared, and others shall follow in the course of the volume, presenting when finished, a complete picture of the manners, and a [illegible] account of the great battles of that time. Thus the Casket, instead of being filled with [illegible]

HEAVEN.

"That contemplation of heaven, as the end of the Christian's race, and the hope of the Christian's calling, which alone can be beneficially operative upon his moral state, views it as the universe of sanctified spirits congregated before the throne of God—the centre and rallying point of the spiritual world, where angels, and thrones, and dominions, principalities and powers, and the spirits of just men made perfect—that vast concourse of God's family, in their different stations and degrees—assemble round the Throne, with the regularity and order of reverential and all-pervading humility, and with the harmony of universal love—where no rebel in heart against the Sovereign Will, could dare to enter, because the law of the Lord is but the expression of the general mind; where those who in life were united in holy affection; who have fallen asleep in Christ, and who in death were not divided, shall meet at the right hand of Christ, in everlasting re-union; where all will rejoice to do God's will perfectly; where all the individuals of that congregated universe are knit together by bonds of indissoluble union; where the spirit of Christ pervades every breast; and where the same perfect image of Christ is stamped upon every soul; where the same sentiment of gratitude to the Creator, Redeemer, Sanctifier,—the Triune God,—animates every bosom; where the same enjoyments delight every heart; and where the same anthem of praise flows from every tongue—"Worthy is the Lamb that was slain to receive power, and riches, and wisdom, and strength, and honor, and glory and blessing!"

"If we would have our conversation in heaven, we must often meditate upon the "things above, where Christ sitteth at the right hand of God." We should love to expatiate within the hallowed borders, that we may spy out the promised land, pluck some specimens of its fruits and flowers, and acquire some knowledge of its character and inhabitants. Thus should we trace back the link of connection from the glories which hereafter shall be revealed to us, to the glories which previously must be revealed in us, to prepare us for appreciating and enjoying them. By contemplating what we shall be when Christ appears, we should discover not only a motive, but a model by which to purify ourselves, even as Christ is pure. Therefore, we should often draw aside the light veil which curtains off from eternity, and soberly contemplate all to which the torch of revelation extends its light, and the purified vision of faith can reach. What is the scene that opens upon our views? Is it vague, and chill, and wild, and ghastly? Is it such a scene as fiends would imagine, and Southey, as their prophet, reveal? No. It is a scene in which the Christian finds himself at home. All its objects are familiar, and congenial to the feelings of the regenerate; only all have ripened into perfection, and are illuminated with a halo of glory. It far more resembles the evenings at Bethany; the walk to Emmaus; the guest-chamber at Jerusalem; the Mount of Olives, and the domestic or social circle pouring out the deep and varied affections of the heart, of a present God, as they bend the knee together before "the Throne of Grace;" and rising, only with more tender and holy affection, to "love one another."

"Views such as these keep perpetually open the communication between time and eternity. Earth and heaven are viewed, not as two essentially different worlds; but as two provinces of the same great empire, separated but by Jordan's narrow stream, regulated by the same laws, ruled by the same Sovereign, animated by the same principles and feelings, or differing not in kind, but in degree. Such views tell with practical benefit, and with power, upon every habit, taste and temper. While those views must necessarily be inoperative, which wrap up religion in a shroud of mystery and superstition, so as to scare men from it, by its gloomy aspect; which represents God as bestowing upon his people here a charter of privileges and immunities which they neither value nor understand; and designing hereafter to remove them, every one, from his vine and fig-tree,—and by a transportation, at which he shudders, to colonize a strange and visionary heaven, into the nature and enjoyments of which, it is deemed a prime ingredient of humility, piety, soberness and faith, not to presume to inquire. That man has found a great practical principle by which to test his pleasures here—who believes that the enjoyments of heaven are congenial to the sanctified affections of the Christian; who believes that he shall carry into eternity his very self—the tastes and tempers which now constitute his moral identity—that the change which death effects, is not of character, but of circumstances; and that this very change only gives fuller liberty and stronger stimulus to the character, whatever it may be, freely to develop, and fully to display itself.

"If such be the end of the Christian's calling, what of necessity must be the means? If such be the place to which the soul should tend, what must be the way? In other words, what is religion? Can it be that a wearisome and insipid round of ceremonial observances should conduct to those joyous mansions of spiritual bliss? Could a heart, willingly devoted to the debasing and transitory pleasures of this world, and dead to every spiritual sentiment and enjoyment, live upon the heavenly manna, the light food of angels, and not lust after the flesh-pots of Egypt? Could it eat of the fruit of the tree of life, which alone never withers, and be satisfied? Could it drink of the waters of the river of life, which alone never fail, and thirst no more? Can the bustling activities of a feverish and unsubdued mind—anxiously interested, perhaps, about the accessories of religion, but dead to its spirit—conduct the soul to those calm mansions of rest which Christianity opens upon it? Can a spirit of party in religion tune the soul to harmony with a universe? Can a mind, studious to lose itself amid the pathless labyrinths and subtle perplexities of mere theoretic knowledge, enthroning its idol tenets in the sanctuary, and submitting to them every decision of the understanding, and every affection of the heart, be fitted for that kingdom of heaven where the one doctrine and the one precept is—CHARITY? No! Religion, as the path which leads to that spiritual heaven, is the entire crucifixion; and purged by the spirit of Christ from the love and the practice of sin. It is a humble walk with God, by faith in a crucified Redeemer; in a sense of his continual presence; in an entire and cheerful dependence upon his Providence and grace. It is a resigned submission—a patient endurance—a zealous performance of His whole temper—a subjection to the cross of every sinful passion and wicked temper—a sanctifying of every affection—a faithful discharge of every relative duty, under a sense of obligation to God, as well as to man. It is a deadness to this present evil world—a weaning of the heart from time, and a fixing it upon eternity; looking "not at the things which are seen, but at the things which are not seen." It is a life guided by principle—a heart animated and warmed by love to God, ruling in a pure heart, over calm yet energetic tempers,—warm, yet restrained affections. It is the spirit of God, crowning the work of grace with His own ripe and peculiar fruits; "love, joy, peace, long-suffering, gentleness, goodness, faith, meekness, temperance." It is the gospel kingdom established in the heart; that kingdom which is "righteousness, and peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost." Such is the object to which every soul that is sincerely and intelligently engaged in the work of religion, and treading the path which leads to immortality, tends in this life, and by whose light it guides its steps.

"There but remains to invite all at once to enter upon that blessed path which conducts to eternal glory, steadily to pursue it; solemnly to warn each person to look neither to the right hand nor to the left for his example or apology. A dizzy precipice lies on both sides; therefore walk by faith, and not by sight, in the narrow path that leadeth unto life. Take the Bible into your hand, and into your closet. There seek by the faith, that you may transcribe from it upon your soul every feature and lineament of the image and the mind of Christ. Then run with patience the race which is set before you; be it rugged, or be it smooth. Look stedfastly onward to the wished for goal, upward for the promised and only effectual aid. With the free promises, the atoning sufferings, the everlasting love of your Savior, your Father and your God, on which to rest your soul, you may indeed deeply suffer, "if needs be;" but you need not fear. Let the first object of your heart's desire be to love, to resemble, and to be with Christ; and all things must work together for your everlasting good. Joys and sorrows, sufferings and consolations, must alike be ministers of mercy, because commissioned by the Father of mercies, and the God of all comfort. By faith and love, direct your prow towards the heavenly shore, and the storms of life will only bear you more rapidly to that happy land, within whose hallowed confines sin and sorrow can never enter the haven of your everlasting rest."

From the Episcopal Recorder.

"And Jesus, being wearied with his journey, sat thus on the well."

How instinctively does the Christian cling to every trait of humanity recorded in the history of his divine Master. They create an identity of feeling that gives us boldness in our petitions, when like him, we are suffering with the trials and temptations of earth.

The soothing billow sinking into silence; life moving slowly through the torpid veins, and softening the rigid muscles of the departed; the whitened leper dropping his scaly covering at the command of the great Physician, and the furious demoniac, "who wallowed foaming," yielding himself again to the tender influences of humanity;—these are the Christian's bulwarks, which tell him that his salvation was wrought out by no less a hand than that of the Eternal One. But Jesus sleeping, Jesus wearied, Jesus in tears, these are gentler forms in which he condescended to our infirmities, and here we recognize the "High Priest who can be touched with a feeling of our infirmities." "Being wearied with his journey he sat on the well." Those toil-worn limbs trembling from pure fatigue; that sacred head was bowed in weariness, and that tongue, from which flowed those rills of comfort which now refresh our noon-day path, thirsted for the cooling waters of the well of Sychar.

"But, fellow-traveler, wearied with thy journey, art thou not sitting by a well?"—Hast thou not dipped thy vessel into some fountain by the way, or said to another, "Give me to drink?" In this desert world the gayest seek some sparkling fountain at which to satisfy the craving want which cries "Give, give!" the saddest, some lonely spring at which they may cool their burning eyelids.

And thou who drinketh of the shining waters of imagination, who loseth the remembrance of the noon-day travel and the midnight darkness in the sparkling cup of fiction, drink deeply—dream on; but behold the night cometh when the fountain may be no longer bright; dream on, but the graceful shadows must lose themselves in a dark reality!

And thou, who being wearied with thy journey, hast chosen that fountain which hast its source and dwelling place in the sympathies of the human bosom, and whose waters, like those of the wilderness, need but a branch from that tree "whose leaves are for the healing of the nations," to make them sweet as "the river that makes glad the city of our God." I, a lonely pilgrim, wonder not at thy choice, for thy shelter is verdant, and thy cup inviting; and yet "the golden chord must be loosed; the pitcher must be broken; the wheel must be broken at the cistern. The dust shall return to the earth, as it was, but the spirit to God who gave it."

But lonely mourner, clad in thy weeds of sorrow, where art thou sitting? Victim of disappointed hopes, towards what fountain art thou bending thy footsteps?—"Hew not out for yourselves again those broken cisterns which can hold no water," but with humble confidence approach that fountain "opened in Israel," and "whosoever will, let him take of the waters of life freely!"

And thou, humble disciple, like thy master, wearied with thy journey, come with me, and we will seat ourselves beside the living waters which swell up from the depths of a Savior's love. The way is weary; the noon-day sun has beaten upon us; the cold dews of midnight have hung heavily upon our garments; but let us rest awhile by a well more refreshing than the waters of Sychar. And fear not that there will not be sufficient for thee and me, "for the well is deep," deep as eternity! unlimited as infinity! New life will pour itself through our languid frames, and we will go from "strength to strength, till unto the God of gods appeareth each of us in Zion."

C.

FOR SPIRITUAL PEACE.

Jesus, in whom the weary find
  Their late, but permanent repose;
Physician of the sin-sick mind,
  Relieve my heart, assuage my woes.
O let my soul on Thee be cast,
Till life's fierce conflict all is past.

Loos'd from my God, and far remov'd,
  Long have I wander'd to and fro;
O'er earth in endless circles rov'd,
  Nor found whereupon to rest below.
Back to my God I trembling fly,
For, O! the waters still are high.

Selfish pursuits and nature's maze,
  The things of earth, for Thee I leave;
Put forth thine hand, thine hand of grace,
  Into the ark of love receive.
Take this poor fluttering soul to rest,
O! take it to thy sheltering breast.

Fill with unutterable peace,
  Stablish and keep my sinking heart;
In Thee may all my wanderings cease,
  From Thee may I no more depart,
Thy utmost grace be call'd to prove,
And lov'd with everlasting love.

PRAY WITHOUT CEASING.—These words may well be interpreted according to the literal meaning of them; for if the soul can once get an absolute dominion over the passions, keeping continually a strict guard over them—if it be always duly prepared, and have in their just degrees, all the requisites of prayer, which are faith, repentance, love, humility, obedience, thankfulness, resignation, charity, and sincerity, though the man be not always upon his knees, yet his conversation will be in heaven and his soul will be so abstracted from the world, as to be exercising itself in praise, or petition, or adoration of God; which his infinite goodness will accept as devotion, though it be not accompanied with all the outward circumstances. In reality, a formal and customary kneeling, a lifting up of hands and eyes to heaven, without the heart: a cold and careless uttering of words is but the dead carcass of prayer. The life of prayer consists in the combination of the fore-mentioned dispositions, without which it can neither be satisfactory to a wise man, nor, it is to be feared, acceptable to the Almighty, who searches the heart and trieth the reins of the children of men. We should ever supplicate, "Lord teach us to pray!"—Howe.

KNOWING CHRIST.—Where does the Christan's strength lie? It lies in this alone—in believing, experimental views of the Lord Jesus Christ. If we obtain those views of our blessed Saviour, which are offered to us all, we may obtain a principle and power to resist all difficulties in our way; but this is absolutely essential. To know Christ, then, is the great lesson of our lives; to know him more and more is the single and grand lesson which every soul among us must desire on our way to heaven. For this alone, St. Paul counted all things but loss that he might be accounted of Him. This, and this alone, was that which seemed to him to sum up all other blessings in himself. What was so inexpressibly precious to St Paul, and is most precious to each believer in exact proportion to his experience of it, must be set before us all as the grand thing we have to aim at in our desires, our exertions, and our prayers.—To know the glory of Christ, the majesty of Christ, the power of Christ, the faithfulness and truth of Christ—to know his holiness—to know more & more of his tender compassion to sinners—to observe his wise and merciful dealings with his people—to observe the promises he has given, and the means by which he accomplishes them—to know how he loves us—to experience, in our own hearts, the height and depth, and length and breadth of that love which passeth knowledge—this is the business of each one who would call himself a Christian—this is the grand spiritual discovery, after which each of us must aim. For this no exertions are too great, it will infinitely more than repay every effort that we can make for it.—Rev. B. Noel.

There was at first no distinction of sects and opinions in the Church; she knew no difference of men, but good and bad; there was no seperation made, but what was made by piety and impiety, or what is all one, by fidelity and infidelity; "for faith hath in it the image of godliness engraven, and infidelity hath the character of wickedness and prevarication." A man was not then esteemed a saint for disobeying his bishop or an apostle, nor for misunderstanding the hard sayings of St. Paul about predestination; to kick against the laudible customs of the Church was not then accounted a note of the godly party; and to despise government was but an ill mark and indication of being a good Christian. The kingdom of God did not then consist in words, but in power of godliness; though now we are fallen into another method; we have turned all our religion into faith, and our faith is nothing but the productions of interest and disputing; it is adhering to party, and a wrangling against all the world beside; and when it is asked of what religion he is of, we understand the meaning to be,—what faction does he follow; what are the articles of his sect—not what is the manner of his life; and if men be zealous for their party and that interest, then they are precious men.—Jer. Taylor.

THE EVENING OF LIFE.—Amid life's varied streams, and sources of transport and pain, often mingled and often alternating, we learn at least to prefer those milder and more certain or enduring pleasures which calmly soothe us, to the bustle, the labor and excitement that engage and animate our youth and mature strength. Agitations of emotion at length lose their charm: they disturb more than they animate us. As age advances to its sober evening, we perceive and appreciate the value of conscious life without pain; of sedate tranquility; of reposing, yet not inactive thought; of sensibility without perturbation; of patient hope; of resting nobility; of sensations that please, but do not agitate; of intellectual rumination; and of those solemn aspirations of sacred foresight, of prospective gratitude, and of humble reliance on the great mediatorial Benefactor, which close our mortal days with true dignity, and make even dissolution an inestimable blessing.—Sharon Turner.

AWFUL MINISTERIAL EXAMINATION.—I confess that I seldom hear the bell toll for one that is dead, but conscience asks me, what hast thou done for the saving of that soul before it left the body? There is one more gone into eternity; what didst thou to prepare him for it? And what testimony must he give to the Judge concerning thee? Such questions will naturally occur at such a time, to every Minister, whose conscience has not lost all feeling and tenderness. When one of our flock passes the awful line of separation; or when we are laying his remains in the chamber of darkness, how can we help reflecting with ourselves, and saying, here lies the body, but where is the soul? What did I for it before it departed? It was part of my charge, what account can I give of it to God!—Baxter's Reformed Pastor.

THE TRINITY AT CREATION.—What should hinder us from accepting the solution, given by the best expositors, ancient and modern, and drawn from this consideration, that, in the Unity of the Divine Essence there is a plurality of Persons, co-equal and co-eternal, who might say, with truth and propriety, "Let us make man;" and "Man is become like one of us?" Of such a personality revelation informs us; it is that upon which the economy of man's redemption is founded; his creation, as well as that of the world, in different passages attributed to the Father, to the Son, and to the Holy Spirit; what more natural, therefore, than that, at his production, this form of speech should be used by the Divine Persons? What more rational than to suppose, that a doctrine so important to the human race, was communicated from the beginning, that men might know whom they worshiped, and how they ought to worship? What other good and sufficient reasons can be given, why the name of God, in use among the believers from the first, should likewise be in the plural number, connected with verbs and pronouns in the singular? It is true, we Christians, with the New Testament in our hands, may not want these arguments to prove the doctrine; but why should we overlook or slight, such very valuable evidence of its having been revealed and received in the church of God from the foundation of the world? It is a satisfaction, it is a comfort, to reflect that in this momentous article of our faith, we have patriarchs and prophets for our fathers; that the God of Adam; of Noah, and of Abraham, is likewise our God; and that when we adore him in three persons, and give glory to the Father, to the Son and to the Holy Ghost, we do it as it was done in the beginning, is now, and ever shall be.—Bp. Horne.

By preaching of God's word, the glory of God is enlarged, faith is nourished, and charity is increased. By it the ignorant is instructed, the negligent exhorted and incited, the stubborn rebuked, the weak conscience comforted, and to all those that sin of malicious wickedness, the wrath of God is threatened.—Grindal.

FOR THE IMPENITENT.

ETERNITY.—Suppose some little insect, so small as to be imperceptible to the human eye, were to carry this world, by its tiny mouthfuls, to the most distant star [illegible] of God has placed in the heavens. Hundred of millions of years are required for the performance of a single journey. The insect commences upon the leaf of a tree, and takes its little load so small that even the microscope cannot discover that it is gone, and sets out upon its almost endless journey. After millions and millions of years have rolled away it arrives back again to take its second load. On what interminable ages must pass before the one leaf shall be removed? In what period of coming time would the whole tree be borne away? When would the forest be gone? And when would that insect take the last particle of this globe and bear it away, in its long, long journey? Even then, eternity, endless, unchanging, [illegible] lying before it. The mind sinks down perfectly exhausted with such contemplations. Yes! our existence runs parallel with that of God. So long as he endures, so long shall that flame which [illegible] our bosoms glow [illegible] glow in the [illegible] ven, or burn with [illegible]

A[illegible] giving up [illegible] shall have [illegible] their w[illegible] [illegible] on the [illegible] [illegible] shall [illegible] ed.

The [illegible] grave, [illegible]

Ye, who have wronged [illegible] the world of hidden injuries and wrongs inflicted with deliberate malice long years since. It is dreadful [illegible] peace with [illegible] a witness against us who has been received into eternity. His tale will [illegible] judge [illegible] and we [illegible] shall be speechless [illegible] in view of solemn consideration, the Saviour said Let not the sun go down upon your wrath! O, settle with thy fellow man lest death come in the hour of his slumber, and seal up his eternal testimony against thee. Be at peace with thy [illegible] while thou art in the way with him.

FOR MOTHERS.

From the Mothers' Monthly Journal.

MATERNAL RESPONSIBILITY.

This is a theme upon which much has been said and written. It is not, in the present instance, selected for its novelty. Probably this article will contain no new ideas respecting it. Yet it is chosen as the topic of remark, from the conviction that its paramount claims upon the attention of those for whose special benefit the Journal is designed, may well justify "line upon line, and precept upon precept."

No human being is so naturally and deeply interested in the welfare of young children, as she who has brought into existence these germs of immortality. Paternal affection may be strong, but maternal is stronger. There is great beauty in the language of Isaiah, when, in enforcing the love of Christ to his church, and declaring it to exceed even that of a mother to her children, he inquires, "Can a woman forget her sucking child?" The fact that her little ones drew nourishment from her own veins, is ever remembered with indescribable emotions, by every mother who is true to the claims of nature, and constitutes a tender bond of attachment to her offspring, distinct from that which unites her to any other being on the earth.

Nor is the faithful mother's singular and sacred love towards her children wholly unreciprocated. The father may have made liberal provisions for the support and education of his sons and daughters, and he receives from them the tribute of filial gratitude and affection which he merits. But there was something in the vigilant and self-denying, patient and unassuming care and guardianship of the mother, which penetrated the inmost recesses of the young heart, and erected a hallowed altar there upon which the vestal flame was kindled, sacred to the precious recollection of a mother's love. This is, if the comparison may be allowed, in the breast of the child, what the Holy of Holies was in the Jewish temple. The poet Campbell recognizes this truth when he causes his forlorn Exile of Erin to inquire,

"Where is the mother that look'd on my childhood?"

It is well known that the first step towards leading an individual in the path of duty, is the securing of a strong hold on his affections. The more unlimited is our confidence in those who attempt to do us good, the more deep is our conviction of their pure and disinterested attachment to ourselves, the more readily are we inclined to listen to their arguments, and the more easily are we prevailed upon to yield to their persuasions. When God is about to extend the sceptre of grace to perishing sinners, the Spirit first exhibits to them His character in its matchless perfections, [illegible] in contrast their past conduct [illegible] of that law which is holy, just and good, [illegible] them that the [illegible] possible exhibition of divine compassion to their polluted souls was made by [illegible] on Calvary, and thus, by a golden chain, every link of which confirms the evidence that God is love, does He draw them to repentance.

[illegible] it is through the medium of the affections that the secret springs of the [illegible] heart [illegible] bent to holy [illegible] early youth is the most favorable period in which to impart virtuous principles, and mould the character for time and for eternity—since the attachment between the mother and her offspring is peculiar and distinct from every other—and since [illegible] the solemn trust of [illegible] direct attention to the [illegible] mind, and impressing the first stamp upon the infantine heart—who can appreciate the fearful weight of responsibility which [illegible]

[illegible] starting [illegible] those [illegible] could [illegible] infu[illegible] precept and example [illegible] which those [illegible] while they [illegible] devel[illegible] mother [illegible]

[illegible] Aaron Burr were [illegible] were daughters [illegible] Edwards. Both these mothers were [illegible] Christians, and [illegible] sons to God [illegible] The mother of the [illegible] the nurture [illegible] to witness [illegible] of her extra[illegible] interests. The mother of the latter, together with his [illegible] early childhood, [illegible] communica[illegible] remarkable [illegible] of the soul of [illegible] the recorded [illegible] of what she would have been to him, had her holy life been prolonged. Thus early bereft of parental example, protection and instruction, Aaron Burr with capacities not inferior to those of Timothy Dwight, pursued a course which has made his name a terrific beacon both in the domestic circle and in the political world; while Dr. Dwight became eminently successful in extending the boundaries of learning and religion while he lived, and left behind him a noble monument of piety and genius in his written works. Who can say but that if Mrs. Burr had lived to watch over and pray with her son, these highly gifted youth might have pursued the same narrow path, so that they would have been equally useful on the earth, and equally welcome in the heavens?

Mothers! though your children may not possess mental endowments of so high an order, with which to bless or curse mankind,—honor or offend God,—elevate or degrade themselves,—yet they do possess souls as precious, for whose salvation the same blood has been shed; and while your lives are spared, they are as much dependent upon you for their guidance aright, and you are as deeply responsible to God as were these mothers, for the manner in which you discharge the sacred trust. Oh, are you individually prepared, with reference to your children, to obey the summons, "Give an account of thy stewardship, for thou mayest be no longer steward?"

ALIQUIS.

"Let no man despise thy youth;"—as if St. Paul had said to his son in the gospel—"let your walk and conversation be so wise and so upright, that no man can despise thee."

Content is natural wealth.—Socrates.

PREVARICATION.

'Do come with me to the cricket match,' said Sarah Roberts to little Annie Cooper, one fine holiday afternoon; 'Mary James says there are two such pretty tents, and so many fine ladies and gentlemen. Do come, Annie.'

'I cannot, Sarah; indeed I cannot." Annie replied. 'Mamma told me so particularly not to go near the cricket field, because people are often hurt by the ball; and, you know she would be so very angry.'

'Oh, but she need never know it, Annie. Do come,' said Sarah coaxingly.

'But mamma would be sure to ask me where I had been, Sarah; and I dare not tell a story,' replied Annie less firmly.

'Well, you can tell her you came and fetched me, and then we took a walk past the church, and up the green lane by farmer Cummings' mill; we shall go there you know, so it will not be a story.' Thus did the naughty Sarah endeavor to persuade Annie to disobey her kind mamma; and I am sorry to say, that Annie, who so firmly refused at first, instead of leaving Sarah, and thus shunning the temptation, at length consented to go with her.

So off they set up the green lane, and past the mill, and across the meadow, and at length came in sight of the forbidden cricket field; when Annie forgot her mamma's orders, and thought only of the pretty tents, the cricketers in their white dresses, and the fine dressed ladies who looked on. She reluctantly left the field when they heard the village clock strike five.

'I hope you have had a pleasant walk, my dear,' said Annie's mamma, as she entered the room. 'Where have you been?'

'I have been with Sarah Roberts, for a nice walk, mamma,' answered Annie; up the green lane, past farmer Cummings' mill.'

'I am glad you have enjoyed yourself, my dear; and am very happy to hear that you have obeyed me, and have kept away from the cricket field,' said Mrs. Cooper; 'as I shall be able to trust you another time.'

These words smote Annie's conscience, and she felt half inclined to tell her mother all about it; but then she thought her mamma seemed so satisfied, that she would never ask her any more about it: so she sat down to tea, and talked and laughed with her brother as though nothing had happened. But be assured my little readers, that sin, sooner or later, is always found out: and so it happened now; for, in the evening, a friend of Mrs. Cooper's called upon her, and seeing Annie in the room, he exclaimed, 'So you went to see the cricket match this afternoon, Annie. I was quite surprised to see you there, without your mamma or papa.'

Annie turned red with shame and confusion; and her mamma said, 'I thought you told me you had not been there, Annie.'

'I did not tell you I had not been there, mamma; I only told you where I had been and said nothing about the cricket field,' Annie said, sobbing with shame and sorrow.

Mrs. Cooper was very much grieved to find that her little daughter was capable not only of disobeying her strict commands, but also of deceiving her by prevarication; and, after a short time, she said, 'I thought you incapable, Annie, of disobeying me; and am very sorry to find that you could not only do this, but also endeavor to deceive me by a falsehood, under the guise of truth. This prevarication is, in my opinion, worse than a direct untruth; as it shows more design and wilful depravity than a complete falsehood uttered in the shame of the moment. Remember that Ananias and Sapphira did not tell a direct untruth; but they placed the money at the Apostle's feet, wishing them to think it was all they had received for the possession they had sold. And when Peter asked Sapphira, saying, 'Tell me whether ye sold the land for so much?' She said 'Yea, for so much.' Now this did not seem a direct falsehood; she had sold it for that money, and more added to it; so you told me you had been up the green lane, past farmer Cummings' mill; so you had, but you had been somewhere else besides. You know the consequences of the sin which Ananias and Sapphira committed; they were struck by God with instant death. O, my dear child, praise God that he has not punished you in like manner, but has allowed you time to repent of your sin.'

Mrs. Cooper knelt and prayed with Annie, that God would pardon her for Christ's sake; and implored the grace of his Holy Spirit, that she might be preserved from doing such wickedness any more. Annie then rose from her knees, and received a kiss of forgiveness from her mamma, retired to her little bed-room with a light heart, which she could not have done, had her fault remained undiscovered and unpardoned.

And now, my readers, let me beseech you whilst you are young, to check every propensity that may lead you to disregard truth; and carefully avoid every word and action that may lessen your abhorrence of falsehood. Constantly endeavor to form habits of sincerity and uprightness, and shun the slightest approach to falsehood.—Remember, that 'the lip of truth shall be established forever; but a lying tongue is but for a moment.' Prov. xii. 19.

ANNE.

Example and Precept.—'There goes my teacher, if 'tis Sabbath day,' said a little boy, five years old to his mother, on observing his Sabbath school teacher taking an unnecessary walk. Precept is nothing without example. Unless teachers will daily live as they desire their scholars to live, they ought never to expect any good effect to result from their instructions.

HOLINESS NECESSARY TO SALVATION.

Different motives influence men to the same courses of conduct. In natural things the same results may be attained by both. But in moral and religious action, it will be different. To come within the pale of God's promises, and secure his favor, cannot be attained by any who act from motives of personal interest. The external conduct of a man may be correct, and all his actions, so far as the observation of men can extend, may be virtuous; yet it is in no wise certain that such an one is in favor with God. It is also possible that men may suppose themselves in possession of virtuous principles, and labor to cherish and cultivate them; and still fall under the censure of God's law—"The heart is deceitful above all things, and desperately wicked; who can know it?" Simon Magus supposed the gift of God could be purchased with money, and fondly thought that he could purchase the power to cast out devils, and, like the Apostles, work miracles, while he was in the gall of bitterness, and under the bonds of iniquity. Paul, before his conversion, verily supposed he ought to do many things contrary to Jesus of Nazareth. The seven sons of Sceva took it upon them to cast out devils in the name of Jesus, while they were strangers to that divine power which alone could purify the heart, and cause evil spirits to depart. These fell under the condemning influence of God's righteous law. If any such motives influence men now, they can not reasonably expect that different consequences will attend them.

The honor of God's throne requires that such rewards should be given to men as will, in their nature, correspond with their motives and conduct. If a man serves God for temporal gain, or to secure the good will of men, in these things only will he receive his reward. If a man performs religious duties and wears a sanctimonious appearance for the praise of men; in the praise of men is his reward. If Christ is preached through strife, or any other selfish or interested motive, and souls are thereby brought to the Savior, he who thus preaches him can not hope for a reward, because he had not the glory of God in view. And there can be little doubt that souls will be saved through the instrumentality of some who will, for that act itself, finally be cast off in the day that shall try the secrets of men's hearts. No reward can be claimed for that good which was done with evil intentions. Neither can perfect assurance be given that the divine favor will attend those who (though no evil motives influenced them) were not actuated by the single desire to glorify God. "If our unrighteousness commend the righteousness of God, what shall we say? Is God unrighteous who taketh vengeance? (I speak as a man,) God forbid; for then how shall God judge the world?" To secure the favor of God, therefore, it is necessary that both the conduct and motive be right. Otherwise God's law is dishonored, and purity and impurity are made to dwell together.

In these days of religious excitement, there is extreme danger of being influenced by sectarian feeling. We have, at some times, been grieved to see a denominational feeling more strikingly exhibited in revivals, than a pure desire for the conversion of souls. And always at such times we have seen the withering and deadening effect that has followed. If professors of religion are influenced more by denominational pride, and a desire to increase the number of their sect, than by aspirations after holiness and efforts to extend religion in its purity; may they not expect their reward in those things which they have most desired? If we labor for one man, we have no equitable claim on another for pay for our services. If we serve our own desires, or sect, and not Christ; our reward will consist in the gratification of those desires, or the advancement of that sect, and not in the reward of the righteous which the Savior gives to those who love and serve him. If, then, we will have eternal life—the joys of heaven—a crown of righteousness—we will secure them by giving to Christ our hearts, and letting our eyes observe his ways, though by doing it we sacrifice our comforts, our good name, and our denominational feeling. The disappointment of that soul must be inexpressibly bitter that has fondly "dreamed of heaven," when the last day shall reveal to himself and the assembled world the hidden evils that have lurked in the heart and influenced the conduct. It were better not to dream of heaven than to meet such a disappointment. And yet it is feared that it will attend those who aim not to do the will of God with singleness of heart. To presume on the mercy of God, and to indulge in sin willingly, is virtually to despise God, and provoke his wrath. To shut the eyes to the truth, and to sear the conscience as with a hot iron, is the most effectual method of hardening the heart, and driving the Holy Spirit from it. The sin of ignorance must be regarded as equal with the sin of disobedience, when ignorance is cherished at the expense of keeping the truth from the understanding. A cherished ignorance and a cherished sin, must eventually bring destruction and misery to the soul.

The way of the transgressor, in heart, motive, or conduct, is hard. But great and continued peace have they that love the law of the Lord, and nothing shall offend them. Heaven, and the presence of the Lord shall be the inheritance of the pure in heart forever.

SANDWICH ISLANDS.

During the first evening of the session of the Cortland Presbytery in this village, Mr. Vanderzee, who has resided three years as a Missionary on the Sandwich Islands, gave an interesting account of the origin and progress of the mission. The first missionaries sailed from Boston in 1819, and arrived the following year. Just previous to their arrival, the King had forbidden Idol worship, and changed other customs for selfish purposes, so that when these missionaries arrived, the natives, being without any religion, were more ready to receive the gospel. On their arrival they were forbidden to land by the governor, who was influenced in this by certain wicked foreigners residing there. After repeated requests they were permitted to remain one year only at first, and to teach the gospel to none but the king and chiefs. At this time there was no written language there. The missionaries commenced their labors by forming an alphabet, (which is the same as the English with three exceptions) and taught the king and chiefs to read. From the interest felt by the king he permitted them at the close of the first year to remain another, and then permanently. Having thus established themselves with the king and chiefs, the missionaries had ready access to the common natives.

The population of the Islands is from 100,000 to 120,000. Of these there are about 40,000 that can read, and 20,000 that can read intelligibly. Previous to 1836 there were but about 800 pious natives on the Island. The missionaries wrestled with uncommon fervency and zeal in prayer to God, and the answer was almost immediately felt in the conversion of about 11,000. The blessings of civilization accompany the spread of the gospel there.

Very great regard is paid to the observation of Sunday. The native churches do much towards sustaining the mission.—They have sent two of their number to the Rocky Mountains, who are there laboring for the advancement of the gospel. Most of the children are now receiving instruction from the missionaries or native teachers.

Many interesting facts were presented relative to the former and present moral character of the natives, their customs, mode of life and government; also, relative to the soil of the country, food, wealth and occupation of the inhabitants. Few of the barbarities now exist which formerly characterised them; such as want of natural affection, and habits of indolence and crime.

Surely the Lord has been good to the Sandwich Islands. May the precious gospel soon be extended to all the Isles of the Sea, and to every heathen nation. Thousands were converted on the Sandwich Islands in answer to prayer. Will not Christians love to pray for other heathen? Surely they will. The voice of prayer will continue to ascend until the Isles of the Sea shall turn to the Lord, and all nations join in singing "worthy is the Lamb that died to redeem us, and make us kings and priests to our God."

RELIGION—POLITICS.

The religion of the Bible, and party politics, are so dissimilar that both cannot possess the heart together. "Ye can not serve two masters." Religion demands the heart and life. Party politics monopolizes the same. The former calls for the discreet exercise of the judgment. The latter intoxicates the senses by an excitement of the passions. The former is of divine origin and seeks the temporal and eternal good of all men. The latter is of lower birth, and is best pleased with personal advancement.

The exercise of the elective franchise, however, is manifestly the privilege of the Christian, and it may become his duty; yet every Christian who will make politics the subject of his meditation—the theme of his conversation—will find that it will drive Christ from his heart, and that "peace which passeth understanding," from his soul. It is the duty of the Christian to be a Patriot, also; but it cannot be his duty to enter the whirlpool of political excitement, and fan the flame of party feeling and prejudice in his heart till it destroys his relish for the high and holy exercises of religion. We fear that many professors of religion, under the influence of party zeal, forget that "The king's heart is in the hand of the Lord; as the rivers of water he turneth it whithersoever he will."

Christians are exhorted by an Apostle to make prayers, supplications, and intercessions, for those in authority, that under them we may lead peaceable and quiet lives in all godliness and honesty. If this exhortation were attended to by Christians, they would do more towards securing honest rulers than it is possible for them to, by entering the giddy whirlpool of party excitement. While we ask Christians not to forget their high calling in their party zeal, we would ask them to use those means (if any) that are in accordance with the spirit and precepts of the gospel to secure rulers who fear God. We ask no one to deny himself the exercise of constitutional rights, but we ask all Christians in the exercise of these rights to exhibit the Patriot and the Christian. Let men of this world contend about worldly matters; but let the Christian be heavenly minded, and do all things to the glory of God.

Elections.—The most vigorous efforts are now made throughout the country to secure the election of certain officers. Almost every mind is excited upon this subject.

A more important election is also at hand. The Great King of Heaven is electing his saints. He is inviting all to receive a crown of righteousness—to become kings and priests—to be made infinitely rich, honorable, and happy. His spirit is inviting,—his word says come,—his embassadors exhort saying, "all things are ready." "Come and welcome."

What say you to this invitation? to the crowns, and thrones, and joys that are offered? Will earthly crowns equal them? and can they shine brighter than the sun in its meridian glory? Vanity and disappointment are written on all such, and but few of all can obtain them. But the rich inheritance of heaven is free for all.

You, perhaps, are anxious that the appointed day shall not pass without the election of your favorite candidates. There is a time beyond which, it may be impossible for you to be elected a saint of God. That time may be before the Nov. election. If you allow that time to pass unimproved, your loss will be irreparable.

EDWARD C. DELAVAN.

We have received the report of the trial of E. C. Delavan, for an alleged libel.—The suit was brought by John Taylor, a Brewer of Albany, for certain publications which declared that impure water was used by brewers. It appeared in evidence that water was taken from a pond which was supplied from the wash of the ground, and not from springs. Dead dogs, and cats, were cast into it. It received the wash from several other dead animals. It likewise received the wash of a glue factory, and of several sewers. The pond seldom contained pure water. From seven hogsheads of water taken from this pond, the filth was several inches, from three to ten, in depth after settling. After a patient hearing of the evidence, the Jury retired, and, after a consultation of about an hour, agreed upon their verdict, which was, FOR THE DEFENDANT WITH COSTS.

This report should be in the hands of all. Two dollars remitted, post paid, to J. Marsh, Clinton Hall, New York, or E. H. Pease, Albany, will secure 100 copies.

THE CONTRAST.

Multitudes are ever ready to throng places of public amusement—to join in the festive dance and make merry with the senseless, the giddy, and profane; while few are found, who love the courts of God—the communion of saints, and the holy and delightful exercises of religion. The Scriptures inform us that "wide is the gate, and broad is the way, that leadeth to destruction; and many there be that go in thereat; Because, strait is the gate, and narrow is the way, which leadeth unto life, and few there be that find it". We are also assured that an innumerable multitude of sinners will fall short of eternal life, while the righteous only, shall be glorified and made happy in heaven. Reader, which is your choice?

Errata.—In the Register of the 8th Inst. in the last paragraph of the article under the caption, 'St Paul's Spirit of Accommodation'—for 'meetings' read writings, and for 'interpolation', read interpretation. The MS. was correct.

TEMPERANCE AMONG CATHOLICS.

The Catholics in many places in the United States, are taking the Total Abstinence pledge almost en masse. Perhaps there is not a religious society that has done so little comparatively in the temperance cause as the Catholic. From their present efforts we are encouraged to hope that their diligence may atone in some degree for former negligence. There is a broad field before them. And if they succeed in driving intemperance from their church, they will be more fortunate than some others, and will be more entitled to the praise of working miracles, than they are for many of which they boast.

Ladies' Companion.—The Ladies' Companion for Sept. has come to our table. It is embellished with a steel engraving, exhibiting "a view from Mount Ida (near Troy)", and a plate of the Fall Fashions. The Companion is second to no periodical in its literary character. The most eminent American writers are contributors to its columns.

FIRE.—The house of J. R. Rider, of this village, was discovered to be on fire last Wednesday evening, during the absence of the family. By the timely efforts of the Fire Company and citizens the flames were soon arrested. Damage estimated at $300. Insured for $190. Much praise is due to several Ladies for their efficient action.

Dreadful Shipwreck.

FIFTY LIVES LOST.

By the arrival of the brig Attention, Capt. McCurdy, at Boston, from St. Johns, Newfoundland. Messrs. Topliff of the News Room received the following melancholy recital, probably furnished to Capt. McCurdy by the chief mate of the Florence, who was one of the passengers on board the Attention.

The Florence, as stated below, belonged to this port. She was 197 tons burden, and was built at Brunswick, Maine, about a year ago. She was owned by Balger & Peck, of this city, and Captain Samuel Rose of Freeport, Maine, and was insured in the Safety office for $11,000.

NARRATIVE.

The following disaster is one of those awful occurrences of which the south-eastern coast of Newfoundland is often the scene. The brig Florence, of and for New York, Samuel Rose, master, sailed from Rotterdam, June 30, with a crew of 8 persons and seventy-nine passengers. Cargo, ballast and a few casks of wine. They were favored with pleasant weather until nearly up with the eastern part of the banks of Newfoundland, when they were assailed with a succession of gales, attended with fog and rain, up to the time of their shipwreck.

On Sunday morning, August 9, the man on the look-out cried "hard down the helm, breakers ahead." The helm was immediately put a lee, but before the sails were taken aback, the brig struck the rocks on her starboard side. A moment before she wss going at the rate of seven or eight miles the hour. She instantly filled and fell over on her side, when a scene of confusion and terror presented itself, the horror of which can be better imagined than described. Here were the wife and husband bidding each other a last farewell.—the frantic mother clasping her infant to her bosom, as if even death itself should not separate them,—while some few who had no relations on board, were endeavoring to secure what money they had, by fastening it to their bodies, but which, alas, proved the means of their destruction. For that which they vainly thought would secure to them a comfortable home in the fertile lands of the far west, changed their destiny to an eternal home in death. On attempting to swim to the land, the weight of the money sunk them to the bottom.

Capt. Rose, with commendable coolness, commanded all to remain by the wreck until some means were devised for escaping with safety. For this purpose, Mr. William Robbs of Springfield, Mass., took the head of a line and sprang from the vessel to a ledge which lay between her and the shore. An overwhelming wave, however, overtook the devoted sailor, and dashed him against the rocks a mangled corpse. Capt. Rose next attempted this, the only means of saving those on board. He was more fortunate, and reached the land in safety. The crew were all saved except the second mate. But only thirty of the seventy-nine passengers were saved, and of these, many were saved by Capt. Rose and Mr. Schofield, chief mate, at the imminent peril of their own lives; and by the time these were saved, about three hours after the brig struck, there were scarcely two of her planks together. All were literally in splinters.

Thus thirty-seven persons were thrown ashore on a barren, and to them unknown part of the coast. Many of them were but half-clad, and most of them were without shoes. Not a solitary biscuit was saved. In this pitiable condition they commenced their journey through thick woods and swamps, and over bleak and rugged hills, in hopes of finding some human habitation.

For four days they continued their course governed chiefly by the wind—the sun, moon and stars being obscured nearly all the time by the fog and rain squalls, which latter were very frequent—sometimes eating the bark from the trees, and what few berries they could find. Early on the morning of the 13th, Capt. Rose and Mr. Schofield ascended a hill in hopes the fog might clear off, and afford them a view of the surrounding country. At 9 o'clock the weather cleared a little, and they were enabled to see the harbor and village of Renouse. The happy intelligence was soon communicated to the rest, and they resumed their march with lighter hearts. When they entered the village, its hospitable inhabitants welcomed them with every thing which their present need demanded. Mr. Goodrich of whose benevolence the crew and passengers speak in the warmest terms of gratitude, gave money and clothes to them, and furnished a vessel to convey them to St. Johns, the residence of the U. S. conseler agent.

At 7, P. M., on Saturday the 15th, they were landed at St. Johns. The news of their arrival soon brought to the shore, rich and poor, old and young, some thrusting bread into the hands of the shipwrecked strangers, and others taking the poor wretches home with them. Nothing was spared which pity could suggest to alleviate their wants and sufferings. The next day being Sunday, nothing was publicly done for them; but on Monday handbills were posted up, requesting a meeting to take place at the Chamber of Commerce, to devise means to relieve the necessities of those whom fate had thrown upon their shores. Some seventy or eighty pounds were collected in a short time, and resolutions were passed to raise a sufficient sum whereby the emigrants might be enabled to reach the place of their destination. A committee was appointed to receive clothing and money from all who felt disposed to give. Capt. McCurdy did not hear the result, as he sailed on the following morning, but thinks, from the philanthropic spirit manifested by the people of St. Johns, that these unfortunate people were amply provided for.

MEXICO.

The outbreak in the capital has had its day, and the government of Senor Bustamente is once more on its legs, though somewhat shaken. The revolution, which commenced on the 15th of July, was brought to a close on the 26th, after ten days of fighting and three of negociation. The bloodshed was horrible; 80 of the actual belligerents and 400 peaceable inhabitants are said to have been killed.

The negociations were commenced on the 23d, but not concluded until the 26th, when a convention was agreed to, as follows:—

Art. 1. The lives, persons, offices, and property (of the insurgents) are guaranteed, in every sense of the word; the term offices to be understood as applying to those conferred by the Supreme Government.

2. The general in chief, D. Gabriel Valencia, offers in every legal manner possible, to use his influence with the general government to procure from Congress a reform of the constitution.

3. All the political events which have occurred from the 14th inst. to the present, shall be buried in utter oblivion,—the forces which may have adhered to the plan adopted in this capital on the said 15th inst., being included in this convention.

4. A free passport out of the Republic shall be granted to any individual of the persons included in this convention, at his own request, even though an action may be pending against him for political opinions.

5. The insurgent troops shall retire to such position as His Excellency Gen. Gabriel Valencia shall select; and he shall also designate what general of the insurgents shall command them. The latter will be responsible for any disorders which may be committed, and for the fulfilment of the orders which the aforesaid general may have given.

6. His Excellency, the general-in-chief, Gabriel Valencia, and the generals of his army, pledge their honor before the whole world, to cause this convention to be faithfully and legally fulfilled, in all its parts.

7. This convention will be applicable only to Mexicans.

8. This convention, as soon as it is ratified by the chiefs of both parties, shall be promptly carried into effect, and in order to afford time for its ratification, hostilities shall continue suspended until the morning of the 27th.

Mexico, July 26th, 1840. In the edifice of the Great Society, 11 o'clock at night.

A letter in the Journal of Commerce, dated July 28th, says that the Federalist troops marched out of the city on the 27th, with their weapons, artillery, &c. It was rumored, however, that instead of giving up their arms at a village designated for that purpose, they fortified themselves on a hill, three leagues from the city. There does not appear to be any stipulation for the surrender of weapons in the convention.

Gen. Urrea had fled, and Farias, the provisional President, also.

Installation of a Huron Chief.—On Wednesday, Aug. 19, I saw a singular and interesting ceremony, at the Indian village of Lorette, near Quebec. Mr. Ed. Seguin (the favorite vocalist) was created a chief of the Hurons, by the name of "Wach-n-wachn," signifying an aquatic bird of passage, possessing a strong and most harmonious note, called "The Great Diver."—About noon, the chiefs, squaws, and the entire village, all, dressed in their picturesque costume, with their paint on, rings and feathers, &c., were, by the sound of cannon, assembled in the Hall of Council, a large square room, rudely furnished. Mr. Seguin was attired "en Indien," and having been conducted to the seat "d'honneur," the ceremonies commenced with the grand chief Nicholas addressing the new member in a speech in the Huron tongue, interrupted occasionally by the words "Huntaw," or "hear" "hear," of the tribe. The speech concluded, he then shook hands, and reseated himself; after a long silence, another chief, Stanislas, advanced to the chief elect, and spoke in like manner; and so the third, and fourth;—during the above, you must imagine the Hall of Council to be filled (by the village tribe, chiefs, squaws, with their papooses: strangers invited by Mr. Seguin, all in their gayest holiday attire,) with the exception of a large circle where stood an immense cauldron of soup, around which were again about 60 bowls, each person in the village being compelled to carry away some portion of soup—near this, and opposite to the chiefs, on a wooden tripod, stood a ram's head—after the foregoing, the priest (and also interpreter) of the tribe, advanced and spoke with much dignity and solemnity—the subject of his speech was, that the rank of chief had been confered upon Mr. Seguin, in grateful remembrance of the kindness and hostility to the principal chiefs of their village, when in London, in the year 1825, shewn to them by himself and father: he added, that in the names of those very chiefs (three of whom were present) he was proud, after fourteen years, to be enabled, in their own village, to give a small return to him, who, in a distant land, had proffered the hand of welcome and friendship. This oration was received with the utmost enthusiasm.

The grand chief then again taking his hand, led Mr. Seguin round the cauldron, slowly dancing and chaunting a wild but melodious strain, with occasional chorus: this was repeated by every chief; and then the diploma was presented, written first in the Huron tongue (read by the priest,) in English (read by Hotsawati,) and lastly, in French (read by a relative of the priest.) Mr. Seguin then returned his thanks in a neat speech in French; and with Mrs. Seguin and Mr. Horncastle (who were present,) sang "God save the Queen," with the most soul-stirring effect; this over, the soup was distributed, and the company dispersed. The chiefs retiring with a few select friends to a cold collation furnished for them by Mr. Seguin at a comfortable house of entertainment near the village, where mirth and music reigned paramount.

After the repast, the whole village in procession came to conduct in triumph their new chief back to the council chamber, where the warriors exhibited their curious dances, and a ballat of action, describing the taking, scalping, and destruction of a prisoner.—At 6 o'clock we left, highly gratified by ceremonies, at one so curious and imposing, and so seldom to be seen; as it is only on rare occasions, and for some service rendered them by the white man, that they, the Hurons, ever confer this, the highest honor they have in their power to bestow.

The carriage drove off, amidst the roar of cannon, ringing of bells, and huzzas of a gratified and noble tribe of Indians.—Montreal Courier.

Horrible.—A girl, named Anne Johnson, formely of Salem, Mass., and who once sustained a good character, was enticed from her home, a few years since, by a man residing in New York. She lived with him until the villian forsook her, when she abandoned herself to vice. A short time ago she died, suddenly at the age of 18, and the Coroner who held an inquest on her body, retuned a verdict of, "Death from intemperate habits!"—Lowell paper.

Only eighteen! yet mature in vice.—Lately so modest and buoyant with hope,—now sunk to the depths of infamy, and even into the grave, at the early age of eighteen! You have a mother perhaps, and brothers and sisters, and a father; and they have been following you in their thoughts through all the changes which have come over you, and their hearts have been wrung with anguish as they saw how rapidly you were hastening to ruin. From a regard to their own reputation, they hid their sorrow within their own bosoms, but it was thereby rendered more intense.—This last act of the drama has put an end to their anxieties, by realizing their fears. Their daughter and sister, whom once they prized above price, is gone to the grave, the miserable victim of seduction and vice. They weep for her as those without hope. There is nothing to alleviate their sorrow. They will never be comforted; though time will abate the poignancy of their grief.—When it is considered that all the wretched inmates of the brothel,—every one of the many thousands who inhabit our large cities,—has near relatives somewhere, bound to her by the ties of nature and affection, following her with their prayers and tears, yet almost despairing of her reformation,—and when we look upon her in her debasement, and think what she once was, and what she might have been had she continued in the paths of virtue,—what an idea is presented of the misery of vice! Though its exterior is often beautiful, at last it biteth like a serpent and stingeth like an adder. If there is one man, more than all others, who deserves to be driven from society, as a murderer of innocence and hope,—as a heartless demon, whose smile is death,—it is THE SEDUCER. Aye, the seducer.—He "enticed her from her home,"—and here is the result!—J. of Com.

A Domestic Frog.—In Siliman's Journal there is an account of a frog in a perfect state of domestication, in the possession of Dr. Wm. Rools of Kingston. It appears that the lower offices of the house are what are called underground on the banks of the Thames. This little reptile accidentally appeared to his servant emerging from a hole in the skirting of the kitchen, and for the first year constantly withdrew on their approach. From their kindness, however, and from partaking of food given to him, he gradually acquired habits of familiarity, and during the following three years regularly came out every day, particularly at meal time, and partook of the food given to him by the servants. One of the most remarkable features of its artificial state of existence was his strong partiality for warmth, as during the winter he regularly (contrary to the cold-blooded tendendcy of his nature,) came out of his hole in the evening, and directly made for the hearth, in front of a good kitchen fire, where he would continue to bask and enjoy himself until the family retired to rest. There happened to be at the same time, a favorite old domestic cat, and a sort of attachment existed between the two incongruous inmates; the frog frequently nestling under the warm fur of the cat, whilst the cat appeared extremely jealous of interrupting the comforts and conveniences of the frog.

Another Texian Tiger.—A late Houston Mornig Star gives the particulars of a desperate rencontre between a Mr. F—— and a large tiger on the Banks of the La Bacca river, which occurred recently. Mr. F—— furnishes the editor with the statement himself. It seems this gentleman was hunting cattle in the "bottoms," and after forcing his way for half a mile through the thick cane in order to strike across from one path to another; he heard a rattling and cracking of the breaks in a partial opening a short distance before him; supposing that he had come up with the object of his search he hastened forward. As he came within ten feet of the spot, he saw crouched upon his belly in the attitude of springing, an enormous tiger. His eyes were fixed with fiery intensity upon him, his tail was vibrating slowly, and every moment showed the animal to be just ready to spring.

Mr. F—— quickly cocked his rifle and brought it to his shoulder. The spring and shot was almost simultaneous. As the animal struck the ground with a yell he writhed and rolled, and uttered unearthly yellings for nearly a minute, when he seemed exhausted. Mr. F—— then drew his Bowie knife, and stealthily approached as the animal lay with his back towards him, and drove the steel to the handle in his side. A sharp yell and spasms, and he was dead. The ball had entered the region of the heart. This was one of the largest tigers ever killed in Texas, and equal in almost every respect to the Royal Bengal Tiger of the East. It measured 14 feet from the tip of the nose to the extremity of the tail. Mr. F—— took the skin from the monster and keeps it as a trophy.

A Reminiscence.—The little paragraph which appeared in the Sun a few days since relative to the original Declaration of Independence in the office of the Secretary of State at Washington, has elicited from the veteran chirographer, Mr. B. O. Tyler's fac simile copy of the Declaration, taken by him in 1817, at which time Josias W. King, Esq., then clerk in the State Department, had charge of it for more than twenty-five years. At that time it was kept enclosed in a tin case; and when the capitol was burned by the British during the late war Mr. King took the Declaration, all the treaties, and as many other valuable papers as he could carry, and fled with them to Montgomery Court House, Md.,—thereby preserving them from the general destruction.—When J. Q. Adams came into the State Department, he had the Declaration taken out of its tin case, elegantly framed, enclosed it in a mahogany case, and hung it up in the Secretary's room—the case being provided with a door, by opening which any one can see the original. The splendid full length portrait of Washington, by Stewart, owes its preservation from the conflagration to Mrs. Madison. When that heroine saw the capitol in flames, she took her carving knife and cut the portrait out of the frame in which it hung, rolled it up, got into her carriage and drove with it to Montgomery Court House, where it, with the public documents, was preserved.—N. Y. Sun.

Spaniards at Onondaga Lake.—There is reason to believe that the Onondagas were visited by the Spaniards over land from Florida, long before the planting of the English colonies in America. The Spaniards, in their eagerness for the discovery of mines of the precious metals, seized upon every indication of the existence of gold and silver, with the greatest avidity. The Florida Indians had heard of the Onondaga lake, and of the white mineral substance deposited along the edge of its waters. This deposite was nothing more than salt from the springs, oozing through the circumjacent marshes. Hearing this white substance described, the companions of De Soto doubted not that it was silver. Indeed, the rumor came to be that the bottom of the lake was paved with silver, and a body of Spaniards crossed the country, from Florida to Onondaga, to discover it and take possession. So says tradition; and the antiquaries have made various discoveries in this neighborhood, tending strongly to its confirmation.—Com. Adv.

Galena Gold.—The Galena Democrat says:—"We were yesterday shown a lump of Virgin Gold picked up on the surface of the ground in Iowa Territory, a short distance from Galena. This is the first piece of gold that has been found in this section of the country, and we have no doubt, when search is fully made, that it will be found in large quantities." It is possible that gold may be discovered among the other minerals of the northwestern region of the U. States: but the surest and easiest method of procuring it there, as well as elsewhere, we imagine, will be to plough for it.

The Connecticut Meteor.—A gentleman who has just returned from Stratford, Conn., states that in the southern part of Trumbull, three miles from where he was, a fragment of stone fell to the earth, of the size of a peck measure. This stone fell in a private path, ploughing along for some distance, and scorching the grass all the way. No other fragments had as yet been found. It is conjectured that the explosion of the body of which this was a part, caused the "earthquake" of the 16th ult.—Journal of Commerce.

Misses Frances Ingraham, Adeline Thurston, Julia Ann Milliken, Caroline and Elizabeth Isley, were lately drowned near Portland, by the upsetting of the boat Banner, in which they with some others were on a pleasure excursion. They were shut in the cuddy of the boat, and could not be taken out until life had fled. They were taken up and placed side by side on the deck of the Water Lilly which came to their assistance, and conveyed to their friends. A few moments hurried them from active, joyous life, to the eternal world.

Mr. Norris of Philadelphia, has made an arrangement with the agent of the Emperor of Russia, to furnish him 200 Locomotive engines, for $1, 400, 000. Forty are to be delivered each year. They are principally to run upon the Rail Road between St. Petersburg and Moscow.

The Africans of the Amistead are at Westville, 2 or 3 miles from New Haven. They are rapidly learning to speak our Language. Some of them can read the New Testament intelligibly. They are uncommonly susceptible of religious impressions. They are very anxious to return to Africa. With one or two exceptions, they possess very strong minds.

The Indians have lately committed great mischief in Camden county, Georgia. Several persons have fallen victims to their cruelties.

The number of passengers that have arrived at the port of New York from foreign countries, from Jan. 1st to the 1st Inst. is 48,492.

The Lion and Lioness presented to the President of the United States by the Emperor of Morocco, have been sold at Philadelphia. The former for $250, the latter for $125.

Texas.—The Texians under Maj. Gen. Felix Houston, had an engagement with the Camanches on the 12th ult. Upwards of 40 Indians were killed, 2 taken prisoners, and 200 horses and mules captured. The Texians had 1 killed, and 7 wounded—one mortally.

M' Conoughy has been found guilty of the murder of Mrs Brown and five children and an attempt on the life of Mr. Brown. The hope of obtaining a small amount of property induced him to the act.

A Destructive Avalanche occurred at New Orleans on the 21st ult. between Conti and St. Louis streets. It destroyed the wharves for some distance. It swept away a quantity of sugar and other produce which lay upon the wharf. Such slides are taking place every year doing immense damage.

Remarkable Natural Phenomenon.—The New Orleans Picayune says there is an infant in Georgia, whose head is thirty five inches in circumference, and is larger, and weighs more than all the rest of the body.

A Flouring mill at Lockport, valued at $35,000; together with 2,500 bushels of wheat were burned on the night of the 31st ultimo.

Eleven thousand papers are published in the United States, and thirteen thousand in the civilized world.

Iowa.—The Burlington Gazette states that the health of Iowa Teritory is, thus far this season, universally good. The crops of wheat, rye, and oats have been as abundant as usual, and the crop of corn will be very large.

Dr. Hines.—Doct. Hines, alias James Walker, convicted in New Orleans on the charge of negro stealing, was, on Saturday 22d ult. sentenced to imprisonment in the penitentiary for 14 years.

Canal Tolls.—The tolls collected on all the State Canals, from the opening of navigation to the close of July, in each of the last six years, are as follows, viz:

1835,	$702,971
1836,	712,013
1837,	526,768
1838,	677,105
1839,	761,422
1840,	715,271

The average for each of the six years is $682,541. The tolls of 1840 are only $12,900 more than they were for the same period in 1835, and are $46,151 less than they were last year.

Frog found in Coal.—On Wednesday morning as two colliers, George Ross and James Gardner, were in one of the Rooms of the Old Muirfield Pit, at Gargieston, they found a living frog embedded in the solid seam of coal, at least twelve fathoms beneath the surface of the earth. The niche in which it had lived was perfectly smooth inside, of the exact shape of the frog and without a crack or crevice to give admittance to air. The hind legs of the animal are at least a third longer than usual, the fore legs shorter, the toes longer and harder, and its general color is of a bronze shade. It leaped briskly about the moment that it was excavated from its narrow cell.—How many centuries it has been shut out from light and air, and entombed in its dreary dormitory, it is impossible to say—certain it is, that although diminutive in form and with great brilliancy of eye, it has a most antediluvian aspect.—Edinburg Courant.

Wisdom of Cherokee Rulers.—We learn through John Ross, a principal cheif, that the council of his nation have passed a law making the traffic in ardent spirits a penal offence, and the consequence has been, that 15,000 gallons on its way into the nation, were stopped and re-shipped. Let the rulers of more refined and superior nations learn wisdom from the simple and unsophisticated child of nature.—Bapt. Record.

Captain Talcott and Professor Renwick, the Commissioners appointed to explore the Northeastern Boundary Line, have had a colleague assigned them from the Topographical Bureau, to fill the vacancy caused by the resignation of Professor Cleaveland.

Major James Graham, who has lately been employed in the determination of the Boundary which divides us from Texas, is the officer appointed.

Something New.—Among the candidates offered yesterday for admission to the freshman class at Cambridge, was a pupil of the Perkins Institution for the Blind—a youth of sixteen, blind from his birth. He passed a perfectly satisfactory examination in all the branches, and was duly admitted. He has been a pupil of the institution over six years, and has acquired, besides an acquaintance with the branches requisite for admission to college, a knowledge of the French language and of the science of music.

We were anxious to know how this youth who has entered college was to progress in his studies, as all the books are not printed in raised letters, and we learned that he is assisted by a lad with a pair of eyes, who reads his lesson, looks out words in the dictionary, consults the grammarian, &c. His lesson once committed, he goes to his tutor, who reads passages to him, for instance in Greek; these he will translate and parse with ease, and such is the increase, of the power of memory by this practice, that it goes far to counterbalance the loss of sight.—Boston Journal.

Manuscript Books.—Before the invention of printing, fifty years were sometimes employed in producing a single volume. At the sale of Sir. W. Burrel's books, May, 1796, there was displayed a manuscript Bible, on vellum, beautifully written with a pen, and illuminated, which had taken upwards of half a century to perform; the writer, Guido de Jars, began it in his fortieth year, and did not finish it till he was upwards of ninety.

Furious Riding.—While a large collection of people were assembled yesterday afternoon in Chatham street, opposite the Hall of Records, witnessing the engine performances, a Frenchman, named Napoleon Davise, a lapidary, who resides at Hoboken, came riding down Chatham street at a furious rate, and regardless of the danger of the proceeding, dashed with his horse into the crowd, running over a little girl about eight years of age, by which the child was very badly hurt about the head and face. She was rescued by some spectators, who took her into a public house opposite, and had her injuries properly taken care of; while others secured the horse and rider, conveyed them to the police office, and Davise was temporarily committed to prison to await further proceedings.

The metropolis comprises an area of 70 square miles, of about 9 1-2 miles in diameter, and thus assuming a radius of five miles from St. Paul's Cathedral. Every year London is adding to its population that of a city equal to York. The total population of the metropolis is now 1,950,000, and by the end of next year it will exceed 2,000,000, and in ten years a population of 400,000 has been added, which is as much as the ancient city in the time of Charles the II.

Petition for Freedom.—Negro girl Agnes, hitherto a slave, the property of Mr. George Shaw of Virginia, petitioned the court for her freedom, showing cause of action in that her master had brought her from the state of Virginia, and offered her for sale in the city of Baltimore. John Scott and Hugh Davey Evans, Esqs. appeared on behalf of the petitioner, & John Glenn, Esq. for the respondent. The counsel for the petitioner succeeded in establishing their proof, and his honor Judge Brice gave a decision, accompanied with some remarks in point, in favor thereof.

The counsel for the respondent stated that an appeal would be had from the decision.—Baltimore American.

POETRY.

From the Methodist Protestant and Family Visitor.

LINES FROM MY JOURNAL.

Another kinsman dead! I scarcely knew
He had a being till I learned to mourn
His premature departure.

Ah, 'tis thus,—
The truths, we might have triumphed to believe
Had we been taught them sooner, come at length
With an unwelcome message to the heart
By coming there too late: 'Tis like the wind
That breathes the cold of winter, and should sweep
Across December's snow, but lingers there,
To burst in blighting on the blossomed Spring.
But why raise I this murmur? Wake my soul
To far more general sorrow: bleed my heart
With pangs of sterner anguish. Can'st thou weep?
O, has the fount of sympathy no drop
To bathe the spirit's altar, in the hour
Of prayer for the unhappy, the oppress'd!
I know it has: the breast that never felt
For its own woes must feel for other's here.
Ah, weep then: for the Unbeliever, weep!
How self-deluded is the erring mind
That will not turn to see the light of truth,
But in its own perverseness sows the seed
Of darkness through its sojourn, and of death—
Eternal death—beyond the silent tomb.
Is Infidelity immortal there?
Shall scepticism doubt forevermore?
No—no—it cannot be. The time will come
When Death shall rouse the sleeper from his trance,
And Judgment answer every cavil-dream,
And vast Eternity proclaim the truth.
O had he learned it sooner! Would to God
He had not so long doubted! Never more
Can he be unbelieving. He must learn
When such dread monitors arise to teach
What they have made so dreadful and so true.
'Great God of Mercy!——————
——————but the prayer were vain.
Can I call back my kinsman, and renew
The chequered visions of his three-score years?
Is there a strength in this weak arm of mine
To stay the course of nature! to endow
Her suns and systems with a grander flight?
Dare I uplight the standard of revolt
Where angels tremble but to raise the eye?
And combat with His vengeance who called forth
My name from dust, and gave a single breath
To be its light, and loveliness, and soul!
Presumption claims its offspring. Thus to think
Were madness worse than Bedlam could retain.
I durst not pray then for the fallen soul.
O I should veil my face as in the dust,
And let the chill of terror freeze my heart,
When e'en the Spirit may not intercede,
And Jesus's prayer is changed into the doom,
"Depart ye cursed! Evermore depart!"

DISTANCE OF THE FIXED STARS.

Some readers, from their ignorance of the mathematical principles of astronomy, and from being incapable of appreciating the observations to which we have referred, are apt to view with a certain degree of skepticism the conclusion which astronomers have deduced respecting the distances and magnitude of the stars. Perhaps the following consideration, level to the capacity of every man of common sense, may have a tendency to convince even the most skeptical that the stars are situated at an almost incalculable distance from the earth.

Suppose a telescope to magnify 400 times, that is, make a distant object appear four hundred times nearer, and four hundred times larger in diameter, than to the naked eye. With an instrument of this description I have been enabled to read a person's name, the letters of which were not above half an inch in length or breadth, at the distance of more than two miles. When this telescope is directed to the moon, it enables us to perceive the shadows of its mountains, and other minute portions of its scenery, and even to distinguish rocks and cavities less than a mile in diameter. When directed to the planet Venus, it exhibits it as a large splendid body, with either a gibbous, a half moon, or a crescent phase.— When directed to Jupiter and Saturn, it makes these orbs appear several times larger than the moon does to the naked eye, and enables us to see the dark belts which run across the one, and the rings which surround the other. Now if this same instrument be directed to the fixed stars, it shows them only so many luminous points, without any well-defined diameters. It brings to view hundreds and thousands of stars which the naked eye cannot discern; but, although they appear somewhat more brilliant, they appear on the whole, no larger in diameter than the stars in general do to the unassisted sight. This circumstance I consider as a palpable and sensible evidence of the immense distance of the fixed stars; for bodies at the distance of 900, and even, of 1800 millions of miles, appear magnified in proportion to the power of the instrument; and why should not the fixed stars appear magnified in the same proportion, and present to the eye large disks like the planets, were it not on account of their incalculable distance? Were they only at a moderate distance from the planetary system—suppose ten times the distance of Saturn, or nine thousand millions of miles— this would undoubtedly be the case; but observation proves the contrary. When we view a planet—for example, Saturn, which is distant nine hundred millions of miles—through a telescope magnifying four hundred times, we contemplate it as if carried to a point only the four-hundredth part of its distance; that is we view it as if we were brought within little more than two millions of miles of its surface. In other words, we see it of the same magnitude, and nearly with the same distinctness as if we had surmounted the law of gravitation, and been transported more than 897 millions of miles from our present abode in the direction of that orb.

Which such an instrument is directed to the fixed stars, it does not lose its power as a telescope; this is proved by its presenting the nebulæ, which are invisible to the naked eye, as large, well-defined spaces in the firmament. It carries us within the four hundredth part of their actual distance and enables us to contemplate them just as we would do if it were 400 times nearer than we are. Let us suppose, as formerly, the distance of the nearest stars to be 20,000,000,000,000, or twenty billion of miles, we contemplate such stars by this instrument as if we were carried to a station nineteen billions nine hundred and fifty millions of miles from the place we now occupy, where we should still be fifty thousand millions of miles* distant from these bodies. Supposing the sun were removed to a point fifty thousand millions of miles from the place he now occupies, which is 526 times his present distance, he would appear 526 times less in diameter than at present, or under an angle of little more than 3 1-2 seconds, which is less than the apparent diameter of Uranus, a body which is generally invisible to the naked eye; so that if a star be distant twenty billions of miles, and equal to the sun in magnitude, it should appear no more than a point when viewed with a telescope magnifying 400 times.— Supposing, then, that we were transported through the immense space of 19,950,000,000,000 miles, we behooved to be carried forward several thousands of millions of miles further before those distant orbs would appear to expand into large disks like the moon, or like Jupiter and Saturn, when viewed through telescopes.

The above considerations prove to a demonstration that the nearest stars are removed from us at immense and inconceivable distances; and if their distance be so great their magnitudes must likewise be astonishing, otherwise they would be altogether invisible either to the naked eye or by the telescope; for a distant visible object must always be considered as having a magnitude proportional to its distance and its apparent diameter.—Dick's Sidereal Heavens.

*The following is the calculation expressed in the figures:
400,200,000,000,000,000, distance of the star.
50,000,000,000, distance as viewed by the telescope.
19,950,000,000,000, distance from the earth at which we view it.

From the N. Y. Temperance Herald.

YOU ARE A LOST CAT.

The author of the following is a venerable and highly respected clergyman, who has spent some fifteen or twenty years as a missionary among the Osages, now pastor of a church in this state.

Now my hand is in, I will send you a short dialogue between a Temperate Drinker—a Total Abstinence man—and a confirmed Drunkard. Scene—on board a steamboat, between St. Louis and Quincy. The drunkard about seventy years of age, and respectable to all appearance, except his constant rage for liquor at the bar.

Temperate Drinker.—I will give my children what they will drink, and drink myself whenever I need it, and always intend to do so, yet I can govern myself, and hope my children can.

Total Abstinence.—What is the use of your children drinking even temperately? Does it do them any good? My children have all signed the pledge and so far kept it. And now if they continue to keep it, I am sure they will never die drunkards. Can you say the same of your children?

Temperate Drinker.—As to that, I am not obliged to answer you. We live in a free country. We are at liberty to speak or let it alone. And the same is true of drinking. I take it, I am at liberty to drink temperately, if I choose.

The confirmed drunkard now came up, and hearing this last sentence, begins thus: "You drink temperately! I tell you you are a lost cat. Look at me, an old man. I was once a temperate drinker. See what I am now. Once I was prosperous. When I was young I thought myself as good as any. Henry Clay would not have despised to take me by the hand and say, How do you do, Mr. D. I had property, I might have been possessed of a large estate in Illinois;—my wife loved; my children honored me; my neighbors respected me. But see now, how low, how mean. I am despised by all, and I despise myself. My wife who was worth worlds to me, will dread to see me coming. Look at me; what has done it? That poison that you are going to take so very temperately. Now I warn you to stop. Whiskey will have the mastery.

Temperate Drinker.—But I have reason.

Confirmed Drunkard.—Reason!! You cannot reason. There is no reasoning with it. Look at me; I have no power to reason with it. I am a lost man. Now, you are a stranger to me. I speak as a friend, I warn as a friend.

Total Abstinence.—You are like the rich man that would have his brethren warned not to come—

Confirmed Drunkard—Yes, that would send Lazarus. But I come myself, and warn you not to come to my place. I am gone. I have no power over myself. I am lost.

Mr. Editor:—The above is a true story. It took place about a year since, and as I had a part in it, and felt much interested, I went into the cabin and penned it down, and now send it for insertion in your fact telling Herald, if you think it may be of any use.

Yours respectfully,
W. F. VAILL.

Drinkers, temperate friends and all, take warning by this awful admonition.

"WHAT O'CLOCK IS IT?"

When I was a young lad, my father one day called me to him, that he might teach me to know what o'clock it was. He told me the use of the minute finger and the hour hand, and described to me the figures of the dial plate, until I was pretty perfect in my part.

No sooner was I quite master of this additional knowledge, than I set off scampering to join my companions in a game of marbles; but my father called me back again. "Stop, William," said he, "I have something more to tell you."

Back I again went, wondering what else I had got to learn, for I thought I knew all about the clock, quite as well as my father did.

"William," said he, "I have taught you to know the time of day, I must teach you how to find out the time of your life."

All this was strange to me, so I waited rather impatiently to see how my father would explain it, for I wanted sadly to go to my marbles.

"The Bible," said he, "describes the years of a man to be three score and ten, or four score years. Now, life is very uncertain, and you may not live a single day longer; but if we divide the four score years of an old man's life into twelve parts, like the dial of a clock, it will allow almost seven years for every figure. When a boy is seven years old, then it is one o'clock of his life; and this is the case with you. When you arrive at fourteen years, it will be two o'clock with you; and when at twenty-one years, it will be three o'clock; at twenty-eight, it will be four o'clock; at thirty-five, it will be five o'clock; at forty-two it will be six o'clock; at forty-nine it will be seven o'clock, should it please God to spare your life. In this manner you may always know the time of your life, and looking at the clock may perhaps remind you of it. My great grandfather, according to this calculation, died at twelve o'clock; my grandfather at eleven, my father at ten. At what hour you or I shall die, William, is only known to Him to whom all things are known."

Never, since then, have I heard the inquiry, "What o'clock is it?" nor do I think that I have even looked at the face of a clock, without being reminded of the words of my father.—U. S. Gazette.

FOR THE LADIES.

From the Ladies' Companion for September.

INFLUENCE OF WOMAN.—PAST AND PRESENT.

It has ever been acknowledged by the reflecting and the wise, that the power possessed and wielded by woman, is great, and to be used or abused for the good or evil of mankind. States revolutionized, cities burnt, kings dethroned, empires overthrown, unite to prove it true. In the page of history her name is indelibly written, whether it be for superiority in virtue or crime; whether it be for the admiration or detestation of a world! There it is stamped— let us deeply ponder upon it! Numberless are the examples in the lessons of the past, which, in tones of fearful warning, speak to the hearts of all—"Beware!"

On the other hand, we may be strengthened in the exercise of every virtue, by the contemplation of those beautiful traits of character, those high heroic actions of the buried past, which, amid the surrounding gloom, with an undying, unwavering brilliancy, "burns throughout all Time."

A Nero was formed by the pernicious counsels of woman; an Antony lost the world by the persuasive arts and beauty of a Cleopatra. A woman stepped forth in the hour of her country's peril, breathed hope in the hearts of despairing warriors, and led them forth to conquer. Victory perched upon her banners, and the Maid of Orleans received the crown of martyrdom! And who could have caused the desolation of the fatal night of blood, when the guardian genius of France slumbered; when the alarm rang in the midnight air, and the shrieks of the living were mingled with the agonizing groans of the dying, "piercing the dull ear of night?" Who, but woman, base, unprincipled, ambitious woman? Who, but a Catharine de Medici, could thus have played upon the passions of a weak son, and caused him to shed the blood of thousands of Huguenots, to gratify her love of power? Another form rises before me, but how unlike the former. Isabella of Castile, I hail thee! Patroness and friend of the great "world-finder," thy name ever be honored! The influence of thy friendship shall be felt, 'till the world is not. The maiden monarch of England, too, though arbitrary and severe in her government, and her fame stained with a dark spot which can never be effaced, yet gave an impulse to commerce and industry, which is still felt throughout the world. She showed what woman can do when possessed of power to sway the destinies of a mighty people!

The general character of a nation must ever depend upon that of its women. The stern lawgiver of Sparta knew this when he created those laws which made the females participate with their husbands and brothers in the rude, violent games of the age. Thus they became bold, patriotic and daring—exhorting their sons when they went forth to battle, "to return with their shield, or upon it." The exhortation of the Spartan women fired the soldiers; whether they conquered or fell, they were assured of the praise, and rejoicings of their mothers and sisters; and this incited them to unparalleled deeds of arms.

Stern, unyielding Romans were nurtured by matrons of high and noble virtues, who boasted that their brightest gems, their priceless treasures, were their children. In fact, wherever woman has participated in the affairs of a nation, her voice has ever influenced it. In the dark ages, when learning and religion were confined to a few bigoted monasteries, and almost unknown to the world, woman exercised but little sway over the public mind. Plunged in ignorance, limited to the rude household employment of the age; they were considered as mere slaves. Rude strength was then the test of superiority, violent and fierce sports, or the bloody "trade of war," engrossed the lords of creation." But when the crusaders gave to chivalry the refinements and luxury of the Orientals, woman asserted her power. That power which had been so long smothered only to burst out when it found vent, like a long-hidden volcanic fire, in a fiercer, brighter flame. The presiding genius of the age was—Beauty. She fostered the high, chivalric daring of the knights who flew to arms in the cause of the oppressed; she presided at tournaments and fetes as the Queen of Beauty, and the rewarder of noble deeds.

The knight who breathed nought but vengeance in the battle-field, or defied his implacable foe to mortal combat in the lists, became "calm and gentle as an infant's slumber," in presence of the fair. His angry passions hushed; his taunts and boastful words changed to the language of love and gallantry. He acknowledged the potency of, and yielded a willing obedience to the charms of woman. Hers however, was not the magic influence of mind. The fair damsels of rank were but little versed in philosophic, classic, or poetic love. To read the wild but absorbing romances of those times; to sing to the lute the love-lays of the Troubadour; to sit at their everlasting embroidery, shading flowers that had no parallel in nature; this was all they wished or required. That age is past—its ideas, prejudices, feelings with it "in the deep ocean buried." Now intellect, genius, assert their independence, and here again, woman, Proteus-like, assumes a new form of influence. Splendid have been the creations of her mind. Released from the arbitrary fetters, which had, for ages, bound it, the wing of Genius soars in power Omnipotent. Need we point to a Siddons, a Baillie, a More, an Edgeworth, names which dare compare with the noblest of man's, in their respective walks? These, and hundreds of others exercise a vast amount of influence over the present age, which will be carried far into the future. Education has, indeed, done wonders for the sex. But religion has done still more; it has taught them to look beyond this life, which is but preparatory to another; as a state of probation, where we are all placed to aid another with counsel and comfort.— And it is in this, woman should find the proper exercise of her faculties. Far retired from the busy highways of Ambition, she should wander in the shady, green lanes of domestic life. It should be hers to cheer the drooping head of sickness, and pour balm into the bosom of the wretched. To seek out the abodes of Poverty, and cheer their inmates with aid, advice and sympathy. To welcome to the quiet hearth, the partner of her joys and sorrows, when worn and weary with the world's conflict; to rear her offspring in the fear of God, and love of every thing good and holy. These are duties which every woman of the present day is bound to perform. Unseen, unfelt, she extends her influence far and wide. She is forming the future patriot, statesman, or enemy of his country, more than this, she is sowing the seeds of virtue or vice, which will fit him for Heaven, or for eternal misery. Noble, sublime, is the task of the American mother—see that it be well performed.

Mother of Washington! Would that thy name could be sounded with a trumpet's voice throughout the land! Would that the women of our beloved country emulated thy virtues and glorious example, to rear their children as "wisely and as well"— Then would Columbia be indeed the land of heroes, not such as the old world saw, "basely trampling" on the sacred rights of humanity, but a race born to bless—to humanize the world!

We desire all young ladies to read the following:

"Sentiment.—How much fine sentiment there is wasted in our strange world. I have seen a young lady in raptures of admiration over a flower which was to deck her hair in a ball room, who would turn away with a look of loathing, from the proffered kiss of her baby brother; and I have heard lovely lips, all wreathed in smiles, and breathing tones of joy over a pretty shell, a shining insect, or even a gay ribbon, say cold and cruel words to the best friend, ay, the mother, who was wearing her life out to promote the happiness of her ungrateful daughter."

ADVERTISEMENTS.

ALL persons indebted to the subscriber individually, are requested to make payment before the 1st day of August next. These demands being from 2 to 5 years of age, and having arrived at full maturity, will, if remaining unpaid at that time, be consigned to the tender mercies of the law.

OF
THE CASKET,
AND PHILADELPHIA MONTHLY MAGAZINE.

THE great increase of the subscription list of the Casket, which has been nearly doubled since the commencement of the last volume, warrants the most extensive improvements on the first of July 1840, at which time a new volume will be commenced with increased vigour. Nothing need be said of the firm basis on which the Casket stands, it being already the oldest magazine in the country, and has maintained its popularity in the face of all opposition. It is to be found upon the centre tables of families making literary pretentions from Maine to Georgia.

TYPE—EMBELLISHMENTS.

The Casket is printed with a clear and beautiful type, upon the finest white paper. The illustrations are not surpassed by those of any periodical, at home or abroad: and beside the monthly steel engravings, a quarterly plate of colored Fashions has lately been added. The style of these embellishments is unequaled, and they are always accompanied by an appropriate sketch. No wood cuts disgrace the work. Whatever appears in the Casket, is of the first order of art.

The volume will be with the first of a series of splendid mezzotint engravings, prepared expressly for the work, by the burin of Sartain, who deservedly stands as the best engraver of the kind in the United States.

LITERARY CHARACTER.

The literary character of the Casket is well known. It is wholly original, of the highest order, and sustained by writers of the first rank. Essays, Tales Sketches and Travels, compose its prominent prose articles; while the poetry is equalled by that of no other magazine of like character. The variety for which the Casket is celebrated, shall suffer no diminution; but on the contrary every exertion shall be made to increase its interest.

Several Romances of the Revolution have already appeared, and others shall follow in the course of the volume, presenting when finished, a complete picture of the manners, and a historical account of the great battles of that time. Thus, the Casket, instead of being filled with sickly sentimentalities, aims at a true delineation of human nature in every variety of passion.

The series of thrilling nautical sketches, entitled entitled Cruising in the Last War, and which are rated by the contemporary press, equal to the celebrated sketches from 'Tom Cringle's Log,' will be continued and the 'Leaves from a Lawyer's Port Folio,' which have attained a deserved celebrity, will still furnish attraction to the Magazine.

We shall furnish the readers of the Casket with some valuable papers from entirely new contributors. The author of 'Old Ironsides on a Lee Shore,' will give the first of a number of Sketches in the July number. We count upon his prolific and graceful pen to do much in maintaining the great popularity of the Magazine. In addition to the variety already embraced in the pages of the Magazine, our Syrian Letters,' the first of which appears in the June number as introductory, will interest and add worth to its pages. They are from no unpractised pen.

FASHIONS.

The Fashions are published in the Casket quarterly, or as often as any really new style arrives from Paris. The engravings are colored and executed from original designs. No old, worn out plates are retouched and then published as the latest fashions.— The truth of our designs may be tested by comparing them with the latest description of dresses from London and Paris. They are universally admitted to be the finest specimen of engraving and coloring afforded by any Magazine in the country.

The expense of getting them up is great, but we [illegible] Remember!— The readers of the Casket are furnished with [illegible] fashion plates as an extra. The [illegible] the regular and choice engravings which always accompany the work.

TIME OF PUBLICATION.

The Casket is published on the first of the month in every quarter of the Union. The most distant subscriber consequently receives it on that day, as well as those who reside in Philadelphia. In all the principal cities agents have been established, by whom means subscribers in the country can obtain their copies free of postage.

TERMS.—Three Dollars per annum. Or Two Copies yearly for Five Dollars, invariably in advance, post paid. No new subscriber received without the money, or the name of a responsible agent.

Editors who may copy this prospectus and will send a copy, marked with ink, addressed to the Saturday Evening Post (which will save postage on newspapers) shall be promptly furnished with the work. To be particular in this matter, we should like a copy of the paper marked, to be sent more [illegible], that no mistake or delay may occur.— Editors are served with the Magazine from the time the advertisement is inserted. We mention this, as many inserted the advertisement at the close of the last volume, and expected all the back numbers.— This of course we could not be expected to grant.

Ladies Department.
Mrs. L. M. CARPENTER, Preceptress.

This Institution is located in the pleasant and healthful village of De Ruyter. Its buildings are both spacious and commodious. Study rooms of which there are a large number, are furnished with chairs, tables, bedsteads, and stoves; and rented to gentlemen at one shilling per week; or one shilling for each student, the rooms being large enough to accommodate two. Good board is afforded at one dollar and twenty-five cents per week, including washing or lodging. One shilling extra, is charged to those who require both.

The institution is furnished with a good Philosophical and chemical apparatus. It is also furnished with a valuable Library. A scientific society connected with the Institute, is furnished with a choice collection of Minerals and Curiosities.

About twenty-one thousand dollars has already been expended on the De Ruyter Institute for the purpose of facilitating the student in his pursuit of scientific knowledge.

It is the object of those to whom the management of the Institute is entrusted, to make the expenses of acquiring a knowledge of the sciences, as light as possible.

And the public may be assured that a strict attention will be paid to the moral cultivation of the student; and the trustees and teachers will spare no reasonable pains to render the time spent at the De Ruyter Institute, as agreeable and profitable to the student as circumstances will admit.

Young gentlemen and ladies wishing to engage in the pursuit of science, are respectfully invited to spend a term or two, at the De Ruyter Institute and satisfy themselves in regard to its merit.

The year is divided into three terms, of fourteen weeks each. The first term commenced on the twelfth day of September; The second term on the second day of January; and the third term on the eighth day of May.

ST. PAUL'S CLOKE.

II. TIMOTHY: IV. 13

"The cloak which I left at Troas with Carpus, when thou comest, bring with thee."

Why did St. Paul, while writing under the guidance of divine inspiration, take the trouble to say any thing about his cloke?—I presume that more than one reader of the epistles to Timothy, has mentally made this inquiry, if not verbally. But this scripture is profitable for instruction.

1. We are taught that St. Paul was careful of his apparel. He knew where he had left his cloke; it was at Troas. He had left it with some one, and he well knew whom—with Carpus. In this direction which he gave to Timothy, he made a definite arrangement for the procuring of his cloke again, and that before winter; for he says, verse 1st, "Do thy diligence to come before winter."

Possibly it was through some forgetfulness, or mistake, that the Apostle left his outer garment at Troas; but I think not. It might have been inconvenient at a certain time for him to retain it; and the language naturally implies that he committed it to the special charge of Carpus, to be forwarded by the faithful Timothy, before winter.

2. We see that ministers NEED apparel.—Some people seem to forget this, and marvel why ministers cannot preach, and devote their whole time to the work of the gospel, without deriving any pecuniary support from those for whose spiritual benefit they toil. I have no idea that Paul stole his cloke, or obtained it in any dishonest manner. I presume that he received it from some, (either directly or indirectly,) to whose souls his instructions had been made a blessing. One idea here occurs:—Paul had no family—no wife and children to clothe. Did he need apparel for himself? then how urgent are the necessities of ministers at the present day, frequently, who must provide for themselves and their households.

3. We learn that St. Paul's spirituality of mind, in other words, his high attainments in piety, did not prevent him from giving attention to the ordinary affairs of life.—Some would have us believe, that they are so filled with the Spirit, that they are exhonerated from all care about providing for themselves food and clothing. Let such think about St. Paul's cloke. Others there are too, who, though they will not attempt to advocate any such chimerical notion as this, yet will excuse themselves for some neglect of providing personal and domestic comforts, because their minds were so intently fixed on heavenly things. Are our affections on things above more constantly, and more strongly, than were Paul's?—But he thought about his cloke which he had left at Troas, and took care to write to Timothy about it at the close of an inspired epistle. We can attend to necessary affairs of this life in such a manner as to aid our growth in grace, if we will, "whether we eat, or drink, or whatsoever we do, do all to the glory of God." J. R. J.

THE DYING THIEF.

PARAPHRASED FROM THE GERMAN OF THOLUCK.

Is it possible, you may ask—can the last gasping breath of the profligate who is but just able to cry out for mercy—can this ward off the punishment of transgression, and silence the loud cry of a life of guilt to heaven for vengeance? Is it then so, that there are no sins: spots so dark that they cannot be washed away by the solitary tear that falls from the already glaring eye of the dying transgressor? Happy then am I in the ways of self-indulgence! Deep will I drink of the cup of pleasure, at the brim of which I have hitherto only moistened my lips. Ardently will I grasp after gold and greatness, of which I have sometimes been afraid, lest they should eat my soul as with fire. Blessed thought! that I may have my portion in both worlds—the joys of sin here, and salvation hereafter! Eagerly then, will I first grasp this world! Eagerly will I first pluck the sweet poison-flowers of time, and then when I have done with these, it will be time enough for the spotless lilies—the unfading flowers of eternity! But stop presuming mortal! you are too fast in thus changing the brightness of heaven which gathers round the dying and penitent thief, into what would make it, to yourself, the lurid reflection of the flames of hell! It is true, indeed, that the gospel teaches that in the very interval of death—between, as it were, its lightnings' flash and stroke, there is time to secure salvation. It is true that the Savior declares, "Whosoever cometh unto me, I will in no wise cast out." And all this, so far from being a wonder, is the very essence and glory of the gospel. It is but the divine teaching that faith, no matter when exercised, is the sure means of salvation—that it opens the heart to the Redeemer that justifies, and to the Spirit that sanctifies, so that eternal life is sure. And yet in the wide history of the Bible, there is but one recorded case like this—but one death-escape from sin and wrath. There is one that none may despair, and but one, that none may presume. Dare not, then, to build upon it! Like the lottery-chance, it may feed your hopes for a little while, but in the end it will blight them, and ruin you.

"The blind man, who as he rushes toward the precipice, is suddenly restored to sight, and who with lifted arms and joyful heart springs back with untold thankfulness from the abyss," seizes and overwhelms with tears of rapture the good hand that opened his eyes, and will never let it go. But will you make no distinction between this blind man, and one that knows the precipice is before him, though he may not see precisely where, and who will not receive the kind hand that would open his eyes, but thrusts it away in neglect, perhaps in contempt, till a more convenient season? And how do you know, blind man! that that hand will ever come again to you? Do you dream that it will come just when you want it—whenever you may resolve to become penitent—to shed a few tears of sorrow—to try to exercise faith? Ah! blind man! that hand is not in mortal keeping. Its comings and goings are not at human control. Those tears of penitence, the sweetest and holiest of all tears, they do not flow whenever you may will. Have you not heard that God's spirit may be grieved, and that then the heart may be glazed to feeling, and the eyes to tears? Have you not heard of those that abuse the grace of God, that they are given over to hardness of heart, and to a reprobate mind? Believe it, and tremble as you do; believe it, "in the inward life of the sinner to whom God would have given the sighings of repentance and the blessed trust of faith, and he would not receive the gift, to him there will come hours of heedless slumbering," when the breast shall no more sigh, and the eye shall no more weep, and "the hands though they may fold themselves convulsively, shall not be able to extort a prayer." Agonies of conviction, deep as those of crucifixion, may be upon him, but like the thief on the left, he shall not be brought by them to repentance. Wishes may grope through the universe, and find nothing on which to fasten. The anchor of longing desire shall be thrown out, but it shall find no ground beneath the waves which to fix, even when hope is shipwrecked and the soul is lost! Be not, O! be not deceived. God has not mocked! The Holy Spirit moving you to repentance is a tender spirit. Once driven away, it comes reluctantly, rarely, perhaps never again! Remember it is written of those who do evil that good may come, that even their damnation is just. Beware, then of delay in the matter of your soul's salvation.—Chase not the fleeting shadows of time, when you know not where you may spend your eternity! Beware of putting off repentance, lest yours be the end and the doom, not of the thief on the right, but of the one on the left. T. E.

STRIKING THOUGHTS.

There are few men, but, were they certain of death on their 70th birth-day, would think of a preparation. To-morrow may be the gate of an eternity, and they go on in their folly.

Every breeze that wafts by us at morning seems an angel's whisper, breathing holiness into our souls.

How many high feelings does the view of God's works produce! To the Christian, as in the ancient grove of Dodona, the leaves of the trees speak bright oracles.

We kneel to man, but we lounge to God.

Those who in the dark and stormy night of affliction stand bravely under the canopy of heaven, may rest in safety; but those who flee for protection to the fancied security of the things of earth, the lightning will the more surely reach from the tree which they shelter under.

Tears can only be produced from the stony heart of the sinner, by the same Hand that guided the rod of the leader of Israel against the rock in the wilderness.

Blasphemy arises from the Gospel of Light: is it not a sad reflection that it is the glorious sun brings up the weeds?

'I shall only be idle a minute.' A minute!—in which time the idea of Hamlet's soliloquy flashed upon Shakspeare's mind. A minute!—in which Napoleon gained the summit of the Alps. A minute!—in which a tear reached the eye of the repentant prodigal.

The knell for departed man, is the alarum-bell which Mortality rings to waken Vice from its sleep of ease.

God is a monarch who has given man a noble sword to serve him in his tongue; and he uses it against the donor's own Majesty.

Some men say that they will not be taught by clergymen, weak men like themselves. I answer, that they are the five barley loaves and two small fishes; little indeed of themselves, but sufficient by the blessing of God, to feed five thousand!

Our Savior never left any question unanswered that was of importance to his followers. The caitiff Pilate received no reply to his 'What is truth?' from Him who alone could answer it: but Christians have their Redeemer's summary of it, in his sublime address to Heaven just before his apprehension; in the all comprehensive language, 'Thy word is truth.'

Faith guides her steps by the light of the moon behind a cloud.

Religion is the 'light of reason,'—illuminating, adorning and directing it.

Is it not a high thought, that poor, sickly weak man, called by every breath, injured by every insect, shall remain undying, unchangeable when the glorious stars on which he now gazes, and from whose look of unvarying splendor he reads immortality, and the sun which has shined over the graves of millions of mortality's offspring, shall have sunk to very nothingness, and left not 'a wreck behind.'

Those who in the day of sorrow have owned God's presence in the cloud, will find him also to be in the pillar of fire, brightening and cheering the abode as night comes on.

The blasphemer seems to think heaven cannot see him, because he will not see heaven: so the child shuts its eyes, and says 'You cannot see me now.'

It is not much I ask of the atheist, but that little he denies me. He professes to be his fellow-man's friend and benefactor; he volunteers his abilities for my service, as Alexander did to Diogenes; and, in a similar spirit to the philosopher, I reply, 'I only ask that you will not take the light of the sun from me.'

The church, in reality, and in allegory, never looks so lovely, so awful, and superior to earth, as in a storm.

The Books of the Bible, so splendid in their brightness, and so remarkable for their clearness, bear the proofs in themselves of their inspired authorship. We trace, in the full and far-seeing prophecies, the same Being who said, in the first dawn of creation, 'Let there be light, and there was light!'

Till they own Religion's power, men eat and drink even as the beasts of the field, following the life of Nebuchadnezzer.

Let the doubter remember this: it is not the glorious sun that causes the shadow, but his own dark body, which comes between the sun and his care—the earth.

It is bad, in reading the Bible, to give up a text directly, and say 'it is above my finite comprehension;' we should rather say, as may be said to every one, 'I will not let thee go, except thou bless me.'

It is no use our saying 'we are religious,' if we do not shew it. St. Paul's companions, though they heard not the voice, by the light which they saw, they knew that he was favored by heaven.

Religion makes a blessing to the Christian of the afflictions and the tears that destroy other men; as the same waters that overwhelmed the Egyptians, to the believers formed a wall of safety.

We judge of religion by the lives of its professors, instead of judging of the lives of its professors by religion.

My cousin boasts that he rises at five; and is there any thing to shew for it?—No!—then he merely glories he has fooled away more hours than we have. It is useless to rise with the lark, if we rise not with her to heaven.

How connected all our ideas! the sailor seldom thinks of heaven till the waves make him think of hell.

"Look at your own bad passions, and you need not go into society to know mankind,—for you have seen the world.

Christianity is the good man's text:—his life the illustration.

A man who puts aside his religion because he is going into society, resembles a person taking off his shoes because he is about to walk upon thorns.

YET WE MUST DIE.

Though life we spend in sunny bowers,
Mid laughing meads and scented flowers,
And bliss attends our tranquil hours,
Yet we must die.

Though Love's bright torch may gladly blaze;
Though teem with joy our happy days;
Though beauty's smile delight our gaze,
Yet we must die.

Though oft by fancy borne away.
We bask in regions bright and gay,
Where pleasure grows in constant ray,
Yet we must die.

Though circled with the pomp of state
Our word be law, our whisper fate,
Our halls must soon be desolate,
Yet we must die.

For we must part with love's bright ray,
Our gayest dreams must flit away,
Wealth, beauty, pleasures all decay,
And we must die.

THE YOUNG MAN'S COURSE.—I saw him first at the social party. He took but a single glass of wine, and that in compliance with the request of a fair young lady with whom he conversed.

I saw him next when he supposed he was unseen, taking a glass to satisfy the slight desire formed by sordid indulgence. He thought there was no danger.

I saw him again, with some of his own age meeting at night to spend a short time in convivial pleasure. He said it was only innocent amusement.

I met him next reeling in the street—a confused stare was on his countenance, and words of blasphemy on his tounge. Shame was gone.

I saw him yet once more—he was pale, cold, and motionless, and was carried by his friends to his last resting place. In the small procession that followed, every head was cast down with grief and shame—and two aged frames seemed to shake with uncommon anguish. His father's gray hairs were going to the grave with sorrow.—His mother wept to think she had ever given being to such a child.

I thought of his future state. I opened the Bible and read, "Drunkards shall not enter the kingdom of heaven."

THE VACANT SEATS IN HEAVEN.—A lady of rank being once in company with Bengel, addressed him as follows. "I hear, Mr. Prelate, that you are a prophet; therefore perhaps you can tell us whether, in the world above, there are any reserved seats for people of quality." He replied, "I certainly, madam, am no prophet, though I acknowledge that God has granted me some acquaintance with his revealed word; and this informs me that reserved seats indeed there are; but that, alas, most of them are sadly in want of occupants.—So I read in Matt. xix. 14, and 1 Cor. i. 26.

PRAYER

BY MRS WOOLLEY.

"Continuing instant in prayer"—[Rom. xii 12

THE HOUR OF PRAYER! When golden day
Breaks from the east on rising day,
O what can train the mind to bear
Life's daily toil, life's daily care—
Fresh trials in each coming hour,
And inbred sin's tormenting power!
The hour of prayer

THE HOUR OF PRAYER! When busy noon
Divides the heart—alas, how soon!—
What can restrain the roving will
And with sweet peace the bosom fill!
What can restore the spirit's rest,
Mid scenes of wo, and sons unblest!
The hour of prayer

THE HOUR OF PRAYER! At eventide,
O what is all the world beside!
Say, what shall teach us to forget
The thorns that in our path are set—
Bright hopes forever passed away
In the brief moments of a day!
The hour of prayer

FOR THE CHRISTIAN.

HONESTY WITH GOD.

"Light is sown for the righteous, and gladness for the upright in heart." In order that we may have any comfort with God, we must have an honest heart before Him; and of this, no one can be judge, so well as the professor. Men may have whereof to glory, but not before God. In a state of nature, men may do many things, yea, they may do any thing, externally, and verily they will have their reward.—They may pray long and loud, to be heard and seen of men; and they get their reward—they may blow with a trumpet, when they give alms, or do any other good work; and they have their reward—they may make a great show of religion, when fashionable; make great profession of humility, and deep repentance, to be esteemed of men; and they get their reward—but in all this, there surely cannot be an honest simplicity before God: and it would seem that a person must know it, although he may be offended, if you suspect his sincerity. The Savior speaks of a singleness of eye, of an uprightness of soul and of an ingenuous dealing with God, wherein, there is no disguise, no half heartedness, no double meaning, no covering up; but an open, and honest simplicity before God. Now, I think that here is the dividing line, between him that is a Christian, and him that is not. Some struggle, and fret, until they fancy they see something favorable in God, or in themselves, and embrace a hope that cannot easily be shaken. The grand thing is wanting; they never were brought, in honesty of soul, to submit to God; neither have they any simplicity of heart before Him; nor any genuine communion with Him. The Savior says, that if any man will do his will, he shall know of the doctrine; and no doubt Paul had a sincere desire to do his will, when he said, "Lord what wilt thou have me to do." As soon as he was thought, he went honestly to work—He confered not with flesh and blood—He went to God—"behold he prayeth." He submitted all into his hands for time and eternity, without equivocation, or reservation. He felt himself so entirely undone, that he would as soon have thought of making a world, as of going to God, in his own name. But he went in the name of Jesus and found peace to his soul.

There is no way to get comfort from any promise; or doctrine, without sincerity of soul, in its application;—but in a hope, thus honestly obtained, there is much pleasure that a stranger intermeddles not with. While we are engaged in the concerns of this world, we are not apt to see the supreme selfishness of our hearts. We spend our time, in providing for our families; and say in our wisdom, we do not intend to be as the infidel, who provides not for his own house; while our eyes are closed to things of eternal moment. We go about, self-seeking in self-dependence, with self-sufficiency of spirit, and glorying in self. There is a great deal of sacrificing to our own drag. Often, in different parts of my journey, have I been brought to exclaim, "O that I had hearkened to thy commandments; then had my peace been as a river; and my righteousness, as the waves of the sea."

Honesty with God, is the only safe policy for man. A near view of God, a clear perception of his holiness, with a sweet filial confidence in Him, are as foretastes of heaven to the soul, that is seeking to be transformed into his image. When I can turn away from the world, from self, and from sin and can say, "O Lord thou art my God,—whom have I in heaven but thee—thou art my fortress, my high tower, and my resting place"—I feel, that he is my father—I bless and adore Him; and long to be where without sin, I may serve Him forever. But a single suspicion, that I indulge sin in my heart, mars all my joy; and I cannot do other, than come to Him with weeping, and supplication. Peter, under a full recollection of his sin, could in a short time after his fall say, "Lord thou knowest all things; thou knowest that I love thee." He was conscious, that he did not regard iniquity in his heart. He knew, that his repentance was sincere. When he confessed his sin, he forsook it. Enoch's happiness, must have been of the highest order, when he had this testimony, "that he pleased God." It is the sweetest enjoyment, on this side of eternity, to feel a consciousness, that our hearts are right with God; and to know, that what we do, we do as unto the Lord. It is of grace that we have a desire to please Him, and the more we have of this spirit, the more we shall approximate to his likeness, which, when perfected, must be glory indeed.

I made a profession of religion, for many years before I began to visit the sick, or to give alms, to the poor, as doing these things unto the Lord. I gave, because others did; or from natural sympathy, or with a view to pacify my conscience. O, I have been slow to learn, what was of so much importance to my own peace; or what might be truly useful to others. When partaking of the Lord's supper, it is sweet to do it, as he bids us, in remembrance of Him. Paul, always carried about in the body the dying of the Lord Jesus. We may have what form, or maintain what doctrines, or join what church we please, yet, without holiness no man shall see the Lord. I take it for granted, that while we discover any thing in God, that we wish were otherwise, we have no true love to Him. I think, that when we view his perfections, especially his sweet holiness, and his entire sovereignty, we shall voluntarily set down at His feet, and submit ourselves cheerfully to Him for both worlds. He is then where of right He ought to be, and we take the place of those who love Him and where we may hope for his blessing. He will be all, or nothing; and a soul that lies at his feet, would not [illegible] think of making reserves, [illegible] the heart with God. It is true that at first we only see men as trees walking; but if the heart be honest with God, we shall go on to know the Lord. When we are brought near, to where we ought to be, our Father is pleased to indulge us with delightful fellowship—with sweet communion, and sometimes, with an humble and tender freedom at his throne—yea, with an extatic joy in God, which the world can neither give nor take away. All that is wanted, to have this constantly, is to have an honest heart before the Lord. Jesus is the same yesterday, to day, and forever. We are the beings who change. We let down our watch and lose our uprightness before Him; and thus lose the sense of his favor which is life. O, his loving kindness is better than life. He sends forth the spirit of his Son, into our hearts, and we cry, "Abba Father." This is the sweetest feeling in the world. A son goes to his father, with reverence, it is true, but with a pleasant confidence. He does not even suspect that he does not love his father, and although the father, in his wisdom, may delay, or deny to answer his son, yet his heart yearns over him, and he will act towards him as he thinks best for his interest. True honesty of soul before the Lord, would make us act towards him, as dutiful and affectionate children—would secure his favor—and would make our condition here, to resemble that of saints in heaven.—[illegible] Remains.

THE CHRISTIAN FLAG.

BY SPENCER WALLACE CONE.

Shrink not, Christian, from the strife,
See! the flag that floats above—
Banner broad and dyed in blood,—
Stern its motto "No! 't is love!"—

From the steep of Calvary,
By a Savior's hand unfurled
By the King of kings flung out
For the rallying of a world.

In the Rock of ages set
Guarded by Omnipotence,
Man may battle, time may strive,
But they cannot pluck it thence

When the earth shall be burned up
When the heavens shall roll away,
And the universe at once,
Like a withered leaf, decay;—

When around the great white throne,
God's elect shall meet above,
Broader, brighter o'er their heads
Still shall float that flag of love

Fling away the sheath of sin
Show each good sword keen and bare;
But let every weapon be
Of the spirit and of prayer!—

Hark! the trumpet sounds the charge—
On! 't is greatest gain to die—
Strike home, true soldier of the cross—
God for his saints, and victory!

Sin requires no teaching.

CONSOLATION FOR THE RIGHTEOUS.

I need not go about to prove that God will be ever ready to assist the perfect man; I need not prove that his eyes are always upon the righteous, and that his ears are always open to their prayers, that they are the dear objects of his delight and love.—Reason and Scripture both do abundantly attest this, and the repeated promises of God to good men, encourage them to hope from God whatever beloved children may from a tender and kind father. Is not this enough then to inspire the perfect man with great and confident hopes? He knows, not only that God is an immutable God, free from all levity and inconstancy, and therefore that nothing less than presumption and obstinacy, habitual neglect or wickedness, can tempt him to recal his gifts, or repent him of his favors; he knows not only that God is faithful, and will not suffer him to be tempted above what he is able; but he knows also that he has a powerful intercessor at the right hand of God, an advocate with the Father, who cannot but prevail. Nor is this all yet, he has a great many things that plead for him with God. There are his tears which are bottled up; there are his prayers and alms which are gone up for a memorial before God; there is a book of remembrance, wherein all his pious discourses are registered; and God is faithful, and cannot forget his works and labor of love. The spirit of God will not soon quit the bosom that it so long resided in; it will not suffer itself to be divided from that person with whom it had entered into so close an union that it seemed, as it were, inanimated or incorporated with him, and became essential to his being; whence it is that the spirit is said to be grieved when he is forced and compelled to retire.—Rev. Dr. Lucas.

FOR THE CHILDREN.

A BOY TELLING HIS TROUBLES TO THE SAVIOR.

Several years since, there lived a boy in the Great Valley of the West, who had wicked parents. They were so wicked, and cared so little about God or his word, that they took their little son from the Sabbath School, and forbid his ever attending again. This was a great trial to the dear boy; for during the short time he had attended he was very happy—and he became much attached to his class-mates and his pious teacher. How could he think of never meeting them again, and restrain his bitter tears.

One Sabbath morning, his father and locked him into a chamber, for fear he would run away to the Sabbath school.—After his parents had shut and locked the chamber door, and gone down, he began to think how his kind teacher once told the class that if they ever had any difficulty or trouble, they must go and tell the Savior of it and pray to him." As he sat there alone, and remembered his Sabbath School and his dear teacher, the poor child thought with himself, "I am now in difficulty and trouble surely, and I will go and tell the Savior." So he knelt down and began to pray.

His mother knowing how strong was his love to the Sabbath School, thought he might try to escape by the window, and perhaps get hurt, so she went up softly to his chamber door and looked through the key hole. And O, what a scene did she behold! There was her dear boy upon his knees, crying unto God in prayer. His father and mother had forsaken him, and he was asking the Lord to take him up.—The mother could not witness such a scene unmoved. Her heart was melted; she opened the door, went in, and kneeling by his side, begged that he would pray for her. Presently the father came in, and went to the chamber for the same reason that the mother had gone before, to see if the child was there, and what he was doing. As he ascended the stairs, he saw that the door was a-jar. His first thought was, that the mother had let the boy out, and he was very angry. But when he entered the room, and saw his little son on his knees, and the mother kneeling by his side, his anger gave place to the most tender affection for his child, and an overwhelming sense of his own wickedness, and he knelt down on the other side, and begged that he too might be remembered in prayer! The result of that affecting scene was, the wicked father and mother's hopeful conversion to God.

Youthful readers! With this story before you ought you not to be thankful for the privilege of attending the Sabbath School? Your parents not only permit, but wish you to attend. Again: will you not learn from this story, to carry all your difficulties and troubles to the Savior in prayer? You too have a kind and sympathizing Savior. He is more ready to hear you than you are to cry unto him. He loves to have you come to him just as you go to your kind parents, and tell him all your joys and all your sorrows. If you have a wicked heart, tell him of it, and ask him to take it away and give you a new one. If you have a bad temper, tell him of that; if you are tempted to disobey your parents, or break the Sabbath, or do any thing wrong, spread it all out before the Savior. Do not fear to tell him your smallest difficulties and troubles; and tell him too, with thanksgiving and praise, of all your joys and happiness. The more you go to him, if you go with right feelings, the more you will love to go.—Sab. School Visiter.

From the London Protestant Magazine.

THE OVERTHROW OF POPERY DEPENDENT ON THE LIFTING UP OF ISRAEL.

The conversion of the Jews, and defensive measures against Popery, have lately been proposed by the Presbytery of Edinburgh, as a point of union for the churches of Protestant Christendom. And it is a remarkable circumstance, that there exists an intimate connection between the downfall of Popery and the conversion of Israel. Not a more direct and effectual step could be taken to stem the advances of the great persecutor of the spiritual and literal Israel, than to send the light of the gospel back to the ancient people of God. What momentous consequences are made to depend upon the day of their redemption? Where will Popery then be in its marvelous ubiquity?—for when God shall again cause the light of his countenance to shine upon Israel, the consequence shall be—"that his saving health shall be known among all nations"—"when God shall bless them, (the promise is annexed) all the ends of the earth shall fear Him." To this agree the words of St. Paul—"If the diminishing of them be the riches of the Gentiles, how much more their fulness?" "if the casting away of them be the reconciling of the world, what shall the receiving of them be, but life from the dead." Many and great are the prophetic promises of their future faithfulness and prosperity; and the silent and steady progress of the gospel amongst them invites us to greater exertion on their behalf.

But they are not only to be the leading agents in the Lord's hand for the overthrow of every false religion; there are numerous prophecies verifying the conclusion—that they will be the Lord's battle-axe in the overthrow of the last great confederacy of rebellious and anti-Christian nations. And as we are living in singularly prophetic times; and as the course of events which have hitherto constituted their history, have exerted a mysterious influence on the destinies of the whole human family, any circumstance connected with their political state also becomes important. And it happens that after a cycle of nearly twenty centuries of oppression, passive endurance, and political prostration, they have once more been made to re-appear not very far from the frontiers of their own land, in the discipline and uniform of war. There are calculated to be two millions of Jews in Russia and Poland; these have for some years been compelled to take millitary service to a great extent: and in the Russian marine, the Russian army and navy, a host of belligerent Israelites, whose hearts are bent upon the recovery of their long-lost land, and whose affections are centered in it as the theatre of their future glory. It is true, that a despised and degraded people, for long ages unaccustomed to war and conquest, are apparently likely to exert little influence in any general crisis; and yet how triumphantly have the divine purposes of mercy to them been fulfilled in former deliverances from Egyptian bondage.

Evidently, a crisis appears to hang over Palestine; it has long been a subject of deep humiliation, that the dominion of the false prophet of Islamism should prevail over the birth-place of Immanuel; but the waning of the crescent is also with the fall of Popery, contemporary with the lifting up of Israel, and in the progressive disruption of the Ottoman empire, we can discern the dawn of the returning light which once shone so brightly in the East. All things are working to a great revolution in the moral and political elements of the country and people of the ancients; and it becomes all who look forward to the downfall of anti-Christ, and the extension of our Lord's kingdom over the earth, to hasten forward by prayer and exertion, the time when the promises of the gospel shall be fulfilled to the much-oppressed and long-forsaken children of the tribes of Israel.

FOLLY OF TRADITION.

John xxi. 21—23.

"Peter seeing John saith to Jesus, Lord, and what shall this man do? Jesus saith unto him, If I will that he tarry till I come, what is that to thee? follow thou me.—Then went this saying abroad among the bretheren, that disciple should not die; yet Jesus said not unto him, He shall not die; but, If I will that he tarry till I come, what is that to thee?"

Learn hence the uncertainty of human tradition, and the folly of building our faith upon it. Here was a tradition; an apostolical tradition; a saying that went abroad among the brethren; it was early; it was common; it was public; and yet it was false. How little then are any unwritten traditions to be relied upon. Here was a traditional exposition of Scripture; no new saying of Christ's advanced, but only a construction put by the bretheren upon what he did really say, and yet it was a mis-construction. Let the Scripture be its own interpreter, and explain itself; as it is, in a great measure, its own evidence, and proves itself, for it is light. See the easy rectifying such mistakes by adhering to the word of Christ. So the evangelist here corrects and controls that saying among the bretheren by repeating the very words of Christ.—Let them speak for themselves, and let no senses be put upon them but what is genuine and natural. The best end of men's controversies would be, to keep the express words of Scripture, and speak as well as think, according to that word, Is. viii. 20, "To the law and to the testimony: if they speak not according to this word, it is because there is no light in them."

Infidelity can neither affect the existence of God, nor annihilate the obligations of man to him. It may ruin the interests of the creature, but it cannot shake the throne of the Creator.—Dr. Collyer.

Buy the truth, and sell it not.—Proverbs.

THE EFFECTS OF SIN DURABLE.

While all earthly things are fleeting in themselves, they are permanent in their consequences. No length of time can efface guilt, and when the sinner is departed to another world, he leaves the consequences of his transgression behind him, like seeds scattered to the winds, which spread and muliply in uninterrupted succession. The sin of our first parent affects his remotest posterity. Genius embalms the vices of former ages, and spreads the blow of the same evil passions through distant time.—Life is short, but the consequences of evil example are without any definite term, and the reflection of how imperishable is the result of our moral conduct, may lead us to exclaim with deep feeling, "Blessed is he whose transgression is forgiven, whose sin is covered." While futurity is thus opening upon us, both by the speedy fight of time, and by the rapid preparation which is going on within us for an unchangeable destiny, fearful is the aspect which the gospel wears to those who neglect so great salvation.—"The Truths of Religion, by Douglass, of Carvers.

THE CHRISTIAN'S HOPE.

Let us often remember what that hope of glory is, to which we are called; let us often think that we are the children of light, the heirs of God, and joint heirs with Christ; and let us act as becomes such.—What have we to fear, to whom to die is the greatest advantage? What have we to desire on earth, who have a kingdom in our eye; a kingdom wherein dwells righteousness and peace, and love and glory? The expectations of an eternal kingdom should arm us with patience and spiritual warfare: "The night is far spent, and the day is at hand; the night is short, but the day is eternal." Let us wait, let us watch, let us stand fast a while, a little while, and the day will break in upon us, a day that will chase away all sorrow, and fill us with joy and glory; a day wherein we shall complain no more, either of the infirmities of the body, or defects of the mind; wherein we shall grapple and fight no more either with temptations or evil, but shall be equal to the angels of God, as in the perfection of holiness, so in the perfection of pleasure too: being made like them impeccable and incorruptible, and therefore entirely and consummately blessed.—Rev. Richard Lucas.

Denials in love, are better than grants in anger.—Matthew Henry.

Observe! With time and patience, the leaf of the mulberry tree becomes satin.

FOR THE CHURCH.

DO YOU WISH TO KILL YOUR MINISTER!

A mob need not be raised for this purpose. There are other ways of doing it as effectually; and better, under pretence of good. The following directions are infallible.

1. Lay down as a principle that the minister has lungs of brass; a constitution of steel, and a brain which can be kept working all the time, night and day, like a steam engine on the high pressure principle.

2. Besides his ordinary week day labors such as study, preparation for the Sabbath, visiting his people, attending on the sick, funerals, ministerial calls, &c., complain of him for not visiting you more, preaching oftener in your neighborhood, and being more engaged.

3. After preaching twice on the Sabbath, demand of him a third service on Sabbath eve, especially in winter, in some remote part of the parish, so that he will have to ride one, two, three, four, and five miles, inhaling the cold air on the delicate organs of speech, excited and irritable as they have been, by previous exertion. Then give him a good scald in a private room or school-house, so after speaking he will be obliged to start for home in a profuse perspiration or in a state wholly unsuitable to drink the cold evening air.

4. If by this means he is hoarse, or laid up with a severe cold, give him no time to recover; but call him out as often as you can for extra labors. Be sure to complain if he don't comply.

5. Give him as little time for study as possible, and more mental labor than he can possibly perform without study.

6. Never cheer his heart by little acts of kindness and affection; but sting him with unkind remarks, and insinuations.—If you hear any ill natured remarks about him, go and tell him of it, and make them weigh as heavy as possible.

7. Take no pains to secure him much precious time, by looking out for him, and procuring to advantage the necessaries of life, such as hay, grain, meat, wood, &c. When you sell him any thing be very griping.

8. The less you do yourself to promote the cause of Christ, the more earnest you must be to provoke your minister to love and good works. Make your complaints heard.

9. Complain of him for not holding more evening meetings, especially in cold weather, when your time is valued by you nothing.

10. When your minister has his meetings far from home, never ask him to stay over night.

11. When symptoms of bronchitis, loss of voice or consumption appear, relax none of your claims.

12. When his constitution is broken down, be sure to make the work effectual by unkind insinuations, harsh and ungenerous accusations, respecting his partiality, idleness, and neglect of duty.

13. When your minister is dead console yourself with the pious reflection, that you did all in your power to prevent him from rusting out.

THE RIGHT TO SIN.

Men have a right to love holiness, and practice virtue. They have the right to deny themselves and bear the cross of Christ. The gospel gives them these rights. But the right to sin does not and cannot exist. The relation which men sustain with God forbids it. The redemption purchased by the Savior forbids it. The laws of nature forbid it. It can in no way exist. He who transgresses the laws of nature suffers in his own person in consequence thereof. What vast multitudes have sunk to a premature grave by reason of vicious indulgence! Thousands more have benumbed their senses, and destroyed their constitution, and still live to drag out a miserable existence from the same cause. Ask the besotted wretch who staggers thro' the street, a disgrace to his species, if he has not found that his boasted right to drink liquid poison has robbed him of himself. Ask the licentious crew if their vicious indulgences have not been the procuring cause of pain and disease. They, with all others who have violated the laws of nature, must respond that their sin is the cause of their wo. In their persons have they felt that "the wages of sin is death."

Men have no right to live an irreligious life. God's claims are paramount to all others. The relation which all men sustain to God, requires that they should live a holy life. No love, no obedience can be equal to that due to God, as the sole author of all comfort, the giver and sustainer of life. An abuse of any of the gifts of God's hands is a virtual denial of his claims, and a contempt to his holy character. No person has a right thus to insult his benefactor.

None have a right to resist the claims of the gospel. Christ, through the shedding of his blood, has purchased the salvation of the souls of men. And for your soul and mine a price more valuable than we can estimate has been paid. Whence, then, the right to keep them from the Savior? We are not our own, we are "bought with a price, and are bound to glorify our Father who is in heaven." Is not the Savior worthy of our love? Surely if there is any claim that is undeniable and sacred, it is that which Christ has upon the hearts and lives of all persons. "Son," says the Savior, "give me thy heart, and let thine eyes observe my ways." Who can be so hardened and insensible to right, and to his own highest interest, as to refuse such a claim!

Has man the right to bring upon himself pain and misery, and endless wretchedness? God made him for nobler purposes, and it must ever be his duty to walk uprightly with God, and honestly with his fellows. He has no right to enfeeble his body or mind by sin, because God requires the healthy and vigorous exercise of these in his service. The claims of society would also forbid it. Man was made to reign, as a saint of God, in heaven; consequently he has no right to debase himself with sin, and receive the reward of it in everlasting punishment. Doing thus, he robs God of his due—heaven of a saint—sanctified beings of a happy compeer, and himself of eternal life. He that sins against God wrongs his own soul. 'All they that hate him love death.'

CHRISTIAN INFLUENCE.

Many Christians are little aware of the power and extent of their influence. It is stronger than death, and more extensive than time. It exists while its author is forgotten in the grave. It is felt beyond the confines of Eternity. The meek exhortation to the sinner, the honest prayer before God, will always be remembered, and their effect will ever remain. God's word shall not return unto him void. Every feeble saint is able, like David, to slay the giants that defy the armies of Israel.—"A word spoken in due season, how good it is!" "A word fitly spoken is like apples of gold in pictures of silver." Be encouraged ye fearful ones to speak in the name of Jesus, and persuade sinners to be reconciled to God. That which is sown in weakness shall be raised in power; and the seed sown in faith shall bring forth an abundant harvest.

Universalism.—The Editor of the N. Y. Evangelist says that "it will probably be rather startling to Universalists in the country, to learn that there is not now one pastor in this city who dares to preach that there is no punishment in the world to come." There are three Universalist societies in New-York. Two of them are destitute of pastors. Rev. T. J. Sawyer is invited to come out boldly in the pulpit, or the Universalist Union, and give demonstration that the above is incorrect. We shall see what his sentiments are.

Young man or woman lay aside that novel!—It is corrupting your mind, depraving your taste, and unfitting you for a relish of things substantial and profitable. Your excuse that it teaches you human nature, is vain. If you would learn human nature, learn it from the bible, where you will find it more fully exhibited than in the effusions of a misguided, prolific imagination. Learn human nature from the emotions of your own heart, and not from over-wrought pictures of it, which have no foundation in fact. Your excuse is false, because you are not so much affected with the pretended exhibitions of human nature, as with sympathy for the 'Hero of the Tale.' Those tears you shed over your hero's sufferings are foolish tears, because they are shed over sorrows that never existed. And your sympathies are excited for those who have no existence but in a perverted imagination.

Are you a professed Christian? and yet burn "the midnight lamp" over tales of the fancy, while you remain unaffected at an exhibition of the Savior's sorrows?—Were ever any man's sorrows like his? and have you no desire to dwell upon the theme, and no tears of penitence to shed because your sins are the cause of them? If so, where is the evidence of your acceptance with God? We say, again, lay it aside! It is a bewitching snare that has been set to entrap you, and ruin your soul.

INTELLIGENCE.

FOREIGN.

From the N. Y. Commercial Advertiser.

LATER FROM ENGLAND.

By the arrival of the packet ship Quebec, Captain Hebbard, from London, the journals of that city to the 11th of August have been received. This is four days later from London than the intelligence brought by the England.

We are indebted to Capt. Hebbard for late papers. Our files of shipping and mercantile papers have not yet come to hand.

The King of Belgium was about making another visit to England, which was believed to have a political object, connected with the recent events in Europe. The London Globe hints that his Majesty will probably act as mediator between France and England—an office for which he seems peculiarly fitted by his near relationship to the sovereigns of those two countries.

Full details are given in the London papers of the absurd attempt by Louis Napoleon—which, by the way, may be looked upon as extinguishing forever what little chance he may have had of ultimately succeeding in his designs upon France. The laugh is now turned against him, and Frenchmen will never risk their lives for one who has made himself ridiculous.

It seems that he had with him but 56 persons. The sentinel who was shot by the Prince died the same evening. After the failure of their attempt at the caserne, or barracks, they got into disorder and separated.

Prince Louis went into the Permit-office, came out, and was in a few minutes captured with all his party then present, taken before the mayor, sent up to the citadel under a strong escort, and placed in different apartments, which took place about half-past eight o'clock.

Among the party who separated at the column were General Monthelon, his aid de camp, and about eight others, who got down upon the sea sands, took posession of the life-boat which attends the sea bathers, and were launching into the sea, when they were closely pursued by the National Guard, who fired into the boat, which was immediately capsized, and they were all immersed in the water, but not entirely out of their depth.

Two of them were brought out of the water and taken into the lodge of the Humane Society, being severely wounded; they died immediately. That fine old man, General Monthelon, before he was out of the water offered up his sword, but he was immediately shot at and severely wounded by a bricklayer, one of the National Gaurds, and taken away to the hospital, with little chance of recovery.

Several others of the party were brought in the course of the day, who had secreted themselves among the standing corn.

The steam-packet brought in with her a handsome green traveling carriage and a caravan, which contained all the military dresses, caps, knapsacks, &c. also eight fine horses. The horses were landed as soon as convenient. The carriages remained on board in posession of the douaniers, armed with their swords and muskets with fixed bayonets.

There are also on board four barrels filled with 40 franc pieces in gold (otherwise called doubled Napoleons or Louis.)

Prince Louis has also, contained in a belt on his person, twenty thousand pounds sterling in Paris Bank bills, which he is allowed to retain.

Some of the Bonapartists concerned in this mad attempt are very well known at Boulogne; their names are not yet published.

Boulogne, 6 o'clock, A. M. 7th August, 1840. It is reported that seven are killed and drowned, exclusive of those wounded. Boulogne is perfectly tranquil, without any apprehension of farther disturbance.

The following is a copy of the proclamation scattered by the Prince and his followers:—

"Prince Napoleon, in the name of the French poeple, decrees as follows:

"The dynasty of the Bourbons of Orleans has ceased to reign. The French people are reinstated in their rights. The Chamber of Peers and the Chamber of Deputies are dissolved. A national Congress shall be convoked on the arrival of Prince Napoleon at Paris.

"M. Theirs, President of the provisional government.

"Marshal Clausel is named commander-in-chief of the troops assembled at Paris.

"General Pajot is to be commander of the first military division.

"All the chiefs of the corps who do not conform immediately to these orders shall be replaced.

"All officers, sub-officers and soldiers who will show their energetic sympathy for the national cause shall be recompensed in the most distinguished manner.

"In the name of the country. God protect France.

"Boulogne, the —, 1840.

"LOUIS NAPOLEON.

The London Chronicle says that Sir Howard Douglas has been recalled from the government of the Ionian Islands, and Lord Faukland appointed his successor.

Parliament was to be prorogued by the Qeen in person, on the 11th of August.

The latest Paris advices were of August 8th. The condemnation of Prince Louis was universal, both by the press and the qublic. Many persons had been arrested at the capital as implicated in the affair. It was supposed that the Prince and his companions would be brought to Paris, and tried by the Chamber of Peers.

An absurd idea obtained considerable credence that the attempt was countenanced by Lord Palmerston.

M. Guizot landed at Calais, from London, on the 7th, and proceeded to join the King at Eu.

A letter from Boulogne, dated the 8th, says that King Louis Phillippe was shot on his way to Eu, and that his coachman was killed.

FOUR DAYS LATER FROM EUROPE.

By the packet ship Garrick, Capt. Palmer, Liverpool papers to Saturday, August 15th, have been received.

The weather continued favorable and there was a prospect of fine crops.

Prorogation of Parliament.—On the 11th of August, the British Parliament was prorougеd to Thursday, the 8th of October, by Her Majesty in person. The usual forms were gone through with, which it is unnecessary to repeat. The King and Queen of the Belgians were present on the occasion. Annexed is the QUEEN'S SPEECH.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

The state of public business enables me to close this session of Parliament, and in releasing you from your attendance, I have to thank you for the care and attention with which you have discharged your important duties.

I continue to receive from foreign powers assurances of their friendly disposition and of their anxious desire for the maintenance of peace.

I congratulate you upon the termination of the civil war in Spain. The objects for which the quadruple engagements of 1834 were contracted having now been accomplished, I am in communication with the Queen of Spain, with a view to withdraw the naval force, which, in pursuance of those engagements, I have hitherto stationed on the northern coast of Spain.

I am happy to inform you that the differences with the government of Naples, the grounds and causes of which have been laid before you, have been put into a train of adjustment by the friendly mediation of the King of the French.

I rejoice also to acquaint you that the government of Portugal has made arrangements for satisfying certain just claims of some of my subjects, and for the payment of a sum to this country, under the stipulations of the Convention of 1837.

I am engaged, in concert with the Emperor of Austria, the King of Prussia, the Emperor of Russia, and the Sultan, in measures intended to effect the permanent pacification of the Levant, to maintain the integrity and independence of the Ottoman empire, and thereby to afford security for the peace of Europe.

The violent injuries inflicted upon some of my subjects by the officers of the Emperor of China and the indignities offered to an agent of my crown, have compelled me to send to the coast of China a naval and military force, for the purpose of demanding reparation and redress.

I have gladly given my consent to the act for the regulation of municipal corporations in Ireland.

I trust that the law which you have framed for further carrying into effect the reports of the ecclesiastical commissioners, will have the beneficial effect of increasing the efficiency of the Established Church, and of better providing for the religious instruction of my people.

I have observed with much satisfaction the result of your deliberations on the subject of Canada. It will be my duty to execute the measures which you have adopted, in such a manner, as without impairing the executive authority, may satisfy the best wishes of my subjects, and provide for the permanent welfare of my North American provinces.

The legislative bodies of Jamaica have applied themselves to the preparation of laws rendered necessary or expedient by the altered state of society. Some of these laws require revision and amendment, but I have every reason to expect cordial assistance from the Assembly of Jamaica, in the salutary work of improving the condition and elevating the character of the inhabitants of that colony. The conduct of the emancipated negroes throughout the West Indies has been remarkable for tranquil obedience to the law, and a peaceable demeanor in all the relations of social life.

Gentlemen of the House of Commons,

I thank you for the supplies which you have granted for the service of the year.

I lament that it should have been necessary to impose additional burthens upon my people, but I trust that the means which you have adopted for the purpose of meeting the exigencies of the public service, are calculated to press with as little severity as possible upon all classes of the community.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

In returning to your respective counties, you will resume those duties which you perform so much to the public benefit and advantage. It is my anxious desire to maintain tranquility at home and peace abroad. To these objects, so essential to the interests of this country, and to the general welfare of mankind my efforts will be sincerely and unremittingly directed, and feeling assured of your co-operation and support, I humbly rely upon the superintending care and continued protection of Divine Providence.

State of Trade.—The improving feeling manifested last week was fully maintained yesterday, and the demand for goods and yarn was decidedly better than for some weeks previous. In some few articles, especially in low numbers of throstle-yarn, and in 27 inch printing cloth, a small advance was realized; though, generally speaking, business was done at the full rates of last week.—Manchester Guardian.

Liverpool, Aug. 15.

We this week announce one of the most extraordinary triumphs over the elements ever effected by human art and energy. The Britannia, royal mail steamship, Capt. Robert Ewing, was yesterday at noon telegraphed off Holyhead. In the course of the afternoon, a river steamer was despatched to meet her, and by her active and enterprising agents, Messrs. D. and C. M'Iver, but the wind blowing fresh from the north-west, she was unable to board her, and it was not until about 9 in the evening that she was safely moored in the Sloyne. The Britannia sailed from Boston on the 1st inst., from Halifax on the 4th, thus completing the voyage from the North American continent to Liverpool in the unprecedently short period of ten days.

THE PERILS OF THE SEA.

Perhaps the records of the human race do not present a case of a more narrow escape from apparently inevitable destruction and death of a gallant ship's crew than in the case of the Peacock one of the sloops of war in the Exploring Expedition, when she sustained the injuries which obliged her to return, early in last March, to Sydney, (New South Wales,) to repair and refit. The following extract of a letter from a person on board the ship will give the reader some idea of it, though the nautical terms will make it less clear to some of our readers than those who are familiar with them.—National Intelligencer.

"Sydney, New South Wales,
March 16, 1840.

"Before this reaches you, you will probably have heard of our return to this port for repairs, having been compelled to do so by injuries sustained in the ice, by which we were confined for 40 most anxious hours—for twenty hours with the imminent fear of awful death. So closely was the ice packed around us, and in such vast masses, that even under a press of canvass, assisted by ice anchors and every other means that experience or necessity could suggest, we at times remained motionless for hours—the ice cutting into the vitals of the ship, and threatened to grind us to powder.

"On the evening of the—(date forgotten, and being now in town, cannot refer)—having procured soundings and seen appearance of land, cheered with the prospect of reaching it, we worked on through heavy drift ice; and next morning, about 9 A. M. in endeavoring to avoid a large mass ahead, we gave her a sternboard, which almost instantly brought the rudder in contact with another mass, and, so violent was the shock, that the rudder head was wrenched off, and the rudder fixed immovably athwart ships, rendering the ship almost entirely unmanageable. We used every effort to wear her, but, like mad, she drove on through the ice, till it became so close as to be impassable.

We then furled sails, planted ice anchors, and resolved to lie quiet until we could repair our rudder, when suddenly a large body of ice under our stern shifted its position, the anchors came home, and we drove down on a range of icebergs masthead high, and overhanging the decks, and with breathless anxiety awaited the shock, (which nothing human could prevent)—an immense impending mass tottered to its fall, and threatened to crush us beneath it. Our spanker boom struggled for a moment, and then broke like a reed; the sternboat crushed like an eggshell; and then went stern davits and all the upper works on the starboard sides as far as the gangway—every stanchion broke short off. The ship rebounded. We breathed again, and hauled aft jib and staysail sheets, and gave her a dart off from our inhospitable neighbor.

We then made sail, and, by great exertions, had a most providential escape, after thumping off our forefoot and cutting into the stern within an inch and a half of the 'woodends,' or (in as good English) within an inch and a half of our lives. Had our confinement been prolonged another hour, we should all have gone to Davy Jones.

"I have mentioned the anxiety with which we have viewed the overhanging mass tottering to its fall. As soon as sufficient space had intervened between our stern and the iceberg, it fell! harmlessly in our wake."

From Halifax.—We have received Halifax papers to the 2d inst. From the following extract it will be seen that our fishing vessels, which complain of being interfered with by British cruisers, are in turn complained of for encroaching on British ground. —Boston Daily Advertiser.

By a vessel just arrived from Marguerite, we learn that the American fishermen were in great numbers off that coast, many of whom were fishing within a half mile of the shore; some were known to catch as many as 40 barrels in a day. What a shame to see the people of our coast thus plundered, while we have so many men of war sent here to protect expressly our fisheries, and 100,000 barrels are carried off annually of mackerel, by the fishermen of the neigboring Republic. Many of these fishermen, when caught in the act, plead not guilty and look as innocent as pet foxes. One, we understand, was a few days ago brought into Sydney, for fishing within the limit; the captain and part of the crew are already arrived in town, to recover back the vessel now under detention. Had one of the men-of-war been stationed at Port Hood during the mackerel fishing season, then those schooners employed by the government for the protection of the fisheries and revenue, might do some good, but can a vessel of 50 tons, amongst probably 180 sail of those foreign fishermen, even be safe, let alone effect the object for which she is intended.—Novascotian.

Atlantic Dock Company.—A Company with this title was incrporated at the last session of the Legsilarure, with a capital of $1,000,000, and a right to commence business when $100,000 are paid in. The object of the Company is to construct a basin, embracing a surface of 42 acres and a fraction, on the Brooklyn side of the river, near the South Ferry. A diagram of the work accompanies the prospectus. Piers are to be erected 150 feet wide, forming the front of the basin on the stream, on which to erect warehouses, with sufficient depth of water on both sides of the piers to moor the largest class of steam-ships or merchant-vessels. The cost of the work, including $152,600 for the land and water right designed for this object, is estimated at $624,527. The value of the basin when finished, is estimated at $710,630, and of 517 lots adjacent to the basin, which the Company will own, at $893,650. Total estimated value, $1,604,280. The President of the Company is James De Peyster Ogden; the Directors, N. L. Griswold, Richard Irvin, Henry Grinnell, Cyrus P. Smith, Abraham Bell, Wm. R. Wadsworth, William Kemble, and Asa Worthington.

In illustration of the necessity and utility of the proposed improvements, it is remarked,—

1. That the main business of New York is now, and in all probability will for the next half century be transacted in and near Wall St., where are situated the Custom House, Exchange, Banks, Insurance Offices, &c.

2. That all the docks, from the Battery to Corlaer's Hook, on the East River, and as high up as Canal Street on the North River, are now full and crowded, and can not afford additional accommodations.

3. That the shipping interest will prefer going into Docks, and Basin at Brooklyn, rather than going up town on the New York side further than the points before mentioned; especially when better accommodations are prepared for them.

4. The benefit to shipping to be safely moored in a Basin against heavy gale winds, which annually does more or less damage to vessels in port.

5. That shipping in a Basin, with proper police regulations, are less liable to fire, robbery, and other depredations, and experience has shown that they are better preserved, especially in their rigging and cables, being better sheltered from the effects of the tides than those moored at the wharves or in the stream.

6. The premium for insurance on vessels in port moored in this Basin will probably be from 30 to 40 per cent. less than the present rates on shipping at our wharves.

7. The erection of a Hydraulic Dock, within the Basin will enable the ship owner to haul up his vessel without the expense of a steamboat to tow her to, and from a rail way.

8. From a use of these Piers, for warehouse goods, commerce will derive much advantage by expedition in the landing of merchandise, with a great reduction of expenses.

The facility for warehousing heavy goods on the Piers and around the Basin, such as iron, lead, dye-woods, tea, bags, coffee, molasses, sugars, rums, wines, hides, cotton bales, wool, &c., which can be done direct from the ship's hold into the warehouse, would be a saving of 50 to 75 per cent. in cartage and all other expenses, including a re-delivery as has been computed by competent persons after a careful investigation.

The Surry canal, in the suburbs of London, is a favorite place for suicides, and it is stated that since its formation no less than 2000 persons have been taken out of it dead or alive.

Heavy Robbery.—A package of twenty thousand dollars of the Union Bank of Louisiana, entrusted by Mr. Dumartrait, cashier of the branch at St. Martinsville, to the captain of the Arabian, to be delivered to the branch at Plaquemine, was stolen in some manner from the boat, during her passage between the two places. How the villain or villains accomplished their scheme remains a mystery, as nothing has yet transpired to develope the rascality; and prompt measures are already taken, and confident hopes are entertained of securing the guilty and recovering the money.

Abduction or Elopement.—On Wednesday morning of last week, a respectable citizen of Fishkill, presented himself at the bar, and craved the aid of the Police of this city in recovering a daughter of his, aged only thirteen years, who had fled her home, on Tuesday night, under circumstances which led him to believe she had been enticed to do so—or rather abducted—by a man named Henry James, a carpenter by trade, who had till the elopement been in the employ of the applicant. After hearing all the circumstances, Justice Merritt issued his warrant for the arrest of James, who, as was supposed, came to this city with the little girl; and as he had a sister residing at 197 Elm street, officer G. Hays in pursuance of his warrant, proceeded there for the purpose of ascertaining, if possible, some intelligence of the runaways. In this he was more successful than he anticipated; for, on entering the house, the very object of his search was discovered by him in one of the bed-rooms, snugly stored away in regular hymenial order. He gave them little time to prepare themselves for an audience with the magistrate and the aggrieved father, and after a hasty toilette the couple were escorted by Hays to the police office.

An affidavit of the Miss was taken in relation to the why and wherefore of her faulty proceedings, in which she stated that she had eloped from home under the influence of the persuasions and promises of marriage made her by James—all which false promises and persuasions are by the law made criminal in cases in which the wheedled party is under fourteen years of age. James, having clearly laid himself liable to the pains and penalties prescribed by this wholesome statute, he was fully committed to prison to answer for the offence at the Court of Sessions; and before noon the grand jury had found a true bill of indictment against him therefor. The girl was restored to her father, who took her home with him.

☞By commission of this crime, the accused has rendered himself liable to punishment in the state prison for three years, or in the county jail for one year, or to a fine of $1000, or to fine and imprisonment both.

Indian News.—By the Colorado Gazette of the 15th, from Matagorda, Texas, we gather some further particulars of the attack upon the town of Linnville by the Camanche Indians. The Gazette says, on Sunday week news was brought from the town of Linnville, by Captains Bishop and Anson, both eye-witnesses to the scene, that about five or six hundred Indians had come down upon Linnville and deliberately plundered the stores and then burned them to the ground. They stated also that Mr. Hugh C. Watts, the Collector of that District, was shot down in the water, on his way to the boats, and his wife carried off by an Indian, and Mr. O'Neale was shot on the wharf and scalped. Immediately upon the receipt of the news our citizens mustered and immediately formed a company of mounted men and a party on foot, and marched to their relief. They reached Robinson's crossing on the same evening, with the intention of attacking them there should they turn their attention towards Matagorda, and hearing they had turned their course west when they immediately marched in pursuit.

Before proceeding to Linnville the Indians first attacked Victoria, at which place they killed several of the inhabitants and destroyed a large amount of property, and drove off about 1500 mules and horses. The number supposed to be about 200. It was then supposed they made off with their booty, and the Victorians went in pursuit; of which the Indians seemed to have a full knowledge, for they again made their appearance the day after (Friday.) Colonel Pinkney Calwell on the evening of that day going to Victoria, was killed by them near the town. A Mexican servant that he had with him was pursued into town, where he was also killed.

Atmospherical Phenomenon.—A meteor of a most brilliant nature was observed to fall from the heavens by many of the inhabitants of St. Johns, about the hour of half-past six on Thursday evening. To the eye of the spectator, it presented the appearance of an exploded rocket at a very great elevation, and its brilliancy was of the most dazzling whiteness, resembling globes of molten silver, bleached as it were to a Drummond-light intensity. What renders this phenomenon the more remarkable is the circumstance of its being broad daylight at the time this aerolite exploded, and there not being any cloud visible near it.—No noise accompanied, nor did any wind blow either before or after its explosion, precluding therefore all idea of accounting for this striking meteor by supposing it to originate in atmospherical electricity.—Montreal Herald.

The St. John, N. B. Morning News, of the 4th inst. has the following paragraph:

"More Fishermen Seized.—Another American fishing schooner has been seized by an English cutter, and carried into Sydney, C. B., for an alleged violation of the treaty. Her name is the Pallas. She has been stripped from stem to stern, and her officers incarcerated for their audacity. A legal investigation will soon decide how the vessel is to be disposed of. So much for meddling with other people's affairs."

Some ten years ago a gentleman of this city was unfortunate in his business and made an assignment, under which the creditors of his house received fifty per cent of their claims, all that the assets of himself and partner then realized, and both of them received a full and honorable release of their obligations. The partnership was dissolved, and the gentleman of whom we speak made another start in business. In the face of many obstacles,—and certainly not the least, the financial condition of the country,—his talents, enterprize and perseverance have proved successful, and he has saved money. Yesterday he sent each of his old creditors a check for the unpaid moiety of the debts from which he had been released, with interest added in full from the day they were first due until the date of the checks. The amount thus paid yesterday was some fifty thousand dollars.—Philad. Gaz.

Do not kill your Bees.—The common puff ball or fungus Maximus, gathered at this season of the year, and dried so as to hold fire, has a stupifying effect upon bees, and renders them as harmless as brimstone does, without the deadly effects of the fumes of this latter article.

Severe Rencounter.—The Register, printed at Yazoo City, Mi., says that Mr. Wilkes, of that county, about ten days since took up a negro in the woods, who had been for some time a runaway from him, and as they were proceeding homewards the negro secretly drew a knife and inflicted several stabs upon Mr. W. before he had time to defend himself. Mr. Wilkes succeeded in stabbing the negro severely with his own knife, when both became disabled. Mr. W. received a cut in the abdomen, which entered the intestine, and for several days his life was despaired of; but he is now likely to recover. The negro is committed for trial.

A circumstance of rather a novel nature occurred yesterday in the Court House at the closing of the Criminal term. A native of the Emerald Isle, named Henry Smith, stepped forward in front of the bench, and stated to the Judges that he was on bail for Arson, for which crime he wished to be tried without delay, so that he might know whether he was to be hanged, transported or discharged; adding, with much nonchalanche, in an under tone, that it was quite immaterial to him which was to be his fate. His securities were released, and he was bound over in his own recognizances to appear at the court of Oyer and Terminer.—Montreal Herald.

Look out for Pirates.—Mr. Editor: I wish, through the columns of your valuable journal, to caution mariners trading on the coast of Florida, and put them on the look out for Pirates.

There has been seen in this bay, and also in the Apalachee bay, and cruising between this and St. Marks, a certain sloop boat thought to be the Com. Perry. The conduct of her crew excited the suspicion of some persons who examined the boat, and found that she was well supplied with arms, yaugers, pistols and Bowie knives. The crew are well known in Florida, particularly about Tallehassee, and their assassin like conduct, and murderous disposition, are sufficient causes to put honest men on the look out, and treat them at every port where they arrive, as the enemies of law and good order. The Governor of the Territory had some days since to order out the militia to quell this same gang at Tallahassee. He succeeded in routing them, and they have now taken to the Gulf, as best suited to their operations, and I think it is now the duty of the Hon. Secretary of the Navy to send out a cutter to our coast, and protect our commerce and our citizens, and secure these ruffians and bring them to justice.—Apalachicola Adventurer, Aug. 23.

Phenomena of the Sea.—We learn from Falmouth that several days since a coffin about three feet long, made of planed boards and painted white, with a heavy weight of sea coal sewed in a canvas bag closely attached to it, was found upon the sea beach at the north side of Buzzard's Bay. A coroner's inquest was called, and upon opening the coffin, it was found to contain the body of a child, supposed to be about three or four years old, and had apparently been dead some months. The flesh was nearly consumed. It was conjectured that the decease of the child had occurred at sea, and evidently the last rites which humanity could offer, in consigning the body to the deep, had been performed with affectionate solicitude and interest. That it should have emerged to the shore with such a weight as remained attached to it, remains with the unexampled phenomena of natural events.—New Bedford Mercury

Cannibals in Texas.—A late number of the Austin Gazette says,—"A few days ago a Camanche was killed on the Brushy bay, by some Tonkahua Indians—his hands and arms, and thick part of his thighs were cut off and carried home, as a feast to their women and children. The Tonkahuas made no secret of their partiality for human flesh, and state that all the native Indians in Texas, eat their enemies when they can catch them.

Steamboat Accident.—We learn by a passenger, that the Mail Boat Pike, plying regularly between Cincinnati and Louisville, struck a rock about one o'clock on the morning of the 3d, some forty or fifty miles below this city, near the head of Big Bone bar. She was immediately turned towards shore by the pilot, and sunk only to the lower guard. Her passengers were taken off by the steamboat Orleans, and brought up.—Cincinnati. Gazette.

Ignorance.—It is said that there is in Hindostan seventy five million of women who can neither read nor write, and thirty million of these are British subjects!

Bunker Hill Monument.—The President of the Bunker Hill Monument Association has acknowledged the receipt of a donation for the monument fund of $600 from the ladies of Brooklyn, N. Y., with a very handsome letter from their Treasurer, Saloma G. Hazard; also of a donation of $150 from Miss Mary Otis, Treasurer of the ladies of Fair Haven; also of a donation of $200 from a gentleman of Boston. The ladies of a number of towns in Worcester county have made contributions for the same object, and paid them over to the Treasury of the ladies of Worcester.

A Canadian Heroine Dead.—At Lothiniere, on the 27th, July, at the age of a 100 years and several months, Charlotte Ouellet, of the parish of St. Anne de la Pocatiere died. This lady was one of a number of young girls of St. Anne, who put on men's apparel and shouldered the musket to drive out a detachment of English Regulars, who were amusing themselves by setting fire to the barns and dwellings of the inhabitants of St. Anne during the seige of Quebec. This lady and the rest of her company fired upon the soldiers who instantly fled, making temporary barrows in their flight, to rescue their dead, who had fallen under the fire of these brave Canadian girls. At the age of 100 years, and a few days only before her death, Charlotte Ouellet could not refrain from a hearty laugh at the thought that she was one who had made the best shots. She has left two daughters, the eldest of whom has been a wife for 55 years, the second has just lost her husband after a happy union of 53 years.—Swanton. (Vt.) American.

A Rich Man.—M. de Tiskewies died a short time since in Russian Lithuania, leaving three sons and one daughter. His property comprised forty-six extensive domains, on which there are 20,000 families of peasantry, reckoning in them 6,000 males.—These were his serfs. In money he possessed 56,000,000 of Polish florins, equal to 21,626,000 French francs.—Boston Recorder.

Doctor of Every Thing.—At a recent anniversary of the Provincial University at Eaton, the honorary degree of Doctor of Belles Lettres, English Literature, Languages, Mathematics and Natural Science; the degree of Sir, (Master of Arts,) Doctor of Divinity; Doctor of Civil Law, and Doctor of Law and Logic; were severally confirmed on the Hon. George Cooke, of Albany, U. S.; a gentleman of enviable distinction, beloved for his universal benevolence and characteristic philanthropy.—Quebec Gaz.

It is stated in the Kingston Chronicle, that Kingston is decided upon as the seat of government for Canada. The senior military officer at Toronto, has positive orders to remove his head quarters to Kingston with the greatest despatch. It is also said that the heads of the civil departments are soon to follow to the same place.

The Postmaster General has countermanded his recent orders against the conveyance of newspapers on mail routes, out of the mails.

The Hon. A. B. Hasbrouck, late of Kingston, in this State, was on Monday inaugurated as President of Rutgers College, New Brunswick.

THE TEACHING OF THE SENSES.

The eye is but a grated pane,
Through which the clay-imprisoned soul
Looks dimly forth on earth and sky,
Yet deeming all a heaven-writ scroll.

We gaze and gaze, and sometimes dream
That these may satisfy the heart;
But, lo! an after longing comes,
Which makes the cheated dreamer start.

We feel that these are signs—not things—
Prophetic visions cast before;
And yearning fancy turns to faith,
Making us sure of something more.

The ear doth catch sweet tones around
From woman's tongue and Eol's choir;
Yet this earth-music is but one
Sweet, stolen string from heaven's lyre.

And this is whispered to the heart;
For, though the raptured sense be blest
With song, a yearning wish will rise
For something still to fill the breast.

The rose regales, yet seems to cheat,
Not satisfy, the sense it woos;
The jaded palate turns away
From that which first seemed to choose.

The nerve with sweet sensation thrills;
Yet languor comes to claim its turn,
And leaves the sickened soul within
For something better still to yearn.

Thus every sense exalts the soul—
Bestows a transient draught of bliss,
Then breaks the cup, to make us thirst
For surer, purer joys than this.

They lift us to the mountain top,
Where Earth and Heaven in contrast lie,
And bid us spurn this lower sphere,
And spread the wing for yonder sky!

THE BARGAIN.

'What have you there, husband?' said Mrs. Courtland to her thrifty and careful spouse, as the latter paused in the open door, to give some directions to a couple of porters who had just set something upon the pavement in front of the house.

'Just wait a moment, and I'll tell you. Here, Henry, John, bring it in here,' and the two porters entered with a beautiful sofa, nearly new.

'Why, that is a beauty, husband! How kind you are! But what did you give for it, dear?'

'Why only twenty dollars.'

'Well now, that's a bargain.'

'Aint it, though? It takes me to get things cheap,' continued the prudent Mr. Courtland, chuckling with delight.

'Why, how in the world did it go off so low?'

'I managed that. It aint every one that understands how to do these things.'

'But how did you manage it, dear? I should like to know.'

'Why, you see, there were a great many other things there, and among the rest, some dirty carpets. Before the sale, I pulled over these carpets, and threw them upon the sofa; a good deal of dust fell from them, and made the sofa look 50 per cent worse than it really was. When the sale commenced, there happened to be but few persons there; and I asked the auctioneer to sell the sofa first, as I wanted to go, and would bid for it, if it were sold then. Few persons bid freely at the opening of a sale.'

'What's bid for this splendid sofa?' he began.

'I'll give fifteen dollars for it,' said I; 'it's not worth more than that, for it's been dreadfully abused.'

'Fifteen dollars! fifteen dollars! fifteen dollars for this beautiful sofa!' he went on, and a man next to me bid seventeen dollars. I let the auctioneer cry the last bid for a few minutes, until I saw he was likely to knock it down.

'Twenty dollars!' said I, and that's as much as I'll go for it.'

'The other bidder was deceived by this, as to the real value of the sofa, for it did look dreadfully disfigured by the dust and dirt, and consequently the sofa was knocked off to me.'

'That was admirably done, indeed!' said Mrs. Courtland' with a bland smile of satisfaction at having obtained the elegant piece of furniture at so cheap a rate. 'And it's so near a match, too, for the sofa in our front parlor.'

This scene occurred at the residence of a merchant in this city, who was beginning to count his fifty thousands. Let us look at the other side of the picture.

On the day previous to the sale, a widow lady, with one daughter, a beautiful and interesting girl about seventeen, were seated on a sofa in a neatly furnished parlor in Hudson street. The mother held in her hand a small piece of paper, on which her eyes were intently fixed; but it could readily be perceived that she saw not the characters that were written upon it.

'What is to be done, ma?' at length asked the daughter.

'Indeed, my child, I cannot tell. The bill is fifty dollars, and has been due, you know, for several days. I haven't got five dollars, and your bill for teaching the Misses Leonard cannot be presented for two weeks, and then it will not amount to this sum.'

'Can't we sell something more, ma?' suggested the daughter.

'We have sold all our plate and jewelry, and I'm sure I don't know what we can dispose of, unless it be something that we really want.'

'What do you say to selling the sofa, ma?'

'Well, I don't know, Florence. It don't seem right to part with it. But perhaps we can do without it.'

'It will readily bring fifty dollars, I suppose.'

'Certainly. It is of the best wood and workmanship, and cost one hundred and forty dollars. Your father bought it a short time before he died, and that is less than two years past, you know.'

'I should think it would bring nearly a hundred dollars,' said Florence, who knew nothing of auction sacrifices; 'and that would give us enough, besides paying the quarter's rent, to keep us comfortable until some of my bills become due.'

'That afternoon the sofa was sent, and the next afternoon Florence went to the auctioneer's to receive the money for it.

'Have you sold the sofa yet, sir?' asked the timid girl, in a low, hesitating voice.

'What sofa, miss?' asked the clerk, looking steadily in her face with a bold stare.

'The sofa sent by Mrs.——, sir.'

'When was it to have been sold?'

'Yesterday, sir.'

'O, we haven't got the bill made out yet. You can call day after tomorrow, and we'll settle it for you.'

'Can't you settle it to-day, sir? we want the money particularly.'

Without replying to the timid girl's request, the clerk commenced throwing open the leaves of a large account book, and in a few minutes had taken off the bill of the sofa.

'Here it is—eighteen dollars and sixty cents. See if it's right, and then sign this receipt'

'Aint you mistaken, sir? It was a beautiful sofa, and cost one hundred and forty dollars.'

'That's all it brought, miss, I assure you. Furniture sells very badly now.'

Florence rolled up the bills that were given her, and returned home with a heavy heart.

'It only brought eighteen dollars and sixty cents, ma,' she said, throwing the notes into her mother's lap, and bursting into tears.

'Heaven only knows, then, what we shall do,' said the widow, clasping her hands together, and looking upwards.

There are always two parties in the case of bargains—the gainer and the looser. And while the one is delighted with the advantage he has obtained, he thinks nothing of the necessities which have forced the other party to accept the highest offer.—But few buyers of bargains think or care about taking this view of the subject.

From the Religious Magazine.

FIRE PLUG IN THE DISTILLERY.

How appropriate the designation! you will find it, reader, in one of the principal avenues of this great and good city. You will see a painted hand upon a sign pointing to a distillery, and a direction attached to it, in plain and fair English, "Fire plug in the distillery." It was intended to designate the same as several other similar signs in the city, pointing to what might with stricter propriety be termed the water plug; as it is the plug where water is drawn to extinguish the city fires. But in this instance the direction was stikingly significant. A fire plug in the distillery! Yes, truly, something is there to be found, which does not extinguish fire, but which is itself fire, and which sets on fire the course of nature. It is only to pull the plug, and lo, a stream of liquid fire.

As I was passing that manufactory of fire, the other day, I was led to reflect upon the probable quantity of that terrible material, which has been made there, and upon the number and variety of fires which it has kindled.

In how many men has it kindled up the fire of appetite—insatiate, ungovernable, tormenting appetite—which has refused to let them rest day or night, till, through unutterable suffering, it hurried them down to a premature grave.

In how many human bosoms has it kindled the fire of remorse,—that keenest, deepest, most relentless, most intolerable pang that ever vists our fallen humanity;—a fire never to be quenched, but to wax stronger and more malignant, and burn on to the lowest hell.

In how many families has it kindled the fire of domestic strife; turning the hearts of parents and children against each other, and, instead of love, peace, kindness, and domestic bliss, producing alienation, contention, wrath and bitterness, and making the family scene, a fit emblem of perdition.

In the bosom of how many a wife has it kindled the fire of untold anguish, as she thought of the ruin of her husband, and of all her once bright earthly hopes. The desire of her eyes—he to whom she has committed all her earthly interest and prospects—has by that distillery been made a wreck, a living torment, an incarnate fiend, so that she whom he so fondly once caressed, must now flee in terror from his presence.

In how many a bosom has it kindled the fire of parental solicitude and distress, such as none but a parent's heart can know, in view of a fallen, profligate, vagabond son. Once the pride and joy of his heart, the promised solace and support of his declining and tottering age; now, ruined by strong drink, and bringing down the grey heirs of his fond parents with sorrow to the grave.

Upon the fair cheek of how many a daughter has it kindled the fire of shame, the burning blush, as she beheld her own father or brother giving himself up to the vile pleasures of ungovernable lust, and bringing everlasting disgrace upon himself and his family. That name, of which it is the privilege of every daughter to be proud, she can hardly mention in virtuous and refined society, but with crimson cheek.

In how many families has it kindled the fire of h[illegible]r, the distressing sensation of nature when her necessities are unsupplied, in the groups of suffering children crying for bread, stretching their importuning hands and lifting their streaming eyes to their distracted and agonized mother, who had no means of relieving them, because the brutal father had expended the last sixpence for a drink of rum.

In how many places has it kindled the fire of animosities between neighbors,—alienations; hatreds; strifes; contentions in law, and out of law; thus setting the poor children of the dust and affliction, who ought to be mutual helpers in this scene of trial, to worrying, and biting, and devouring one another.

But I forbear. The catalogue is endless—at least imagination is unable to find its limit. I was about to add, how many of those "fires which are never quenched" has it probably already kindled in eternity;—this too, I must leave for the reader.

With these reflections, it will not seem strange that the business of a rum-distiller appeared to me to be one of the most thankless, most profitless, most miserable of all human employments; and, that nothing could possibly redeem it, by one iota, but the possibility that a mere fraction of the rum distilled might subserve some valuable purpose in the arts and the materia medica. In this view, I could not but think that rum-distillers, as well as rum-sellers, should be licensed and controlled by law, and that government, which has to attend to the destitute and the vicious, made such by rum, should also take the whole business of the manufacture and disposal of rum into its own hands.

FREQUENT EXERCISE OF THE VOICE NOT INJURIOUS TO THE LUNGS.

The following testimony confirms us in the belief that when the effort to speak or sing is made naturally, i. e., below the diaphragm, that it has a most salutary effect upon the health. But when made above the diaphragm a bent and constrained posture is induced and pulmonary complaints are caused or aggravated.

M. Benoisten de Chateauneuf, in his researches into the occupations which are productive of disease of the lungs, has found no evidence to support the generally received opinion, that the frequent and prolonged exercise of the voice, in public criers, singers, and musicians, is peculiarly liable to produce consumption. During the space of ten years, he has found, upon the register of four of the principal Parisian hospitals, but thirteen male and six female singers recorded as having been admitted as patients into those institutions; and as no one of these individuals are stated to have died of consumption, it is fairly presumable, that no one was affected with it.—There can be no doubt, he conceives, that prolonged exercise of the voice, singing and playing upon wind instruments, may injure the lungs in persons in whom these organs are feeble or predisposed to disease. But in such cases not only is the exercise of the voice in declamation and singing, injurious, but also violent exercise, running, dancing, mental agitation, all of which produce an effect upon the lungs, when they are already enfeebled, or have a tendency to disease, in the highest degree prejudicial. But when the lungs are sound, and the chest well formed and capacious, the frequent exercise of the voice as well as of the body, so far from producing injury, is decidedly beneficial. We do not, remarks the author just referred to, find that preachers, advocates or comedians are particularly subject to consumption; and the crowd of actors, who for the last thirty years we have heard declaim and sing night after night, prove that when the lungs are sound, neither singing nor declamatian endangers the safety of those organs.

What however does certainly injure the lungs, is that painful position of the body, from whatever cause assumed, in which they are constrained constantly to dilate in order to receive air which is forced into them, while the bony structure by which they are surounded, is caused, from the unnatural position of the body, to compress them in nearly every direction, and thus resist their developement. In this manner, the respiration becomes impeded, an uneasiness is experienced in the breast, and if the same state of things frequently recur, it gives rise finally to the diseases which would have been produced, had a malconformation or narrowness of the chest existed from birth. Every species of occupation, and all articles of forms or clothing which cause the individual to assume the constrained posture here alluded to, produce injurious effects, which would not have resulted from the natural exercise of the lungs—they invite disease, which otherwise might not have occurred.

From these observations; we learn how dangerous is the use of belts, corsets, or other articles of clothing which tend to compress the chest, and by that means impede or diminish the motions of the lungs; and how necessary it is to prevent the youth of both sexes, especially when there already exists a narrowness of the chest, from occupying many hours of the day in painting, embroidery, and needlework; in short in any pursuit which demands a constrained position of the body.—Journal of Health.

TIME.

This the most indefinable, yet paradoxical of things; the past is gone, the future is not come, and the present becomes the past even while we attempt to define it, and like the flash of lightning at once exists and expires. Time is the measure of all things, but is itself immeasurable, and the grand discloser of all things, but is itself undisclosed. Like space, it is incomprehensible, because it has no limits and it would be still more so if it had. It is more obscure in its sources than the Nile, and in its termination than the Niger;—and advances like the swiftest tide, but retreats like the swiftest torrent. It gives wings of lightning to pleasure, but feet of lead to pain; and lends expectation a curb, but enjoyment a spur. It robs beauty of her charms to bestow them on her picture, and builds a monument to merit but denies it a house; it is the transient and deceitful flatterer of falsehood, but the tried and final friend to truth. Time is the most subtle yet the most insatiable of all depredators, and by appearing to take nothing, is permited to take all; nor can it be satisfied until it has stolen a world from us, and us from the world. It constantly flies, yet overcomes all things by might, and although it is the present ally, it will be the futrue conquerer of Dsath. Time, the cradle of hope, but the grave of ambition, is the stern corrector of fools, but the salutary counsellor of wise, bringing all the dread to one, and all the desire to the other: but, like Cassandra, warns us with a voice that even the sagest discredit too long, and the silliest believe too late. Wisdom walks before it, and repentance behind it; he that has made it his friend will have little to fear from his enemies, but he that has made it his enemy, will have but little to hope from his friends.—Lacon.

Grog-shops with Christians.—It has been remarked by a late writer on the nations of the east, that grog-shops are not found in Constantinople, (in Turkey,) unless in the Christian quarter of the city, and are only tolerated for the use of Christians. In Persia they are still more rare—and why? O Christian men, listen to the degrading reason—because the Christian population is small. The same writer, (Southgate,) says that confirmed drunkards are rare, excepting among the Christians. How awful the conclusion that every reflecting mind must arrive at after reading the above. Surely there is intelligence enough, if the proper knife of excision be used, to remove these soul and body destroying evils from the face of our land. If we have any one national cause to mourn over, it is that the sale and use of ardent spirits as a bevarage finds protection at the hands of the law, and is encouraged by our rulers. Shame, where is thy blush.—N. Y. Evangelist.

The shock of the explosion of the powder mills at Exeter, N. H., on Friday last, was felt at a distance of 40 miles. At Newburyport, panes of glass were broken, and the explosion distinctly heard. At Gloucester the shock was supposed to have been caused by an earthquake. So great was its violence here, says the Telegraph, at a distance of 40 miles that several persons sprung from their beds in alarm, and the inmates of one or two houses supposed that their buildings were falling down upon their heads! The windows rattled as in a violent tempest, and the earth trembled as though some great convulsion of nature had taken place. The master of a vessel coming into the harbor at the time, says he not only saw the light, but something to rise in the air "resembling the roof of a house."

The rich are often the veriest slaves on earth. They toil, and labor, and calculate and are filled with anxiety all their days, and all they get in return, is a simple subsistence, a coffin, and a winding sheet, and a few pretended mourners when they die, who think less of them than of their estates.

A good book and a good woman are excellent things for those who know how to appreciate their value. There are men, however, who judge both from the beauty of the covering.

FOR THE FARMER.

HARVESTING POTATOES.

Never commence harvesting your potatoes till they have come to full maturity, or till the frost has killed the tops. While the tops are green, the tubers are growing and improving. In digging them, use either the plough or the potato hook. As soon as they are out of the ground let them be picked up. Never permit them to remain out in the sun or air longer than you can possibly help. I am well aware that this direction is at once in opposition to the rule of many farmers, which is to allow their potatoes to remain out in the sun, drying, as long as they can, and yet have them picked up on the same day they are dug, in order that as much of the earth as possible may cleave off from them. This is very bad management for potatoes designed for the table use; because it renders them strong, or acrid in taste.

Every attentive observer has noticed that that part of the potato which happens to be uncovered in the hill, changes its color to a dark green. This portion is very much injured in taste; in fact it is unfit for use because it has imbibed from the atmosphere deleterious qualities. As soon as potatoes are dug, and exposed to the light and air, this change begins. Every attentive observer has also noticed that potatoes are of the best flavor and quality after they have come to maturity and while they are yet in the ground. The longer they are dug and exposed to the light and air, the more of this high flavor is gone, till it is wholy lost, and they become unpalatable and unwholesome. Potatoes that remain all winter in the earth where they grew, are in excellent condition for the table in the spring. In view, therefore, of all these facts, let us prescribe a rule in harvesting the potatoes, which will tend to perpetuate through the whole season these excellent qualities. As soon then as practicable after digging, remove the potatoes designed for the table to a dark bin in the cellar. After depositing thus the whole crop, or as many as are designed for the table, cover with earth or sand, and they will retain their excellent qualities, till they begin to sprout in the spring, and require to be removed. When shipped for sea, they ought to be put into casks and covered with sand.—Albany Cultivator.

PROSPECTUS OF THE CASKET, AND PHILADELPHIA MONTHLY MAGAZINE.

THE great increase of the subscription list of the Casket, which has been nearly doubled since the commencement of the last volume, warrants the most extensive improvements on the first of July 1840, at which time a new volume will be commenced with increased vigour. Nothing need be said of the firm basis on which the Casket stands, it being already the oldest magazine in the country, and has maintained its popularity, in the face of all opposition. It is to be found upon the centre tables of families making literary pretentions from Maine to Georgia.

Type—Embellishments.

The Casket is printed with a clear and beautiful type, upon the finest white paper. The illustrations are not surpassed by those of any periodical, at home or abroad: and beside the monthly steel engravings, a quarterly plate of colored Fashions has lately been added. The style of these embellishments is unequaled, and they are always accompanied by an appropriate sketch. No wood cuts disgrace the work. Whatever appears in the Casket, is of the first order of art.

The volume will be with the first of a series of splendid mezzotint engravings, prepared expressly for the work, by the burin of Sartain, who deservedly stands as the best engraver of the kind in the United States.

Literary character.

The literary character of the Casket is well known. It is wholly original, of the highest order, and sustained by writers of the first rank. Essays, Tales Sketches and Travels, compose its prominent prose articles; while the poetry is equalled by that of no other magazine of like character. The variety for which the Casket is celebrated, shall suffer no diminution; but on the contrary every exertion shall be made to increase its interest.

Several Romances of the Revolution have already appeared, and others shall follow in the course of the volume, presenting when finished, a complete picture of the manners, and a historical account of the great battles of that time. Thus, the Casket, instead of being filled with sickly sentimentalties, aims at a true delineation of human nature in every variety of passion.

The series of thrilling nautical sketches, entitled entitled Cruizing in the Last War, and which are rated by the contemporary press, equal to the celebrated sketches from 'Tom Cringle's Log,' will be continued and the 'Leaves from a Lawyers's Port Folio,' which have attained a deserved celebrity, will still furnish attraction to the Magazine.

We shall furnish the readers of the Casket with some valuable papers from entirely new contributors. The author of 'Old Ironsides on a Lee Shore,' will give the first of a number of Sketches in the July number. We count upon his prolific and graceful pen to do much in maintaining the great popularity of the Magazine. In addition to the variety already embraced in the pages of the Magazine, our Syrian Letters,' the first of which appears in the June number as introductory, will [illegible] and add worth to its pages. They are from an unpractised pen

Fashions.

The Fashions are published in the Casket quarterly, or as often as any really new style arrives from Paris. The engravings are colored and executed from original designs. No old, worn out plates are retouched and then published as the latest fashions.—The truth of our designs may be tested by comparing them with the latest descriptions of dresses from London and Paris. They are universally admitted to be the finest specimens of engraving and coloring afforded by any Magazine in the country.

The expense of getting [illegible] [illegible] Romance, etc.— The readers of the Casket are presented with these fashion plates as an extra. [illegible] the regular and [illegible] always accompany the work.

Time of Publication.

The Casket is published on the first of the month in every quarter of the Union. The most distant subscriber consequently receives it on that day, as well as those who reside in Philadelphia. [illegible] the principal cities agents [illegible] by which means subscribers in the country can obtain their copies free of postage.

Terms.—Three Dollars per annum. Or Two Copies yearly for Five Dollars, invariably in advance, post paid. No new subscriber received without the money, or the name of a responsible agent.

Editors who may copy this prospectus and will send a copy, marked [illegible] addressed to the Saturday Evening Post (which will save postage on newspapers) shall be promptly furnished with the work. To be particular in this matter, we should like a copy of the paper marked, to be sent more than once, that no mistake or delay may occur.—Editors are served with the Magazine from the time the advertisement is received. We must state, that many inserted the advertisement at the close of the last volume, and expected all the back numbers.—This of course we could not be expected to grant.

DE RUYTER INSTITUTE.

SOLOMON CARPENTER, A. B., Principal.
GILES M. LANGWORTHY, Teacher of Math.
AUGUSTUS L. SAUNDERS, M. D., Lecturer on Chemistry.

Ladies Department.
Mrs. L. M. CARPENTER, Preceptress.

This Institution is located in the pleasant and healthful village of De Ruyter. Its buildings are both spacious and commodious. Study rooms of which there are a large number, are furnished with chairs, tables, bedsteads, and stoves, and rented to gentlemen at one shilling per week, or one shilling for each student, the rooms being large enough to accommodate two. Good board is afforded at one dollar and twenty five cents per week, including washing or lodging. One shilling extra, is charged to those who require both.

The institution is furnished with a good Philosophical and chemical apparatus. It is also furnished with a valuable Library. A scientific society connected with the Institute, is furnished with a choice collection of Minerals and Curiosities.

About twenty-one thousand dollars has already been expended on the De Ruyter Institute for the purpose of facilitating the student in his pursuit of scientific knowledge.

It is the object of those to whom the management of the Institute is entrusted, to make the expenses of acquiring a knowledge of the sciences, as light as possible.

And the public may be assured that a strict attention will be paid to the moral cultivation of the student; and the trustees and teachers will spare no reasonable pains to render the time spent at the De Ruyter Institute, as agreeable and profitable to the student as circumstances will admit.

Young gentlemen and ladies wishing to engage in the pursuit of science, are respectfully invited to spend a term or two, at the De Ruyter Institute and satisfy themselves in regard to its merit.

The year is divided into three terms, of fourteen weeks each. The first term commenced on the twelfth day of September; The second term on the second day of January; and the third term on the eighth day of May.

THE PORTAGE TUNNEL—THE CLIFTON COTTAGE.

NOTES FROM MY SCRAP-BOOK.

The western part of New-York presents to the traveler some of the rarest specimens of Natural Scenery that can be traced in the State. Its rugged hills and extended plains—its beautiful lakes and foaming rivers, may well vie with an eastern Cattskill and a majestic Hudson. Even while traversing the banks of our own familiar GENESEE, we may find much to admire and look upon with wonder and delight. Indeed, we may wend our way along the banks of this noble river, from its extreme source in the northern part of Pennsylvania to where it merges into Lake Ontario, and we shall behold one continued scene of beauty and grandeur.

THE TUNNEL.—The Portage Tunnel, (which is situated in the town whose name it bears, in the county of Allegany,) where the Genesee Valley Canal is destined to pass through a rugged mountain for nearly a mile, may be accounted worthy of a passing notice. The writer of this brief sketch visited the Tunnel in the autumn of '39, nearly one year since. This stupendous work was then in the second year of its progress, and but a faint estimate, truly, could be formed of its grandeur and sublimity.

On entering the Tunnel the visitor is waited upon by a servant with a lighted candle in his hand, until dismal objects appear in view; which, however, on a more near approach prove to be the workmen—hardy sons of the Emerald Isle—who dare to risk their lives in this drear and sombrous abode. The sound of the stealthy footstep, as it echoes and re-echoes upon the ear, reminds one of distant thunder; and if, perchance, we are in a timorous mood, dire sights, frightful visions, and fearful apprehensions pass before the mind in rapid succession. Large fragments of the shattered rock occasionally fall from over head, sweeping every obstacle with which their course is obstructed; and many a noble son of Erin has sacrificed his life under their ponderous weight. In a moment all is forgotten—the scene is changed—and every man is again busy at his drill.—The Tunnel, when completed, will be a great work, and a curiosity well worth visiting, in connection with its surrounding scenery. I believe the estimated expense of its construction is near $500,000.

THE COTTAGE.—Upon a bold and commanding summit of the mountain stands "CLIFTON COTTAGE." It is surrounded by a beautiful grove of forest-trees and shrubbery, and overlooks the awful chasm in the rocky mountain through which the foaming Genesee dashes its maddened waters from a cataract just above of 110 feet. The 'Cottage' is occupied by Col. JOHNSON, formerly Mayor of Rochester City, who has the supervision of the constructing of the Tunnel; and to this gentleman's ingenuity and oddity the 'Cottage' is indebted for its romantic appearance.—The 'Cottage' stands 400 feet above the surface of the river; and the rocky banks, being perpendicular, present one of the most wild and frightful views imaginable. You may look over the jutting cliffs, and down, down, DOWN the gaping chasm you espy clumps of what appear to be beautiful ever-green shrubs of a tiny growth—and yet those "tiny" shrubs are lofty pine and hemlock forest-trees, towering one hundred feet above the ground upon which they stand!

But, to the 'Cottage.' It stands exactly over the line of the Canal; and the Tunnel, when completed, will pass directly under it at a depth of 200 feet below the foundation of the edifice! The external appearance of the 'Cottage' presents a rare and unique specimen of architectural beauty, and rural simplicity. The main body of the edifice is 40 feet square, and three stories high, including the attic,—it is built up with logs, the bark taken off smooth, and the interstices tightly filled with cement; the roof is neatly shingled, four square, with the attic windows jutting out on either side, and a neat observatory at the top. Attached to each corner of the building, and communicating therewith, is a neat and commodious wing, finished after the manner of the main building. Altogether, the outward appearance is grotesque, yet neat, and its rusticity and beauty are in harmonious taste with the romantic and rural scenery with which it is surrounded.

The interior arrangement of the Cottage is in keeping with its outward. The whole of the main building is thrown into one grand Saloon, 38 feet square, in the centre of which is a large Oak Tree, just as the God of Nature planted it, and standing on the very spot where it has, perhaps, for centuries withstood the fierce blasts of the "winter's winds," running up as a centre column to sustain the floors above. The floor is grooved closely about the roots of the "Old Oak," and is covered with a neat rush carpet; and in this room are a number of settees, or sofas, made with exquisite neatness from the crooked sticks of the forest.

The second story contains a set of sleeping rooms on one side of the hall, and on the other a Music Saloon, with a Piano; rare music, by the way, in the midst of a forest; and even the "fairy hands" that waked it into song were hard by. Adjoining the Music Saloon was a Reading Room, where I found upon some centre tables most of the literary Periodicals of the day, such as the "Knickerbocker," the "Gem," the "Zodiac," &c. &c. The third story was not finished off. H.

SOCIALISM SILENCED; OR THE LOGIC OF THE LIFE.

A TRUE STORY—BY THE REV. HUGH STOWELL, M. A. (OF ENGLAND.)

It makes one sad to find how widely the canker of socialism has spread amongst some classes of our working men. In some large manufacturing towns, there are few factories or workshops into which it has not crept, and it does most mischief where there is most ignorance. Sometimes one pert, prating forward fellow will dupe and mislead a whole set of men, because he talks boldly, uses big words, and seems to be very knowing and deep. What a pity that our plain men are not more of them able to handle the evidence of Christianity and to beat such pretenders with their own weapons. There is, however, one way, and that, after all, the best way, in which the simplest and least learned believer may meet and put down the subtlest infidel—a way in which he may face the scorner as David the circumcised Philistine, with nothing save a sling and a stone, yet in the name of the Lord of hosts, be "bold as a lion." The way I mean is, to contend, not so much by words as by deeds; not so much by the logic of the lip, as by the logic of the life.

I shall best make my meaning plain by a simple account, which, I can promise you shall be quite true, because it will be about what lately happened in my own parish, and partly under my own eye. John —— is a dyer, who lives in a corner of my district. Some years ago, he was as bad a character as you can well conceive; a drunkard, a blasphemer, a cruel husband, a noted boxer, a practical infidel. As is usual in such cases, his house was the home of wretchedness, unfurnished and deserted; his wife was in rags, his cupboard empty, and debt and shame were his constant companions. About three years ago, however, he came under the notice of an assistant of mine. His wife was induced to open her house for a cottage lecture, and the husband, after a time, began to steal into the back part of the dwelling during the little services, and to lend a half-unwilling ear to what was going on. It pleased Him, "who leads the blind by a way that they know not," to reach his conscience in this manner. He became very uneasy, and, in spite of his mean clothes, began to attend church. For a time, his anguish of mind was greater than can be told. But at last that Savior who came "to bind up the broken-hearted," and who died on the cross to save sinners, manifested himself to him as he doth not to the world, giving him "beauty for ashes, the oil of joy for mourning, the garment of praise for the spirit of heaviness." Isaiah lxi. 1—3.

The calm morning after a stormy night is not a greater change than that which followed in the life and lot of happy John.—All things became new. He set himself at once to wipe away the heavy scores which stood against him at the tavern and the shop, till at last he owed no man any thing but love. His house was made clean and tidy, and one piece of furniture after another was purchased, till the whole face of his cottage was changed. His wife and himself, decently dressed, were in their places at church whenever the Sabbath speaking bell bade them in the house of prayer, and ere long they were seen side by side at the table of the Lord.

A light thus put on a candle-stick could not be hid. So striking a change in one who had been so notorious, called forth much notice. He became a wonder unto many. Some admired, some mocked, and others persecuted him. His former infidel companions were more especially mad against him. They jeered him, reproached him, enticed him, swore at him, and did all in their power to draw or drive him from his Savior. But, deeply sensible of his own utter helplessness, he clung to the strength of God, and thus, out of weakness being made strong, enemies only served to prove his faith, exercise his patience, and increase his watchfulness. The blast of temptation, which lays in the dust the plant which our heavenly Father hath not planted, only roots the deeper every "tree of righteousness" which he has planted in the garden of grace.

John had most to bear at his daily labor in the dye house. It was his hard lot to work amongst a band of "Socialists," and they had it nearly all their own way. For a time, indeed, two men, members of a religious body, timidly took the Christian's part; but after a while, even these, worn out by annoyance, and ashamed of the cross, deserted both him and their profession of religion, becoming apostates, the vilest of the vile. The humble confessor was thus left alone, like a sheep in the midst of wolves; but he was not alone, "for the Lord stood by him." He was enabled to walk blamelessly, and unrebukeably before them. Sometimes he reasoned with them, at other times he entreated them, but most commonly he did as his Master had done when beset by his accusers, "he answsred not a word." His meekness was the more lovely because he had been aforetime a terror to his companions, nor was there one of them who would have dared to provoke him. But now the gentleness of the lamb restrained the strength of the lion.

The quiet influence of John's consistent walk could not fail to be felt. His life was harder to answer than his tongue. A beautiful proof of this occurred one day, and shall form the point of my little narrative. His fellow-workmen had been nearly an hour decrying Christianity as the source of all crime and wretchedness, whilst they boasted what their system would do if fairly tried—what peace and purity would reign in their "New Moral World." John held his peace for a long time, till at last "the fire kindled," and lifting up his voice, he turned upon them and said feelingly, but firmly,—"Well, I am a plain-dealing man, and I like to judge of the tree by the fruits which it bears. Come, then, let us look at what your principles do. I suppose they will do in a little way what they would do in a great. Now, there," said he, pointing at the two apostates, "there are Tom and Jem, on whom you have tried your system. What, then, has it done for them? When they professed to be Christians, they were civil, sober, good-tempered; kind husbands, and fond fathers. They were cheerful, hard-working, and ready to oblige. What are they now? What have you made them? Look at them. How changed they are! But not for the better. They seem downcast and surly; they cannot give one a civil word; their mouths are full of cursing and filthiness; they are drunk every week; their children are nealy naked; their wives broken-hearted, and their houses desolate. There is what your principles have done. This is the "New Moral World," they have made.

"Now I have tried Christianity, and what has it done for me! I need not tell you what I was before; you all too well know. There was not one of you that could drink so deeply, or swear so desperately, or fight so fiercely; I was always out of humor, discontented, and unhappy. My wife was starved and ill-used; I had no money nor could I get anything upon trust; I was hateful and hating. What am I now?—What has religion made me? Thank God, I am not afraid to put it to you. He has helped me to walk carefully amongst you. Am I not a happier man than I was! Can you deny that I am a better servant to my master, and kinder companion to you?—Would I have once put up with what I daily bear from you! I could beat any one of you as easily as ever; why don't I do it? Do you hear a foul word come out of my mouth? Do you ever catch me in the public-house? Is there any one that has got a score against me? Go and ask my neighbors if I am not altered for the better. Go and ask my wife; she can tell you.—Go and see my house; let that bear witness. God be praised for it: here is what Christianity has done for me: there is what Socialism has done for Tom and Jem."

He stopped. The appeal was not to be withstood. For that time, at least, the scoffers had not a word to answer. They were overpowered by the eloquence of example.

My brethren of the working class, follow this beautiful pattern—"With well-doing put to silence the ignorance of foolish men." "Be not afraid of their terror." 1 Pet. ii. 15; iii. 15. "Witness a good confession." 1 Tim. vi. 13. Stand fast, like Daniel before the den of lions, or Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego, before the burning fiery furnace. If you cannot reason down, you can live down the artful infidel. There is a logic of which, through grace, you may be masters; a logic so simple that a child can understand it, so conclusive that a philosopher cannot disprove it, it is the logic John made use of—the logic of the life.

THE INFIDEL'S FUNERAL.—It was strange, I thought, that a Christian minister should be called to attend an infidel's funeral. Why did they not call for their own 'oracles,' and over their dead rail at the religion of Jesus of Nazareth? Why should they send for Christ's ambassador to come to their afflicted house, and in the presence of the widowed mother, and the fatherless children, nay, and the skeptic associates of "the departed," bid him read from the Bible, the despised, the fabulous Bible?

I went. It was indeed a house of mourning. The wailings of the bereaved pierced my heart. I arose to speak. But with the Bible in my hand, what could I say to comfort the mourner? I felt as if I could ask them—Why have ye sent for me here?—For open my mouth as I would, I thought I should but give poignancy to every pang they felt.

I looked at the coffin; an infidel has gone into eternity! My heart gave a convulsive sigh. Again I thought, and almost did it escape my lips;—Why have ye sent for me to come to an infidel's funeral? Let the priests of infidelity speak, if ye would be comforted!

I opened my quivering lips—"Gone! gone! gone! into eternity!! His spirit hath returned to God who gave it." The mourner shrieked, "O God have mercy." Alas! it was too late. I warned them of approaching death—tendered to them 'blessed religion"—pointed them to the Bible—commended them in prayer to God; and turned my feet from the doleful scene. Never shall I forget the scene of "the infidel's funeral."—N. Y. Evangelist.

TEST OF EMPLOYMENTS.—It is related of a celebrated play actor, that he had retired from the stage amidst his popularity, and thereby occasioned great dissatisfaction to those to whose pleasure he had administered. A friend remonstrated with him; nay, it is believed, a deputation waited upon him to request him to return again to the stage. Mark his striking reply: "I feel there must be a gap between the stage and death."

This reply furnishes a convenient means of testing the suitableness of any employment for men who are hastening to eternity. Is our employment one in which we may safely die? And if there must be a gap between it and the grave, we cannot be too early in commencing the gap.—Puritan.

A WORD TO PROFESSORS.—Professors of godliness, it should not now be a subject of enquiry in my own mind or your own, whether you are a true believer or not.—But they are not all Israel, who are of Israel. Not every one that says Lord, Lord, will enter into the kingdom of heaven. Let me improve this solemn occasion, therefore, by pressing home this question to your soul:—Are you a real believer, a friend of God, a new creature? Your name is on the records of the church, but is it in the Lamb's book of life? Your vows are recorded in the book of God's remembrance; are they also engraven upon your heart? In fine, did you when you took on you the covenant of God, know him as your God and Redeemer, and give yourself to him as alive from the dead? Have you ever known in your own heart, that great moral change, without which no son of Adam can dwell with God? Have old things passed away and all things become new? Did you flee to the atoning sacrifice of the Lamb when you drew near to God in his sacred ordinance? Did you rejoice to concentrate yourself and all your powers to his holy service, or did you keep back any thing from Christ? Did you devote yourself in godly sincerity, or did you swear falsely in lifting up your hand unto the Lord in your dedication prayer? O settle this question now.—It will be too late, when the Judge has risen up and closed the door. Should you find you have deceived yourself and mocked God, in vain will you urge your plea; we have eaten and drunken at thy table, and had a name and a place among thy friends. I adjure you in the name of the Master whom I serve, that you flatter not yourselves in an evil way, that you go not to his bar with a lie in your right hand. RHO.

SCRIPTURE KNOWLEDGE.—The New Testament is the best commentary on the Old. By a diligent comparison of both, together with all the parallel passages marked only in the margin of our common Bibles, an infinitely greater knowledge of Scripture will generally be acquired, than is commonly either thought of or believed. The truth is there is so great a unity in all the parts of the Bible—such an intimate connexion in its matter—phraseology, doctrines, facts, and the like—so many allusions made from one passage to another; that there is scarcely a question connected with biblical interpretation that may not, by this means only, be very safely & satisfactorily determined. —Professor Lee.

From the Southern Churchman.

SIGNS OF SPIRITUAL SLEEP.

Every Christian knows the meaning of spiritual sleep. He knows that it consists in a general relaxation of affections and efforts; in an unusual degree of indifference to the cause of his Savior, to the prosperity of his own soul, and to the salvation of others. He knows that it is a state in which he is much disturbed with dreams of worldly greatness, and in which his eyes are closed to the reality of eternity—a state in which his conscience and reason exercise little or no control over him, while his fancy and his passions range abroad free and unfettered. It is a state in which the christian and the worldling, the saint and the sinner most strikingly resemble each other.

The earliest and most dreaded symptom consists in a general and somewhat indefinite backwardness in engaging in the cause of religion. We are not now alluding to any particular action or course of action, but to some all-pervading and indefinable reluctance to think, talk, or act in reference to that subject which should be uppermost in the Christian's heart. It is a kind of stupor, or deadness, or indifference, which most generally constitutes a fatal index to the state of things within. It is not the hesitation of a mind deliberating on the most judicious and prudent plan of doing good. But it is a hesitation manifested on all occasions, no matter how important the object or how excellent the scheme—a hesitation often followed by complaints respecting adverse circumstances, the pressure of worldly duties, the want of time, of health, and a great variety of other causes. All these things taken together constitute infallible evidence of a cold state of the heart. Whenever we meet with Christians who are constantly making excuses for not acting promptly and readily in a case of known duty, we may set them down either as indolent Christians or as Christians asleep.

There is another mark of spiritual sleep, which consists in a habit of conversing much about the forms of religion, without much regard for its spirit. Religion was never intended to be a theatre for disputation and angry controversy. It is pacific in its character, and it makes all those so who possess it in any degree. When, therefore, we meet with men who are accustomed to spend their time in traducing the principles of those of their fellow-christians who differ from themselves in some unessential points; and who imagine that they are doing God's service by trying to bring down the sentiments of others to the level of their own, we may safely draw the inference that such Christians have not the true spirit of their Master—that they are sinking into a state of spiritual lethargy and coldness. We are told that out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaketh. If, then, Christians are not actually asleep, they will delight to converse much about the love of Christ in dying for them and in calling them from nature's darkness to his marvelous light. It is natural for men of the world to discourse upon things of the world, those topics which engross the affections of their hearts. So should it be with Christians. If they are awake, they will delight to talk of their Savior, by the wayside and by the fireside. They will be ready to say to all, 'Come, see a man who has told me all things that ever I did, is not this the Christ?"

A man who seeks after truth, should above all things avoid a wrangling humor; he should examine his subjects with calmness and temper, like one who is afraid of nothing so much as of error; he should place the true point of honor in a candid acknowledgement of his mistakes whenever he perceives them.—Fenelon.

It is said that there are in Hindostan 75,000,000, of women who can neither read nor write, and 30,000,000 of these are British subjects.

FOR THE SINNER.

From the Christian Intelligencer.

INFATUATION OF SINNERS.

If you saw a blind man laying himself down to take his rest for the night within the precincts of an old tottered tenement, which was hourly expected to fall, and bury him in its ruins; and if no argument or entreaty on the part of the bystanders could convince him of his folly, or induce him to escape from his perilous resting-place; and merely because he himself could not see his danger, would you not pity his stubbornness, and feel for his helpless case? Were you introduced into the chamber of a sick friend lying in the last stage of some powerful disease, which was fast withering his vitals and drying up the fountain of life, but who resolutely persisted in refusing the application of an infallible remedy, which already had been completely successful in the experience of thousands who once were in the same state; and were his refusal of the remedy grounded only upon the fact, that he imagined it to be somewhat bitter at its first application, would you not be astonished at his obstinacy?

Sinner! "thou art the man." Therefore, pity your own stubbornness—feel for your own deplorable blindness, and be confounded at your own hardness of heart! Your state is worse, by all the difference between the infinite height of heaven to earth, and the duration of eternity contrasted with time. You lay yourselves down to rest in great composure, night after night, with the impending storm of God's wrath pending over your heads; and though it may burst and overwhelm you before morning, still you continue careless and unconcerned about your danger, in spite of every warning to the contrary. Your souls are infected with the disease of sin, which, if not removed, will infallibly cut you off, and in your sad experience, make you to feel the tremendous woes of the second death, and yet you pertinaciously refuse to allow the balm of Gilead to be applied to your conscience, and the blood of Jesus Christ to be sprinkled upon your soul—balm which heals every wound, and blood which cleanseth from all sin; causing even the heart itself to sing aloud for joy. What strange infatuation! What deep delusion! To love one's disease—to hug our chains—to sleep in profound slumber upon the very edge of the precipice over the bottomless pit!

Sinner! if you continue to sleep, and will not be awakened—if neither providences, nor sermons, nor sickness can arouse you, then it may be, that the hour of death will awaken you not to hope, but to despair! Or if it should happen that the unholy slumber in which you are plunged, is so deadly that even death itself cannot disturb it, then let but that anticipated mighty trump, whose loud blast will pierce the grave and summon the dead to judgment, and in a moment all the dread reality of your guilt and condemned state will burst upon your view. Though your dreaming delusions be powerful enough to withstand all the appeals of the gospel, and all the visits of affliction, and all the thunders of providence, and even the fell stroke of death itself, they will vanish like the cobweb before the blast of the hurricane, leaving you helpless and hopeless, and desperate, before the bar of your sin-hating Judge; for your being awakened in the future world will be of no avail; condemnation then will be sealed upon your guilty heads, and the wrath of God will be your portion for ever.

But you are yet in the land of grace, and in the world of hope! In this day of your merciful visitation, accept that mercy and pardon which is now freely offered to you in the Gospel. Apply unto the great physician that he may heal your leprosy of sin! Be it your immediate concern to insure for yourself a saving-interest in Christ. Seek your security forthwith within the ark of the covenant of grace: then, when once safely lodged within its walls, the winds may blow, the floods may rise, and the storm may rage, but they cannot come nigh unto you—for "there is no condemnation to them who are in Christ Jesus.

DUNTOCHER.

WARNING WORDS.—Sinner, where are you? Did you ever realize the circumstances of awful solemnity and responsibility in which God has placed you? Do you understand the relation which the gospel ministry sustains to you? Do you not tremble when you see your minister, and know that God has unalterably ordained that he shall be unto you the "savor of life unto life, or of death unto death?" Do you know that he is the messenger of God to your soul?—and that you can no more prevent his being to you a savor of life or death, than you can prevent your own existence. Sinner, Christ has not died in vain. The Holy Spirit does not strive in vain. Hell from beneath does not warn in vain. God's mercies are not in vain. All these influences are acting upon you. They will act, they must act. They must be to you the "savor of life unto life, or of death unto death." How infinitely solemn and awful are your circumstances! How dreadful your responsibility! How short your life! How near your death! Are you prepared for solemn judgment? Sinner, will you go down instantly on your knees, and lift up your whole being to God, "before wrath come upon you to the uttermost."
—Rev. C. G. Finney.

FOR THE MINISTER.

THE THREE CLERGYMEN.

The following anecdote was related by Whitefield in a sermon on the duty of a Gospel minister.

"Before I dismiss this subject, it may not be improper to relate a story a good man gives an account of. There was a presbytery of ministers met together; and one of their number preached. In his sermon he made a supposition that the last judgment was come, and that Jesus Christ was now upon the throne of judgment, and called his ministers to an account. He asked one of them,—'What did you preach for?' Says he, 'Lord there was a patronage in the family of an hundred and fifty pounds a year. I therefore took orders to get the presentation.' 'Stand thou by,' says he, 'verily thou hast thy reward.' He asked another,—'What did you preach for?' And he said, 'I preached that I might be reckoned a fine orator, and to have applause of men.' Says he, 'stand thou by, verily thou hast thy reward.' A third comes and he said unto him,—'And what did you preach for?' Says he, 'Lord thou knowest my heart, that I did not seek to please men; and though many infirmities have passed in my ministry, I did it with an upright design to promote thy glory.' Jesus Christ immediately cries out, 'Make room angels, for this my dear servant: thou hast honored me on earth; sit here by me on the throne.' O! that this story may have the same effect on ministers now, as it had when preached; for we hear they went away affected, and said they would preach Jesus Christ more than ever."

CONQUESTS OF THE REDEEMER.

"Nor was the manner of his conquests less distinguished than their splendor was illustrious. In his own person he had mysteriously vanquished by suffering and death. It was when he fell that he triumphed.—And in the persons of his followers he continued to display the same indestructible power, which was ever greatest when it seemed to be overborne—and broke, like the day, more brightly, for the depth of that pavilion which enshrouded its approach. "He shall not strive nor cry, neither shall any man hear his voice in the street; a bruised reed shall he not break, and the smoking flax shall he not quench, till he send forth judgment unto victory." Such was the prophetic description of his progress; and the same principles have added still new lustre to every period in the history of his cause. Such events are without a parallel amongst mankind. The Parthians conquered by flight; and the heroes of Lacedemon, by an inexhaustible patriotism, and a love of martial glory; which taught them to welcome death as the prize of valor, and to account no couch so easy as the shield on which they should be carried to the tomb. But it is the church only, that, through every age, has yielded, in uncompromising weakness, before the fury of the persecutor, and the pride of power; then, most victorious, when covered with the dishonors of an apparent overthrow: rising, in renovated vigor, from the stroke which menaced its destruction; as if the gory arm of murder had endued it with fresh life; or like the springing of the tender herb, that spreads in lovlier verdure, and exhales a sweeter fragrance, from the pressure of the very foot that crushed it to the ground.

"Such is the glory of Jesus. His successes commenced on the cross; where he spoiled the spoiler, humbled the conquerer, and turned into mockery those principalities that rioted in his defeat. He died: thus only could death be abolised. He was numbered with transgressors: thus only could sin be forgiven. He stood accursed, as an exile and an outcast: thus alone could he open the way of reconciliation and peace.

"When 'the beauty of Israel was slain upon his high places,' David took up his lamentation for the departed Saul, though an enemy and an apostate, forsaken of God and man, in strains of inimitable pathos, and unequaled tenderness: 'Ye mountains of Gilboa! let there be no dews, neither let there be rain upon you, nor fields of offerings: for there the shield of the mighty is vilely cast away, as though he had not been anointed with oil. How are the mighty fallen, and the weopans of war perished!' But far different the fates of Calvary and Gilboa! The shield of a greater than Saul was there cast into the earth; not to scathe it with barrenness, or smite it with a curse, but to diffuse around an influence as benignant as it is wonderful; inviting, not the thunder, but the dews of heaven. For the touch of that shield has hallowed it; and the scene of slaughter has become the abode of renovation and of gladness. There vital airs are breathed, and holier light is shed; and spirits of mercy linger —to recall the mysterious conflict—and the mortal strife—and the triumph, not of the exulting, but the falling warrior—and blessings of that victory, the theme of endless celebration, and the source of inexhaustible delights.'—Dr. M'All.

HEAVEN AND EARTH.

Conceive a man to be standing on the margin of this green world; and that when he looked towards it, he saw abundance smiling upon every field, and all the blessings which earth can afford scattered in profusion throughout every family, and the light of the sun sweetly resting upon all the pleasant habitations, and the joys of human companionship brightening many a happy circle of society—conceive this to be the general character of the scene upon one side of his contemplation; and that on the other, beyond the verge of the goodly planet on which he was situated, he could descry nothing but a dark and fathomless unknown. Think you that he would bid a voluntary adieu to all the brightness and all the beauty that were before him upon earth, and commit himself to the frightful solitude away from it. Would he leave its peopled dwelling-places and become a solitary wanderer through the fields of nonentity? If space offered him nothing but a wilderness, would he for it, abandon the home-bred scenes of life and of cheerfulness that lay so near, and exerted such a power of urgency to detain him? Would he not cling to the regions of sense, and of life, and of society? and shrink away from the desolation that was beyond it; would not he be glad to keep his firm footing on the territory of this world, and to take shelter under the silvery canopy that was stretched over it?

But, if during the time of his contemplation, some happy island of the blest had floated by; and there had burst upon his senses the light of its surpassing glories, and its sounds of sweeter melody; and he clearly saw that there a purer beauty rested upon every field, and a more heartfelt joy spread itself among all the families; and he could discern there a peace, and a piety, and a benevolence which put a moral gladness into every bosom, and united the whole society in one rejoicing sympathy with each other, and with the beneficent Father of them all. Could he further see that pain and mortality were there unknown; and above all, that signals of welcome were hung out, and an avenue of communication was made for him; perceive you not, that what was before the wilderness, would become the land of invitation; and that now the world would be the wilderness? What unpeopled space could not do, can be done by space teeming with beatific scenes and beatific society. And let the existing tendencies of the heart be what they may to the scene that is near and visibly around us, still if another stood revealed to the prospect of man, either through the channel of his senses—then, without violence done to the constitution of his moral nature, may he die unto the present world, and live to the lovelier world that stands in the distance away from it.—Chalmers.

SACRED MEDITATIONS.

"Deny thyself, take up thy cross, and follow me, for whosoever will save his life shall lose it." "I am crucified with Christ, nevertheless I live, yet not I, Christ liveth in me."

At the point where we lose ourselves, or crucify self, we find our life, we find Jesus. In self-crucifixion, carried out to a full extent of our Savior's meaning, we find the blessedness of being nothing ourselves, because Christ is all in all in the soul. It is then we glory in the cross, for by the cross, we have gained the life of Jesus.—The life of Jesus in the soul.—What tongue can express the blessedness of such a state?—Weary pilgrim, tossed and driven upon the sea of thine own stormy passions, and carnal reasonings, submit to the cross, study the cross, and learn what it is to be crucified with Christ, that the life also of Jesus may be made manifest in thy soul.

"Grow in grace, and in the knowledge of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ."

There is a spiritual training of the understanding and heart, which is gained only in the school of Christ. Sitting down at the feet of Jesus, with the desire to know his will in order to do it, the mind is enlightened, and the heart is cultivated in the knowledge of spiritual things. It is then we see light in his light. An ancient proverb says, "shut the windows that the house may be light." When we shut up our souls to God's teachings, renounce our own wisdom as folly, it is then we see and hear and feel God. Thus discerning God, coming in contact with Him, the soul increases in wisdom and spiritual understanding; light and more light, and still increasing light, as the soul is expanded to receive it, shines in and God is studied and God is known. This increase in the knowledge of God, is the only bliss of the soul, and it is the everlasting bliss of heaven. To know God, still knowing, and yet never known, is the lesson of eternity.

"Thy will, O God! not mine, be done."

Why, O Christian! is thy soul disquieted? when the storm threatens and the sea swells, why art thou so fearful? Hast thou committed all, submitted all to God? Then is not he my Father, and does not his own hand govern all for thy best good? O, wert thou his unreservedly, his will thy will, the storm would soon become a calm, and the shaft rebound. It is thy unsubdued will that causes so many thorns to spring up in thy pathway. When thou canst say, not of necessity, but heartily loving his will best, Thy will be done, then thou wilt indeed have submitted all to Christ, and will find rest to thy soul. O sacrifice thy will, a perpetual offering to thy God, then in prosperity or adversity, in light or in darkness, all will be well with thee. In the depths of extreme anguish, of which no human heart can conceive, when the heavy load of a world of sinners was laid upon the Son of God, He prayed, submissively, Thy will, not mine, be done.

"The kingdom of God is within you."

As the sun rising scatters the shades of night, and makes the objects of nature visible, so when Jesus shines into the soul, the darkness of the mind is dispelled, and the soul clearly discerns spiritual things. Hasten, O hasten the meridian light, the noonday splendor of the reign of righteousness on earth! Art thou looking within, O Christian! to find the dawning of this glorious Day? One soul and one only, hast thou the entire dominion over. Is the kingdom of God come there?—In you, by you, is his will done, even as by the angels in heaven? Look not here, look not there, saying is the Gentile and the Jew brought in, but turn thine eye inward, and ask, is the kingdom of God come in my own soul? It is not meat and drink, external rites and observances, but it is "righteousness & peace and joy in the Holy Ghost." This is the reign of Christ on earth, his reign in thy heart. His kingdom cometh not with observation, it is meekly set up in the heart; all is bowed to his will. His will what is His will? Ah wherefore, for what did he die? Not alone to rescue thy soul from sin's dominion; to break down Satan's kingdom here, and establish his own. His will, it is thy sanctification, soul, body and spirit. Read it, believe it, and the kingdom of God is within you.

THE END OF THE WORLD.

It would appear that some of the early Christians in Thessolonica had been troubled in mind upon this point, that the Apostle wrote to them partly to correct their mistake. 2 Thess. ii. The Scriptures unquestionably speak of several senses in which the coming of Christ is to be understood, only one of which directly relates to his coming to judge the world. In the 10th century an opinion prevailed extensively that the end of the world was approaching, insomuch that charters frequently commenced with the words—"As the world is now drawing to a close," &c. Eclipses and northern lights have been regarded as tokens of the event; and an unusually dark day, viz. May 19, 1780 was viewed with much alarm. The remarkable revival that occurred in New England in the 18th century, was regarded by many, among others by President Edwards, as the commencement of the Millenium and as preparatory to the final consummation.

In Germany at the beginning of the reformation, great excesses were committed by many, under the notion that the Millenium had arrived and that the saints were now to rule over the earth. Some of the French Protestants fell into a similar error.

The fifth monarchy men, in the days of Cromwell, seemed to have been possessed of a similar error. One Beverly, a minister of piety and talents, undertook to fix the precise year of the commencement of the Millenium in 1697.

Several individuals have written recently upon the same subject. It is probable that "of that day and hour knoweth no man, not even the angels in Heaven."

Anger.—He that keeps anger long in his bosom, giveth place to the devil. And why should we make room for him, who will crowd in too fast of himself? Heat of passion makes our souls to chap, and the devil creeps in at the crannies; yea, a furious man, in his fits, may seem possessed with a devil; he foams, fumes, tears himself, is deaf and dumb, in effect, to hear reason: sometimes swallows, stares, stamps, with fiery eyes and flaming cheeks. Had Narcissus himself seen his own face when he had been angry, he could never have fallen in love with himself.—Fuller.

Man is fallen into a deplorable state of blindness, impotence and corruption; will not believe it in good earnest; prides himself in his own abilities; will stand or fall by the light of what he calls his reason, and rejects his only remedy, which is dying to his state and nature, his own works, will, and wisdom, that Christ may live in him, and be all in all to him, wisdom, righteousness and sanctification, and, by these, redemption.—Rev. T. Adam.

The only way to peace and truth, is genuine humility.

 POST MASTERS may enclose money in a letter to the publisher of a newspaper, to pay the subscription of a third person, and frank the letter if written by himself.—Post-Master General.

WANTED IMMEDIATELY, at this office, as an apprentice to the printing business, an active industrious lad, from 14 to 18 years of age, who can come well recommended.

"Can there any good thing come out of Nazareth."

The obscure origin—the humble birth of Jesus caused him to be despised of the Jews. The demonstrations of his divinity in his miracles and holy life, were met by inquiry, "Is not this the carpenter's son?" If his birth had been noble, if the insignia of royalty had attended him, at once he would have been crowned, and a loyal nation would have rallied around his standard, obedient to his nod. More ample demonstrations of his benevolent designs could not be given than he gave, and a more certain way to obtain every desirable advantage could not be presented, than the one marked out by the Savior. But they were despised as being degrading to the dignity of such a people. Happy would the Jews have been in the sundering of the Roman yoke, in the reign of Messiah—and in the possession of the favor of God. Could valor have purchased these—if they had been the reward of mighty works, then would the Jews have enjoyed them. But as they were rewards of obedience, of holiness and humility, they were neither sought for nor enjoyed.

The same aristocratic pride, and false ideas of greatness, now keep thousands from Christ. The weakness of the means ordained for the spread of the Gospel.---The simple and self-denying duties of religion, and the unostentatious, yet triumphant progress of the Redeemer's kingdom, will be the principal causes of the everlasting destruction of myriads of souls. False ideas of true greatness, were perhaps never more in vogue than now. The frailties of Christians are made the subjects of ridicule, and a worldly standard erected by which to try all measures and conduct, and every deviation from this standard is considered evidence of imbecility or fanaticism. The wise and prudent, however, will not condemn a system whose principles are pure, even though many of its advocates are imbecile and blame-worthy. Infidelity has used its mightiest efforts to drive a pure and undefiled religion from the earth, without effect. If religion has stood the test of the greatest efforts to overthrow it, then they who oppose it and criticise its advocates, and ridicule its sacred rites, exhibit great ignorance connected with reprehensible depravity of heart.

Nearly allied to this, is a disposition to attend to the administration of the truth, to criticise, or as a matter of curiosity. A majority of religious congregations can notice, doubtless, every uncouth gesture of the speaker, and all inaccuracies in speech, while few, comparatively, profit from truth exhibited in an awkard manner, or from a stammering tongue. The wise can be instructed in some things by the foolish, and the learned from the ignorant. They will profit most who adopt the poet's sentiment,

"Grudge not
To pluck treasures from an earthen pot. [sense,
The weakest say something good. When all lack God takes a text and preaches patience."

PRESBYTERIANS AND SLAVERY.

The signs of the times indicate much difficulty, and perhaps an ultimate division in the Presbyterian Church, upon the subject of Slavery. The Ripley Presbytery, of Ohio, have re-passed their former resolutions, in which they refuse to receive as a candidate for the ministry, license or ordain any person known to hold slaves, or favor the system—to suspend slave-holders from communion—and to hold no fellowship with any presbytery, synod, or other ecclesiastical body, as a church court, while it is known that they tolerate the sin of slave-holding under their jurisdiction.

The Angelica Presbytery have passed the following resolutions upon the subject:

"1st, Resolved, That this Presbytery regard the system of American Slavery as one of the most high-handed abominations practiced among the children of men.

2d. Resolved, That we do feel solemnly bound to protest against this enormity; and to withdraw the hand of Christian fellowship from all who practice or apologise for this sin."

These resolutions coming from such judicatories of the church must have an important bearing on the question. If they are persisted in (as they doubtless will be) southern Presbyterians must emancipate their slaves, or lose the fellowship of their northern brethren.

TEMPERANCE HOTEL IN NEW-YORK.

It affords us much pleasure to be able to announce to the friends of Temperance, that the Tremont House, No. 108 & 110, Broadway, contiguous to the centre of business, and nearly opposite the City Hotel, is now conducted on the principle of total abstinence from all that can intoxicate.—The present proprietor, Mr. Churchill, who has been long and favorably known as the conductor of the Hudson-st. Temperance House, Albany, commenced business at the above stand early in the present month under favorable circumstances, and we doubt not he will receive, as he justly merits, a liberal share of patronage from the traveling public, and particularly from the friends of the Temperance cause. The House is spacious and pleasant, servants faithful and obliging, host kind and affable, and charges as reasonable as at any respectable house we have visited in New-York. The Hudson-st. Temperance House, Albany, is continued, as usual.

REVIVAL

We are happy to learn that an interesting revival of religion is in progress, in the second Seventh-Day Baptist Church in Hopkinton, R. I. A protracted meeting was held there a few weeks since, (in which Br. A. Campbell was the principal laborer,) which was attended with happy results.

Brother W. B. Gillett, and others, have preached there since the meeting closed. (Brother Green's health being too poor to admit of pastoral labors,) and some fifteen or twenty have made a public profession of faith in Christ, and united with the church. The First Day Baptist church has also received some additions.

Ordination.—Brother Lucius Crandall, of Plainfield, N. J., was ordained to the work of the ministry, at the Conference.

☞ The Minutes of the General Conference are received, and will be printed next week.

DIALOGUE MOTHER AND SON

Mother. George, my son, come read some scripture to me.

George. O yes, mother. Where shall I read?

Mo. Second Kings, 4th chapter.

G. The whole chapter! Mother! it has 44 verses.

Mo. You may commence at the 15th verse and may read to the 38th.

G. And when the child was grown, it fell on a day, &c.

(George reads to the 38th.)

Mo. What have you read?

G. I have read about a little boy, his parents' only child, who was taken sick, suddenly died, and was raised to life again.

Mo. I wish to ask you a few questions about the sickness and death of the child. Some other time, if the Lord spare us both, I will talk with you about his being raised to life. George, where did the child go one day?

G. He went out to his father to the reaper?

Mo. What did he say to his father?

G. My head, my head!

Mo. What do you suppose ailed him?

G. I suppose he had a dreadful pain in his head.

Mo. What direction did his father give to a lad?

G. Carry him to his mother.

Mo. Until what time of the day did he sit in his mother's lap?

G. Till noon.

Mo. What then became of him?

G. Then he died.

Mo. Where did his mother lay him?

G. She went up stairs and laid him on the bed of the man of God.

Mo. Who was this man of God?

G. Elisha, the good Elisha.

Mo. What then did she do?

G. She shut the door, and went out.

Mo. My son, do you like to go out and see your father and the hired men work?

G. Yes, mother; nothing can suit me better. I can help some too. This morning I took a basket, and ———

Mo. At another time I will hear you tell what you can do. I have more questions to ask you. Do you not know that you are liable to be taken sick at any time, when you are in the house with me, or out in the fields with your father?

G. I think of it sometimes.

Mo. If you would die happy, in whom must you trust?

G. In the Lord Jesus Christ.

Mo. Can you repeat something from Dr. Watts that is applicable to this last answer which you have given?

G. Jesus can make a dying bed
Feel soft as downy pillows are,
While on his breast I lean my head,
And breathe my life out sweetly there.

Mo. When you feel sick, with whom do you wish to be?

G. With you, my dear mother. Last week when I felt unwell, I could scarcely wait till you could come home.

Mo. But your father was here, and aunt Mary, and your sisters, and our family physician was only across the way; all of them were ready to do their best for you.

G. I know it; but all of them cannot do for me when I am sick what mother can.

Mo. How then should we feel for those children who have no mother?

G. We should pity them, pray for them, and do them all the good we can.

Mo. Now you may turn to Proverbs, 23d chapter, and read the 22d verse.

G. (Reads.) "Hearken unto thy father that begat thee, and despise not thy MOTHER when she is old." J. R. J.

INTELLIGENCE.

FOREIGN.

From the N. Y. Spectator.

LATER FROM EUROPE.—ARRIVAL OF THE BRITANNIA.

THE EASTERN QUESTION.

Nothing had transpired, or [illegible] could well be expected to transpire, in the two days that elapsed after the sailing of the British Queen, tending to throw much light upon the great question of peace or war. The tone of the Paris journals—the latest advices thence being of the 1st inst.—was not more warlike than before, nor more pacific. The Debats suggests that the Pacha of Egypt might not consider as [illegible] such a resort to force as would [illegible] the fulfilment of his threat, to [illegible], and that such a construction of his [illegible] be a guarantee for peace. The [illegible] sumes that the first measure resolved [illegible] the four powers will be a [illegible] of the ports of Syria.

But in truth there is very little to be learned from a study of the French papers, for there are as many minds among them as men; whatever assertion or opinion one advances, another is sure to deny, and amid their conflicting statements it is impossible to arrive at the certainty of any thing.

The London Globe [illegible] a rumor that King Leopold was about proceeding to Vienna, and the Revue [illegible] says that a note has been sent by the British Government to that of France to the effect that the great question will be adjourned for the present, and a congress be held at Vienna for its adjustment.

Meantime active preparations are made by the Turkish Government for war. Eight thousand troops had left Constantinople to join a camp formed at Kutaya—some forty vessels had been chartered for the conveyance of troops to Syria—and two ships of the line and three frigates, the [illegible] of the Sultan's fleet, were to proceed in the same direction, under command of an English naval officer.

The following is from a [illegible] Chronicle, dated Constantinople, August 12.

To add to the difficulties Turkey is already involved in to meet the contingency of a fresh war, and ere the [illegible] of the capital are hardly quieted, another affair has now occurred to call for exertion on the part of the Porte, viz. a revolt in the [illegible] provinces. The cause assigned for the outbreak is the [illegible] discontent of the Turks of the [illegible] at the new measures lately introduced, which place them on a footing with [illegible] subjects; and, determined to resist to the utmost of their power, they [illegible] en masse, strangled the Governor, and committed excesses of every kind. The accounts received of the spreading of disaffection have been considered by the government to be so alarming, that the Austrian steamer was instantly chartered and dispatched yesterday to Sampsoun, with 1500 Albanian troops, and another steamer with the same number will leave to-night for that port. This promptness and energy on the part of government, unparalleled in former instances, will doubtless be followed by the desired result; and, in addition to the quelling of the present disturbances, the more solid advantage will likewise be obtained of inspiring the people with a wholesome terror, and teaching them for the future to respect the laws.

The Paris papers of the 1st announce the departure of M. Casimer Perrier for St. Petersburg, to act as charge in the room of M. Barante, the ambassador, recalled.

The Presse denies the alledged warlike disposition of the Court, and the harsh language said to have been addressed by the King to the Austrian and Prussian ambassadors.

The English and Austrian fleets in the Mediterranean had sailed for the coast of Syria.

The capital of Spain was tranquil at the latest dates, but an idea seems to prevail that a storm was brewing there, which would explode upon the return of the Queen Regent.

Horrible accounts are given of the execution of 120 Carlists and a woman' who formed part of the Carlist garrison of the fort del Collado. The butchery began on the 12th of August, with the shooting of 27 officers and the woman, who had served as a spy.

But the great attraction of this horrible scene was the famous Peinado, who to the last moment preserved a coolness and resolution almost superhuman. When the priest approached to prepare him for death he repulsed him with rudeness, saying, 'It was such as you that have caused the loss of Spain. Had there been no monks, I should not have been here.' He then called for a bottle of brandy, and having drunk two or three glasses, he threw the rest at the heads of those around him, saying, 'Now I am ready. Let them take care they do not miss me.' He delivered to a soldier the handkerchief he held, and knelt down, uttering to the last moment maledictions against those who were the cause of his death. One of his brothers, and about sixty more soldiers were shot the day after.—The Diario of Valencia announces that Don Manos Bancos, Governor of the fort, three corporals and twenty-seven soldiers, part of the prisoners taken at Collado, were shot at Chelva on the 13th and 14th inst.

The only plea in justification of this cruelty is that the prisoners had been guilty of great excesses, plundering travelers and acting more like brigands than soldiers.

A terrible commotion was raised at Windsor on Sunday the 30th of August, by the loss of a splendid diamond pin, which the Queen had presented to her husband on his birth day. The Prince had it in his shirt when he went to church, but when he came back it was gone. The chapel was searched "with candles and lanterns," three or four times, but to no purpose; and it was feared that some of the swell mob in the crowd about the door had laid sacrilegious hands upon the trinket of his Royal Highness. At long and last, however, the pin was found on the floor of the painting room, and "upon its being brought to the Queen, her Majesty placed it, with her own hands (not the hands of any body else) in the bosom of the Prince." So says the London Herald.

The papers announce the death of the celebrated Professor Muller, of Gottingen. He died at Athens, of an illness brought on by too long exposure to the Sun while copying an inscription.

Egypt.—The London Times of Sept. 1st announces as a positive fact that Mehemet Ali had refused to acquiesce in the ultimatum of the four powers. The Times says:

We have received by an extraordinary express the Paris papers of Sunday night, August 31st, with a letter from our correspondent dated 1 o'clock, P. M.

The Moniteur Parisien, the official paper of the French government, contains the following articles:

"Intelligence from Alexandria received by Government states that the Viceroy of Egypt has replied by refusal to the summations which Rifaat Bey was charged to convey to him. He declared that he would repel force by force, but that he would commit no act of aggression."

This news was brought by the Tartare, which left Alexandria on the 15th of August and arrived at Toulon on the 26th. The arrival of the steamer at Marseilles with the overland mail from India has not yet been announced.

A letter from Warsaw, dated August 21st, professes to detail the plan of the four powers for executing the treaty of London and forcing Mehemet Ali to accept the propositions made him. It says:

"Warlike preparations are making with considerable activity in Warsaw, and extensive magazines were being established in the southern provinces of the empire. The Russian troops collected between Kiew and the Black Sea amount to [illegible] men.—This corps is to take the name of "Army of the South" to distinguish it from that of the East, which occupied the Transcaucasian provinces, and was estimated at [illegible] men. These two corps are to be shortly reinforced by 50,000 men each.—War is accordingly deemed inevitable in Warsaw, where a general belief prevailed that France would confine herself to mere demonstrations. The Powers will begin by blockading Syria and taking possession of the Gulf of Scanderoon, in order to menace Ibrahim Pasha's flanks and intercept his communications with Syria. Should [illegible] these measures, Syria and Arabia are to be invaded by English and Austrian troops, whilst a Russian and Ottoman force will march through Asia Minor and seize on St. Jean d'Acre. In the event of the advance of Ibrahim on Constantinople, Mehemet Ali is to be attacked in Egypt by an English army, sent from Bombay and landed at Suez, at the same time that the Russian fleet from Sebastopol will land on the banks of the Bosphorus a force sufficient to check the progress of Ibrahim. The Emperor Nicholas, accompanied by the Grand Duke his son, was supposed to have arrived at Kiew, where General Paskewitsch had established his head quarters. The report of the death of Gen. Witt, who had been appointed the chief of his staff is confirmed."

From a letter in the National Intelligencer, dated Paris, Aug. 27.

As we may believe Louis Philippe is still intent on the preservation of peace, the loss of his life at this crisis would prove a calamity for all Europe. I can give you testimony concerning his health, quite fresh.

He invited us both, with a familiar cordiality, to pay him a neighborly visit at St. Cloud. It is my intention to avail myself of the General's invitation to accompany him thither this week, in the evening; and you shall have some record of the court of that beautiful summer perch of royalty.—But my main purpose, at present, is to report that the health and spirits of Louis Philippe seem unimpaired; he stoops, tho' not much: his countenance indicates generally a sound constitution of body and mind; his cheeks are fresh, though tanned; his looks are remarkably acute without the least severity; his limbs yet full and sturdy; his movements quick and firm. His English was spoken with emphasis and a strong voice. No foreigner speaks our language better.

Arrival of the Britannia.—The Britannia arrived at Boston early on Friday morning of last week, having made her passage from Liverpool in thirteen and a half days. She was detained eleven hours at Halifax, and brought eithy-six passengers to Halifax and seventy-six to Boston. We have received by her, London papers to the evening of the 3d September.

There is no additional intelligence of importance. The question of peace or war is still unsettled; but upon the whole, affairs wear a more pacific aspect. The tone of the French press is becoming more reasonable.

The Austrian Observer of the 28th of August, announces the sailing of the combined English and Austrian fleets for the coast of Syria.

The Great Western, steamer, arrived at Bristol from New York, on Monday night, Aug. 31, carrying back answers to the President and Acadia, which had sailed from England on the 1st and 4th. She left New York on the 18th, and made her passage in thirteen days and a half.

A letter from St. Helena, dated July 11, mentions that the British schooner Dolphin had arrived there, having passed the French frigate Artemise, with the Prince de Joinville on board, bound thither for the purpose of receiving the remains of Napoleon.

DESTRUCTIVE FIRE AT NEW ORLEANS.

A letter from our correspondents of the New Orleans Bulletin, dated Sept. 11, 9 3-4 o'clock, A. M., says,—"At 9 A. M., the Exchange Hotel was found to be on fire in the roof in many places. The flames are bursting out, and this immense pile seems doomed to destruction." A letter of similar tenor, has been received from the Assistant Post Master at New Orleans, by the Post Master in this city. It is as follows.

New Orleans, Sept. 11., 10 o'clock, A. M.

St. Charles Hotel is on fire.

11 o'clock, North West side all in a blaze; no hopes of saving the building; wind blowing a gale from the North; fifth story on the north side gone. Can't say more. Mail just going."

The Exchange, or St Charles Hotel, was far the largest building of the kind in the United States, and a very tall and splendid edifice. It was built of brick, and covered with white stucco, belonged to the N. O. Exchange and Banking Co., and cost between 4 and $500,000, besides the ground. It is now insured for $260,000, of which $65,000 is in this city, $10,000 in Hartford, and the rest at New Orleans and other places South. Heretofore it had been kept in an unsatisfactory manner, and a contract was made some months ago by Messrs. Mudge & Watriss, of the Astor House, to keep it hereafter. Much was expected from this change. They had engaged more than an hundred servants here, who were to go in a packet soon to sail. The destruction of this magnificent building will cause great inconvenience, as, since the loss of the great St. Louis Hotel, it was more than ever necessary for the throng of merchants who migrate to that great city for business during the winter. The Verandah, another important hotel, stands across the street from the St. Charles to the leward, in a position quite dangerous. The expressions of regret at this news are universal among all the gentlemen who have visited New Orleans.

The Perils of the Sea.—It is computed (says the Philadelphia North American,) that for sixteen sailors who die of all diseases, eleven die by drowning or in wrecks—that the number of British ships which are lost is about one to twenty-five—that nearly two thousand perish annually in the mighty deep, chiefly from shipwreck, by which property to the amount of three millions annually is absolutely lost to the nation, and hundreds of widows and thousands of orphans are thrown upon the cold and precarious charity of the public—that the more frequent cause of these shipwrecks is intemperance—and that in the case of those who are saved from such sudden death and a watery grave, so severe is the labor and exposure of the seaman, that forty five is the average limit of life.

Wesleyan Conference.—The Wesleyan Conference has commenced its sittings, according to appointment in Brunswick chapel, Newcastle upon Tyne. The Rev. Robert Newton, lately returned from his visit to America, where he went as a delegate from the British conference to the American, was elected as president by a large majority. The place of secretary was filled up by the election of the Rev. Dr. Hannah to that office. The Wesleyan connexion so far as reports have been made is in a state of great peace in all its departments, and it is expected that the annual increase of members to the society, during the last year will not be less than 20,000 including about 6000 reported as the increase on the Misson stations.

Sperm and Whale Oil.—From a statement in the Nantucket Inquirer, it appears that the quantity of oil brought into the United States during the month of August was 692,412 gallons—sperm, 324,450; whale, 368,062.

An Awful Scene.—On the night of the 28th of August, the house of John Robinson, of Logan co. Illinois, was struck by lightning while the neighbors were attending the dying bed of Mrs. Robinson. John Robinson, jr. was killed at the bedside of his dying mother. His sister was dangerously hurt, and all in the house were more or less injured.—Philad. Ledger.

From Texas.—An arrival at New Orleans brings intelligence from Texas as late as the 29th of August. The Daily Courier of that date, mentions the arrival of a sloop from Campeachy, with Commodore Rebeau of the Federal Mexican Navy, on board. The Texan fleet was at Campeachy, and amicable intercourse existed between the officers of the fleet and those of the Federal Mexican government. According to the report of Commodore Rebeau, Urrea had been driven out of the city, but was fortifying himself outside, to make a determined resistance. This contradicts the last advices, which stated that a treaty had been concluded between the two parties, in virtue of which the Federalists had evacuated the capital, and that Urrea had resigned the command and had withdrawn to some distance.—Eve. Post.

The Fortunate Brothers.—"An extraordinary rencontre, worthy," says the Journal de l'Arrondissement du Havre, which relates it, "of figuring in the Arabian Nights Tales, has just occurred at an hotel in Havre. Amongst the travellers who had arrived on the same day, and who were dining at the table d'hote, were three who were relating to each other their adventurers. One had arrived, after an absence of twenty years, from the United States, where he had been to improve his fortune, and had succeeded.

"Another, who left France at the same time, had gone to Egypt and entered into the military service of the Pacha, who had rewarded him with fortune and honors; and the third had been for twenty years attached to various voyages of discovery as an artist, and now returned with a competence and a pension from the state. These three persons are brothers, and were born at Rouen in the same house. At the death of their parents they set out on the same day, after an absence of twenty years, during which they had never heard of each other!"

The Many Headed Wheat.—The many headed wheat is an indigenous plant of California, six heads of which was procured by Major Spencer from a man in the Osage nation of Indians, who had been trading in the Pacific Ocean. The six heads produced six hundred grains, which were planted by Mr. Alpheus Baker, of Abbeville, S. C., the production of which was ten thousand heads. The ground on which the wheat grew was measured by an accurate surveyor—the heads counted—and one head shelled out, and the grain weighed; a calculation was then made, the result of which was, the wheat produced at the rate of two hundred and thirty bushels to the acre. It was planted about the last of January, and cut on the 29th of June. The land on which it grew is poor and sandy, and was unassisted by manure.—Wilkes County (Geo.) News.

Steam.—Lieutenant Janvier, of the French Navy is said to have discovered the means of getting up the steam of engines with such rapidity, that in ten minutes from the first lighting of fire, and although the water in the boiler be quite cold, a vessel may be set in motion. This is, it is added, to be accomplished without any additional apparatus, and very little expense.

The Plague.—A gentleman of this city, who came passengers in the Britannia, informs us that he had proceeded as far as Florence on his way to Rome, but hearing that the plauge was raging severely in Rome, and that it would be extremely dangerous to proceed thither, he turned back and took passage for Boston in the Britannia.—Boston Transcript.

From the West Indies.—Jamaica papers to the 15th of August inclusive have been received at the Exchange reading room. The first article that meets the eye in the Gazette of that date is entitled "Proposals for a colonial union of the colored classes," which was read in the House of Assembly of Barbados on the 21st of July, having been sent down, with other documents, by the Governor. It asserts that although political equality is declared to exist, and does exist by law, in the Briish West India colonies, its existence is more nominal than real, inasmuch as all offices of trust, honor and emolument, except a few of very subordinate character, are claimed and held by the white majority of one-tenth, to the exclusion of the other nine-tenths of the population, although many among the latter are well qualified by education, respectability, property and moral and intellectual worth, whose number is daily increasing. This state of things is protested against as unjust and preposterous; and to do it away, it is proposed to have a conference of delegates from all the colonies, to be held at Barbados, for the purpose of forming a general colonial association, having for its object the civil and political advancement of the colored classes to a practical equality with the whites. Local associations also are to be formed, with the same object.

In short, the aim of the proposed "colonial union" is precisely similar to that of the associations got up in Ireland by Mr. O'Connell, on the model of which it is evidently framed.

This proposition has, naturally enough, caused a tremendous sensation among the whites. As soon as the "proposals" were read in the House of Assembly, a member, Mr. Sealey, rose and denounced it with extreme virulence, as revolutionary, unprincipled, factions and pregnant with unheard-of mischief; he concluded by moving the appointment of a select committee to report upon it, which motion was seconded by Mr. Taylor, in a speech of equal fervor.

The paders seem to be divided in opinion concerning the paper above referred to. The Barbadian calls it an "arrogant, insolent, lying and mischievous document," whereas the New Times and the Liberal, defend it as containing nothing but what is just and equitable. These two journals, we presume, are edited by colored men.

The Gazette announces the death of the Hon. John Alleyne Beckles, president of the Council of Barbados, and judge of Vice Admiralty. He died of peralysis, with which he was seized at the breakfast table. —N. Y. Spectator.

Movements of Troops.—The 8th regiment of infantry (Col. North) stationed at Jefferson barracks, St. Louis, have been ordered to Praira du Chien, in consequence of some difference with the Winnebagoes.

Trinidad.—A meeting of the Agricultural and Immigration Society was held on the 6th of July, at which the report was read, showing that 2102 immigrants from the United Sates and elsewhere had arrived since the 5th of April, 1839. The immigrants from the United States are highly spoken of, as distinguished for moral conduct, great intelligence and persevering industry.—N. Y. Spectator.

German Immigrants.—We are informed by the agent of the German Society, that since the 2d March last, upwards of 14,000 German immigrants have arrived at this port, almost all of whom, without delay, removed to the west, to settle down on the lands purchased by and for them, in the new states and territories of our country.—N. Y. Sun.

Curious Fact.—Dr. Smith the celebrated oculist of Troy, New York, performed the following successful operation, in the above city: Wilbert, son of James Moreland, aged ten years, born blind at Pama, New Jersey, underwent the successful operation for cataract, at Troy, N. Y., October 9, 1839. Ten days after the operation, the boy could see objects the size of a pin's head, but could not call the most common article of daily use by name, without having first associated the sight with the sensation of touch; for instance, a knife, fork, or spoon, being presented to his view, he must feel the article before giving it a name, but the moment he touched the article, he could call it the proper name.

Indian Relics.—While some laborers were engagad, on Saturday, in making an excavation for the foundation of a building, near the shore on South Water st., north of Walnut, the remains of a human body were discovered about three feet below the surface of the earth. The form was lying in a north-east and south-west direction, and the remnants of a blanket or other woolen cloth, partially decayed, in which it was probably enveloped at the time of burial, was still observable. The skull was accidentally broken by a stroke of the spade, otherwise it had been perfect. The femoral bones were undecayed, excepting the more porous portions near the articulations, as indeed were many other parts of the frame. The hair about the head was of a dark color, quite brilliant, and possessing considerable firmness. A copper kettle, partially decayed, and a tomahawk, the blade of which was nearly perfect, doubtless inhumed with the body, after the custom of the Indian tribes, sufficiently marked the remains as those of an aborigince.—New Bedford Register.

Canal Steam Boat.—Mr. Mellen Batel, an ingenious mechanic of this city, has succeeded, after many experiments and much study, in perfecting machinery for propelling boats on the canal by steam, as tow-boats or independent packet or freight boats. We have seen the model and we make no hesitation in speaking of it as an important invention, seemingly practicable, and if it prove to be so, destined no doubt, under the modifications and improvements which experience always suggests in such matters, to work an entire change in the mode of navigating canals. It is in fact an application to canals of the principle of locomotives upon common roads—the wheel being so constructed as to run directly upon the bed of the canal under the boat, adapting itself by its own or an increased weight to the inequalities of the bottom, and acting in deep water as a common water wheel, with revolving paddles. The engine, which works horizontally, and all the machinery, occupy only a part of the boat, leaving a clean sweep on deck, save where the large wheel revolves in the centre.—Alb. Argus.

Loss by Lightning.—During the unusual Thunder Storm of the evening of the 11th inst., the barn of Daniel Moshell of Clay, was struck by lightning and consumed with its contents. These consisted of about 300 bushels of Wheat; 150 do. of Oats; 100 do. of Peas; 20 tons of Hay, &c. &c. Insured.

The premises known as Ham's Tavern stand, on this side of the Seneca river, at Baldwinsville, was struck the same evening, but not materially injured.

The barn belonging to Spencer's tavern stand, at Preble, was also struck, and with the House, entirely consumed.

A gentleman who staid at Log City, Madison Co., during the storm, informed us, that in the course of the night, burning buildings were visible in two directions. There was a heavy fall of hail at the same place.—W. State Journal.

Escape of Louis Philippe and his family from Shipwreck.—On the 16th ult the king embarked with his family at, Eu, at 12 o'clock at night, in the Veloce steamer, his intention being to touch at Boulogne, but the weather became very stormy, and the steamer was obliged to make for Calais. In threading the channel, the vessel was driven by the violence of the wind and waves on the works of a new jetty, where she grounded in a situation of imminent peril to all on board. As soon as it was possible to effect a debarkation, the king ordered every person to be landed, and was himself the last person who left the ship. Thousands of the inhabitants of Boulogne crowded the shore to receive their sovereign, after which the king, with his family, left the town for Boulogne.

The new exchange, in Wall-street, New-York, is a splendid edifice, probably not excelled in America. It occupies a square —198 feet on Wall by 144 on Hanover-st. Its front portico is supported by 16 granite columns, each a single shaft, each measuring 33 tons, and costing $3,000. The building is composed of mason work, outside and in—the outer walls are Quincy granite; the floors are marble, supported by arches, and all the partition walls are stone or brick work. It contains 164 splendid rooms, besides the magnificent rotunda, which is about 50 feet in diameter, and 81 feet to the top of the dome— capable of containing 3,000 persons. The building and ground cost about $3,000,000. It was commenced in 1836; as soon as the basement stores were finished, they were entered and occupied; and so of other apartments as they were completed; and now, although the roof is not yet on, the tenants are perfectly protected from the inclemencies of the weather—and in no danger of fire's being communicated from an adjoining apartment.

We would again caution our readers against fraudulent and counterfeit money with which the country is flooded. Some persons in this city are deeply engaged in putting forth notes purporting to be issued by a bank in Maine which in all probability will never be redeemed. The banks and brokers in New York refuse to receive them on any terms.

Large quantities of counterfeit 3s on the Farmers' Bank of Orwell are afloat in this city.—Sylvester's Reporter.

Ferry Accident.—The Mayor was on Saturday engaged the most of the day in the investigation of the charge of murder, against Archibald Thurman, pilot of the Icelander ferry boat. The circumstances of the case are about these: The ferry boat, in crossing, run down a skiff which was anchored out in the river, in which were three boys fixing their fishing lines. The skiff was in full view, and as the ferry boat approached, the boys made signs to the boat to keep off or stop, and attempted to get up their anchor, but without success. When within a few feet of the skiff the bell was rung, but the engineer not being immediately at the engine some delay occurred before the engine was stopped, and not until the skiff was run down. Two of the boys were picked up, the third and youngest the son of a Frenchman, Mr. Polosk, living in the lower end of the city was drowned. The Mayor, on a full investigation of the conduct of Thurman, thought it a case of wilful murder, and committed him accordingly, refusing to receive bail for his appearance before the Criminal Court.—Thurman is the same pilot who lately run the Icelander into the steamboat Fort Pitt, as the latter was leaving port.—St. Louis Republican.

Another Vessel Burned.—The Mobile Register of Aug. 26th, states that the schr. Black Hawk, C. A. McNear, master, left New York on the 6th of July, with lime. On the 19th of August, at 12 o'clock, P. M., 175 miles to the northward and westward of Tortugas, smoke was discovered issuing through the bulkhead into the cabin. The Captain secured a few articles of clothing, half a barrel of bread, and a few pounds of beef, when the smoke drove them on deck; the cabin windows and doors were secured and fastened down at 16 minutes after the fire was first discovered; the next morning the fire had burned through the deck in three places; planks were nailed over the holes, and on the 22d she made Mobile Point, came over the bar and proceeded immediately to town. She was stripped and moored on the shore opposite the city, and scuttled. On opening the hatches the fire burst out fore and aft, and was still burning at the time the account was written. The vessel and cargo it was presumed would be a total loss. The cargo consisted of 685 casks of lime, 500 kegs, and 10 cases of paints, and 43 pieces of granite.

On the 13th inst., by Rev. J. W. Taggart, Mr. HEROD NEWTON, and Miss NANCY VEDDER, both of Truxton.

DIED,

In Lincklaen, 22d inst., of infamation on the brain, GEORGE W. HAYES, aged one year and nine months, only child of Mr. Harry Hayes.

The Shunammite experienced great joy when her son, her only child, was restored to life. Suppose bereaved parents about to depart from the house of worship, to follow the corpse of a loved one to the grave; at that moment the cold clay is reanimated, and they bear their child home healthy and active as ever. Their bosoms would thrill with inexpressible joy. All would exclaim, What a blessing God has conferred upon them! But a greater blessing than this may be shared by all bereaved parents—that of having their afflictions sanctified to the everlasting good of their souls.

If our prayers were to exert any influence in procuring the restoration to life of a deceased child, we should pray earnestly. This cannot be; but our prayers may avail in procuring the greater blessing for the bereaved parents—the sanctification of the affliction to their spiritual good. Surely, here is great inducement to pray for the afflicted; no less for the afflicted to pray for themselves.

MY CLOSET.

My closet, my dwelling, my sacred retreat,
Where I with my Jesus in concert may meet;
How many the objects inviting me there,
To pour out my soul in the ardor of prayer.

How sweet is the morning, how bright is the view!
The fields and the woodlands are dripping with dew;
The fragrance of blossoms perfuming the air,
Invites to the lone grove where I go to prayer.

When temptests are rising and stormy winds blow,
And all the dim future is darkness and wo;
I have a pavilion to which I repair,
And rest in my closet—my temple of prayer.

How oft when grey twilight is spread o'er the lawn;
When day is retiring, and evening comes on,
The voice of the songsters that flit through the air,
Invite to the closet where I go to prayer.

When shades of thick darkness spread over my heart,
And fears that my Savior's about to depart;
I come to my closet and find Him still there;
His hands filled with blessings to answer my prayer.

My Savior is found in all places below;
His blessings abound and his grace o'erflow;
A temple, a closet, I find every where,
And Jesus there waiting as I come to prayer.

I'll bless the glad day when his grace I first felt;
His mercy then saved me and canceled my guilt;
My closet I'll visit and never despair,
'Tis there my dear Savior first answered my prayer.

ALL TELLS OF GOD.

There is no God—the fool in secret said;
There is no God that rules on earth or sky:
Tear off the band that folds the wretched head,
That God may burst upon his faithless eye.

Is there no God?—the stars in myriads spread,
If he look up, the blasphemy deny,
Whilst his own features, in the mirror read,
Reflect the image of Divinity!

Is there no God!—the silver stream that flows,
The air he breathes, the ground he treads, the trees,
The flowers, the grass, the sands, the wind that blows,
All speak of God; throughout one voice agrees,
And eloquent His dread existence shows;
Blind to thyself, ah! see him, fool, in these!

MISCELLANEOUS.

From the Christian World.

RELIGIOUS LITERATURE.

The social economy was the last natural institution that God established. Every thing else preceded it in the order of creation. It is this, apart from all its excellencies, that invests it with peculiar dignity. If it were here that Divine wisdom made its final exhibition, and Divine power its final display, there is propriety in the conclusion that they thereby consummated the glory which previous manifestations had brought to them.

The distinguishing feature of our social constitution—that which gives it all its pre-eminence—is the dominion of mind over the inferior attributes of human nature. It is not mere impulse that regulates it. Passion has not been ordained to have the mastery over it. By its agency are its restless elements governed—its harmony maintained—its adaptions secured—its destruction prevented. If it did not give law to our social sentiments, direct the play of our feelings, and control our intercourse, society, though it had an Eden-world, would present nothing but violence and misery.

Society owes its strength to mind. Why has the social constitution been preserved and perpetuated? Revolutions have swept over it; infuriated zeal has attempted to overthrow its foundations. Why has it stood the shock and borne the blast, but because intellect upheld it?

The condition of mind is the condition of society; the aspect of the world interprets the state of intellect; Why is civilization the most perfect form of society? because of the development of mind. Why is Christianity the best agent that can operate on a community? Because it is suited to the expansion and proper direction of intellect. Improve the one and you improve the other. All the means that advance the progress of civilization, and promote the welfare of man as a social being, do so by their effect upon the mind. Enlighten this noble part of our nature—noble in its degradation—free it from the fetters that bind it to the dust—restore its elasticity by removing the pressure of physical circumstances—lead it forth to communion with whatever is grand and glorious, and every feature of society will brighten—every interest thereof will thrive, and every thing show that a new leaven has begun to work within its bosom.

If, then, mind control society, nothing can be plainer than that all its operations and exhibitions must have had an immediate effect upon social character and condition. Let this point be briefly illustrated.

Mind turns its mighty energies to mechanical objects. Important inventions—new applications of power—the complete subjection of matter is the result. Are not the interests of society thereby promoted or injured? Philosophy is cultivated—science pursued—truth unfolded. Is there no effect upon society? Literature engages attention. Votaries crowd her beautiful walks and gather her valuable treasures. All her branches are studied. History raises the veil which time had spread over his path; reveals the characters and objects of the past; enables us to wander among its monuments and converse with its scenes. Poetry collects whatever is fair and beautiful, brings the material and spiritual worlds together, and presents all the glory of nature to the inward eye. The various forms of literature are produced. Is there not an impression thereby made upon sentiment and passion—is not imagination awakened—is not the heart captivated? Is not the character of society effected?

Of all the exhibitions of mind, none operates so deeply, thoroughly, and universally, as literature. It has made a greater and more durable impression upon society than any other form that intellect has ever taken. Antiquity had its arts and sciences, but they have had comparatively no influence; its literature has remained from age to age, mingling itself with the opinions of men, and constantly modifying character and conduct.

It is literature that addresses us through the tenderest, strongest and noblest part of our nature. It calls into exercise all our emotional power. It becomes our companion and friend. It instructs and charms us. It reaches the character through the avenue of the imagination. It goes into the hands of youth before the world is known, and often gives the first bias to thought, and opens the first channel for feeling. Every charm is thrown around it, and every opportunity afforded it that can make it answer its ends.

If such be the power of literature, it must be apparent that it can be rendered highly serviceable to the moral welfare of the world. It may be employed in the cause of Christ. Formed upon the spirit of the Bible—breathing the purity of Heaven—unfolding the beauty, excellence, and glory of Christianity, and thus coming in contact with the human consciences and hearts, it may be used by the blessed Spirit "to convince of sin," and turn thousands into the path that leads to the Cross, and from the Cross to the Throne.

Truth is power—the power of the Omnipotent. Truth is the glory of the intellect; it is purity; it is the foundation of virtue; it is the enemy of vice. It is the sunshine that brightens, and the lightning that scathes. It is the heavenly instrument introduced by God himself among men, and maintained by the Holy Ghost, to regenerate the corrupt race of Adam. It is the salt that is to purify; the leaven that is to leaven the whole lump.

It is through religious literature that truth may be diffused and brought to bear upon the character and condition of men. It presents a medium through which vice may be exposed and virtue honored—through which minds may be illuminated and hearts impressed. Imagination may here aid the truth by clothing it with all proper beauty and interest: fiction, so far as it can be lawfully employed, may throw its powerful charms around it; poetry, an art above all others belonging to religion, may embody its glorious revelations, and thus be restored to its ancient alliance with virtue and wisdom.

To be useful, such a literature must be formed upon the philosophy of religion. It must take it as it is; it must set forth its excellencies and claims just as the Bible does; it must not modify; it must not destroy the edge of truth: bold in its announcements; pungent in its appeals, and direct in its application to the conscience, it must lean upon the authority of the written word, and speak in the name of God. Philosophy and religion never could be harmonized so as to operate together. The former is "foolishness"—the latter "is the word of God in a mystery." We must preserve truth in its own distinctness and heavenly nature. Whenever we use it, and wherever we apply it, we must apply it as the truth of God—as an instrument formed and polished in Heaven, and sent to us to accomplish purposes in accordance with its own purity and glory. Religious literature can only be effective so far as it maintains the true and unchanging spirit of revelation. It must also be based on the philosophy of the mind. Truth must be simplified. Abstractions should form no part of it; speculations should be avoided, and private theories unobtruded. Where corruption is to be met and overcome, the plainest and most practical exhibition of truth is the best adapted to accomplish it. It must be designed for all classes of society. Its character should recommend it to the inmate of the cottage, and make it the welcome companion of his quiet hours. Though unable to master the mysteries of science, and become learned in the wisdom of the world, he should here find intellectual employment and gratification, and at the same time have a warmer glow of devotion kindled upon his heart. It should speak a language that the young could understand. It should have a universal adaptation. Does not the sunshine equally promote the growth of flower and tree? Does not the dew water the most insignificant spires of grass? So should religious literature improve and bless society in all its diversities and divisions.

Sufficient has already been done in religious literature to demonstrate its great usefulness. Though such an instrument must necessarially operate more secretly and quietly than others, yet its fruits have been apparent and extensive. Did Hannah More do nothing for her country and the world? Was the genius of Leigh Richmond foolishly employed when it wrote "The Dairyman's Daughter?" Has "Pilgrim's Progress" had no effect upon society? Who has most advanced the welfare of the world, Cowper or Byron? Who would not rather have the fame that has followed the pious literary labors of those whose pens have been guided and governed by Christianity, than all the false glory that has gathered around the names of those who have had the energies of intellect enlisted in a warfare against morality, religion and truth?

Infidelity has always endeavored to extend its doctrines through the medium of literature. Its most boasted triumphs have been hereby achieved. Had not the sophistry of Hume, the licentiousness of Gibbon, the wit of Voltaire, the elegance of Rosseau, and the ribaldry of Paine, been embodied in this form, the word would have been spared from experiencing the curse of their talents. It is not the volcano that burns, but the volcano that pours its fiery current over village and city, that desolates and destroys. It is the infidel holding the pen—it is the infidel using the power of the press, and breathing his spirit into the hearts of thousands, that weakens the foundations of the faith, and stamps the seal of perdition upon the melancholy wrecks of hope and character.

Look at the popular literature of the age! It abounds with infidelity. It advocates crime; it honors vice; it is the servant of Satan. Poetry throws its flowers in the path that leads to destruction, and fiction lends its seducing charms to error and iniquity.

We must meet infidelity on its own ground and with its own weapons. We must redeem our literature from this unholy spirit, and make the pen and the press the instruments of honoring God, and promoting the spread of virtue and religion.

The last monument of infidelity ought now to be overthrown. It is time for Christianity to have undisputed possession of the world of intellect; it is time for her to be fixed upon the loftiest altitude of the earth; it is time that the millions of our race were encircling her Cross, and swelling the song of universal triumph.

We have already driven infidelity from some of its firmest and oldest citadels. It has been banished from the seats of worldly power; it can no more look to kings and legislators for patronage and support. It has had its social influence destroyed; its dark shadows no longer rest upon the family hearth; domestic virtue has ceased to wither under its agency. It has retired to literature as its final entrenchment. Here is its last hope. "In the name of God we will" HERE "set up our banners." Victory shall be our reward, for ours is purity against impurity, virtue against vice, and happiness against misery. Ours is the cause of Heaven against Hell.

THE THUNDER STORM.

The Portland Transcript says these lines by Montgomery always occur to us when we view the approaching thunder storm. They are true to nature.

"A thunder storm—the eloquence of Heaven,
When every cloud is from its slumber riven,
Who hath not paused beneath its hollow groan,
And felt Omnipotence around him thrown!
With what a gloom the ushering scene appears!
The leaves all fluttering with instinctive fears
The waters curling with a fellow dread.
A breezeless fervor round creation spread,
And last, the heavy rain's reluctant shower,
With big drops pattering on the tree and bower;
While wizard shapes the howling sky deform—
All mark the coming of the thunder storm!"

MAHOMEDAN PERUSAL OF THE CHRISTIAN SCRIPTURES.

The Bible is by no means a stranger in the hands of Mussulmen, for though those possessed by Christians are supposed to be corrupt, they are, on the whole, respected as the Word of God. Their connection with Mahomedanism, and the frequent allusions to them in the Koran, render them an object of curiosity, especially to the learned Mussulmen. They are frequently sought after from no other motive than to learn the nature of the doctrines which they teach. Several instances have come to my knowledge, in which men in authority have sent requests for copies to Christians whom they knew to possess them. The parts which they choose and read with the greatest pleasure, are the narrative portions, in which they often become intensely interested.

About nine miles distant from Broussa, is a village inhabited by a mixed population of Greeks and Turks. On a certain occasion, the latter requested the priest of the village to read the Gospel to them. He consented and sat down with most of the Mussulmen in the village around him, and a copy of the New Testament, procured from an American missionary in Broussa, in his hand. He began and read on amidst almost breathless silence, until the hour of meal had come. His hearers, however, had become so deeply interested in the narrative, that they would not permit him to suspend the reading. He continued, therefore, uninterrupted until he came to the closing scenes of the death of Christ. Here they stopped, for it is a doctrine of the Mahomedans that it was not Jesus who was crucified, but some one in his appearance and likeness.

The lives of the patriarchs and prophets are also a favorite portion of Scripture to the Mussulmen. Their own books are full of stories concerning them. They speak of them with the deepest reverence. They regard them all as veritable Mussulmen, as, in the literal sense of the word, they were. They adopt their names. They respect the places of their birth, and they perform pilgrimages to their sepulchres.

To other portions of the sacred writings which Mussulmen read with the highest admiration, are those which abound in moral sentiments and precepts. Such are the Psalms of David and the Proverbs of Solomon. The former are replete with these expressions of adoration and trust in God which are most congenial to a devout Mussulman, and with allusions and resemblances most familiar to the mind of an Oriental. The latter is, throughout, an Eastern book. Its apothegmetical and sententious style is that to which the minds of Mussulmen are most accustomed in their own books on moral truth and duty.

The Sermon on the Mount is another portion of scripture which I have heard Mussulmen read and expatiate upon with evident delight.

WORDS OF A CHILDLESS WIDOW ON THE BENEFIT OF AFFLICTION.

My husband died and then disease seized on my children, and they were taken one by one. In the course of a few years I had lain those in whom my heart was bound up, in the grave. Oh! they were many bitter tears that I shed. The world was dark. The very voice of consolation was a pain. I could sit by the side of my friend, but could not hear him speak of my departed ones. My affliction was too deep to be shared. It seemed as if God himself had deserted me. I was alone. The places at the table and the fireside remained—but they who filled them were gone. Oh the loneliness, as it had been a tomb of my chamber. How blessed was sleep! For then the dead lived again. They were all around me. My youngest child and last, sat on my knee—she leaped up in my arms—she uttered my name with infant joyousness; and that sweet tone was as if an angel had spoken to my sad soul. But the dream vanished, and the dreary morning broke, and I waked and prayed—and I sought forgiveness even while I uttered it for my unholy prayer—prayed that God would let me lie down in the grave, side by side with my children and husband.

But better thoughts came. In my grief I remembered that though my loved ones were separated from me, the same Father—the same Infinite Love, watched over them as when they were by my fireside. We were divided, but only for a season.—And by degrees my grief grew calmer. But since then, my thoughts have been more in that world, where they have gone, than in this. I do not remember less, but I look forward and upward more. I learned the worth of prayer and reliance. Would that I could express to every mourner how the sting is taken away from the grief of one, who, with a true and full heart puts her trust in God. I can never agin go into the gay world. The pleasures of this world are no longer pleasures to me. But I have trust and hope and confidence. I know that my Redeemer liveth. I know that God ever watches over his children. And in my desolation, this faith of the heart has long enabled me to feel a different kind of pleasure indeed, but a far deeper, though more sober joy, than the pleasures of this world ever gave me when youth and health, and friends all conspired to give them their keenest relish.

'You have learned in your own heart,' I said, 'that all trials are not evils.'

It was with eyes up-turned to heaven, and gushing over with tears, not tears of sorrow, but gratitude, and with a radiant countenance, that she answered, in a tone so mild, so rapt, as if her heart were speaking to her God,—'It has been good for me that I have been afflicted.'

E. P.

BONAPARTE'S WOUNDS.—Napoleon showed me the marks of two wounds—one a very deep cicatrice above the left knee, which he said he received in his first campaign of Italy, and it was of so serious a nature, that the surgeons were in doubt whether it might not be ultimately necessary to amputate. He observed, that when he was wounded, it was always kept a secret in order not to discourage the soldiers. The other was on the toe, and had been received at Eckmuhl. "At the siege of Acre," continued he, "a shell thrown by Sydney Smith, fell at my feet. Two soldiers, who were close by, seized and closely embraced me, one in front and the other on one side, and made a rampart of their bodies for me against the effect of the shell, which exploded and overwhelmed us with sand. We sunk into the hole formed by its bursting; one of them was wounded. I made them both officers. One has since lost a leg at Moscow, and commanded at Vincennes when I left Paris. When he was summoned by the Russians, he replied, that as soon as they had sent him back the leg he had lost at Moscow, he would surrender the fortress. "Many times in my life," continued he, "have I been saved by soldiers and officers throwing themselves before me when I was in the most imminent danger. At Arcola, when I was advancing, Colonel Meuran, my aid-de-camp, threw himself before me, covered me with his body, and received the wound which was destined for me. He fell at my feet, and his blood spouted in my face. He gave his life to preserve min. Never yet, I believe, has there been such devotion shown by soldiers as mine have manifested for me. In all my misfortunes, never has the soldier, even when expiring, been wanting to me—never has man been served more faithfully by his troops. With the last drop of blood gushing out of their veins, they exclaimed, 'Vive l'Empereur!'"—A voice from St. Helena.

"WHAT IS HAPPINESS?"—Let a man have all the world can give him, he is still miserable if he has a grovelling, unlettered, undevoted mind. Let him have his gardens, his fields, his woods, his lawns, for grandeur, plenty, ornament and gratification; while at the same time God is not in all his thoughts. And let another have neither field, nor garden; let him only look at nature with an enlightened mind—a mind which can see and adore the Creator in his works—can consider them as demonstrations of his power, his wisdom, his goodness, and his truth;—this man is greater, as well as happier, in his poverty, than the other in his riches. The one is a little higher than a beast—the other a little lower than an angel.—Jones, of Nayland.

PROFANE LANGUAGE.—Avoid those who are profane and obscene in their language. By long associating with such youth, you will by degrees habituate yourself to their language, and thus be shunned by the virtuous and the good. When you hear the name of God irreverently spoken by a companion, set him down as an unsafe friend; and unless he break away from the habit, in future have but little to do with him.—Boston Patriot.

Excellence is providentially placed beyond the reach of indolence, that success may be the reward of industry, and that idleness may be punished with obscurity and disgrace.—Cowper.

OF
THE CASKET,
AND PHILADELPHIA MONTHLY MAGAZINE.

THE great increase of the subscription list of the Casket, which has been nearly doubled since the commencement of the last volume, warrants the most extensive improvements on the first of July 1840, at which time a new volume will be commenced with increased vigour. Nothing need be said of the firm basis on which the Casket stands, it being already the oldest magazine in the country, and has maintained its popularity, in the face of all opposition. It is to be found upon the centre tables of families making literary pretentions from Maine to Georgia.

TYPE—EMBELLISHMENTS.

The Casket is printed with a clear and beautiful type, upon the finest white paper. The illustrations are not surpassed by those of any periodical, at home or abroad and beside the monthly steel engravings, a quarterly plate of colored Fashions has lately been added. The style of these embellishments is unequaled, and they are always accompanied by an appropriate sketch. No wood cuts disgrace the work. Whatever appears in the Casket, is of the first order of art.

The volume will be with the first of a series of splendid mezzotint engravings, prepared expressly for the work, by the burin of Sartain, who deservedly stands as the best engraver of the kind in the United States.

LITERARY CHARACTER.

The literary character of the Casket is well known. It is wholly original, of the highest order, and sustained by writers of the first rank. Essays, Tales Sketches and Travels, compose its prominent prose articles; while the poetry is equalled by that of no other magazine of like character. The variety for which the Casket is celebrated, shall suffer no diminution; but on the contrary every exertion shall be made to increase its interest.

Several Romances of the Revolution have already appeared, and others shall follow in the course of the volume, presenting when finished, a complete picture of the manners, and a historical account of the great battles of that time. Thus, the Casket, instead of being filled with sickly sentimentalities, aims at a true delineation of human nature in every variety of passion.

The series of thrilling nautical sketches, entitled entitled Cruising in the Last War, and which are rated by the contemporary press, equal to the celebrated sketches in 'Tom Cringle's Log,' will be continued and the 'Leaves from a Lawyer's Port Folio,' which have attained a deserved celebrity, will still furnish attraction to the Magazine.

We shall furnish the readers of the Casket with some valuable papers from entirely new contributors. The author of 'Old Ironsides on a Lee Shore,' will give the first of a number of Sketches in the July number. We count upon his prolific and graceful pen to do much in maintaining the great popularity of the Magazine. In addition to the variety already embraced in the pages of the Magazine, our 'Sylvan Letters,' the first of which appears in the June number as introductory, will interest and add worth to its pages. They are from no unpractised pen.

FASHIONS.

The Fashions are published in the Casket quarterly, or as often as any really new style arrives from Paris. The engravings are colored and executed from original designs. No old, worn out plates are retouched and then published as the latest fashions.—The truth of our designs may be tested by comparing them with the latest descriptions of dresses from London and Paris. They are universally admitted to be the finest specimen of engraving and coloring afforded by any Magazine in the country.

The expense of getting them up is great. But we shall in no wise abate the quantity! Remember.—The readers of the Casket are furnished with these fashion plates as an extra. They do not interfere with the regular and choice engravings which always accompany the work.

TIME OF PUBLICATION.

The Casket is published on the first of the month in every quarter of the Union. The most distant subscriber consequently receives it on that day, as well as those who reside in Philadelphia. In all the principal cities agents have been established by which means subscribers in the vicinity can obtain their copies free of postage.

TERMS.—Three Dollars per annum. Or Two Copies yearly for Five Dollars, invariably in advance, post paid. No new subscriber received without the money, or the name of a responsible agent.

Editors who may copy this prospectus and will send a copy, marked with ink, addressed to the Saturday Evening Post (which will save postage on newspapers) shall be promptly furnished with the work. To be particular in this matter, we should like a copy of the paper marked, to be sent more than once, that no mistake or delay may occur.—Editors are served with the Magazine from the time the advertisement is inserted. We mention this, as many inserted the advertisement at the close of the last volume, and expected all the back numbers.—This of course we could not be expected to grant.

Ladies Department.

Mrs. L. M. CARPENTER, Preceptress.
Miss CAROLINE E. WILLCOX, Teacher.

This Institution is located in the pleasant and healthful village of De Ruyter. Its buildings are both spacious and commodious. Study rooms of which there are a large number, are furnished with chairs, tables, bedsteads, and stoves; and rented to gentlemen at one shilling per week; or one shilling for each student, the rooms being large enough to accommodate two. Good board is afforded at one dollar and twenty five cents per week, including washing or lodging. One shilling extra, is charged to those who require both.

The institution is furnished with a good Philosophical and chemical apparatus. It is also furnished with a valuable Library. A scientific society connected with the Institute, is furnished with a choice collection of Minerals and Curiosities.

About twenty-one thousand dollars has already been expended on the De Ruyter Institute for the purpose of facilitating the student in his pursuit of scientific knowledge.

It is the object of those to whom the management of the Institute is entrusted, to make the expenses of acquiring a knowledge of the sciences, as light as possible.

And the public may be assured that a strict attention will be paid to the moral cultivation of the student; and the trustees and teachers will spare no reasonable pains to render the time spent at the De Ruyter Institute, as agreeable and profitable to the student as circumstances will admit.

Young gentlemen and ladies wishing to engage in the pursuit of science, are respectfully invited to spend a term or two, at the De Ruyter Institute and satisfy themselves in regard to its merit.

The year is divided into three terms, of fourteen weeks each. The first term commenced on the twelth day of September; The second term on the second day of January; and the third term on the eighth day of May.

RELIGIOUS EXPERIENCE.

SPIRITUAL CONFLICT.

In our last we spoke of the Christian enemies, in the general; it is now intended to enter into a more particular view of the conflict which is experienced by the pilgrim to Zion. Swarms of vain thoughts may be reckoned among the first and most constant enemies of the servant of God. The mind of man is like a fountain which is continually sending forth streams. There is not a moment of our waking time when the rational soul is entirely quiescent. How it may be in our sleeping hours, this is not the place to inquire—as we are not in that state engaged in this warfare. Perhaps this is saying too much. I believe that sin may be committed in sleep; for there is often a deliberate choice of evil after a struggle between a sense of duty and an inclination to sin. And often the same vain and impure thoughts which were too much indulged in waking hours, infest us when asleep, and may find much readier entertainment than when we have all our senses about us. It is difficult indeed, to say when moral agency is suspended, so as to render the person inculpable for his volitions; and many know that they consent to temptations in sleep, when they abhor the evil as soon as they are awake. And in other cases inclination is indulged, where there is not the least sense of the moral turpitude of the act. But in other cases, persons in sleep consent to sin with a clear apprehension of the evil of the thing to which they consent; here, there must be some guilt; for if there was not an evil nature, prone to iniquity, such volitions would not take place. Two things are in our power, and these we should do, first to avoid evil thoughts and such pampering of the body as have a tendency to pollute our dreams; and secondly, to pray to God to preserve us from evil thoughts even in sleep. Particularly we should pray to be delivered from the influence of Satan during our sleeping hours. Mr. Andrew Baxter, in his work on the soul, is of opinion, that dreams can in no way be acounted for, but by the agency of other spirits acting on ours. While I do not adopt this theory of dreaming, I am inclined to believe, that some how or other, both good and evil spirits have access to our minds in sleep. They actually seem to hold conversation with us, and suggest things of which we had never thought before. To return from this disgression—it may be safely asserted that no human mind, in this world, is free from the incursion of vain thoughts. The proportion of such thoughts depends on the circumstances of the individual, and the degree of spirituality and self-government to which he has attained. The question very naturally arises here, is the mere occurrence of vain or wicked thoughts sinful? This is a nice question in casuistry, and should not be answered inconsiderately. It is said in Scripture, "the thought of wickedness is sin;" but by thought, in this place, we should probably understand "intention." The wise man would teach that sin may be committed in the mind without any external act; a doctrine abundantly taught in other parts of Holy Writ. Or, we may understand it to mean that when thoughts of evil are entertained and cherished in the mind, there is sin. But as our thoughts are often entirely involuntary, arising from, we know not what causes, it can not be that every conception of a thing wrong, is itself sinful. If I conceive of another person stealing, or murdering, or committing adultery, if my mind abhors the deed, the mind is not thereby polluted. Thoughts may not in themselves be sinful, and yet may become so, if they fill and occupy the mind to the exclusion of better thoughts. Ideas of present scenes and passing transactions, are not in themselves sinful, because necessary, and often required by the duties which we have to perform; but if the current of these thoughts is so continuous that they leave no room for spiritual meditations, they become sinful by their excess. Again, as every Christian has set times for prayer and other devotional exercises, if the mind on such occasions, wanders off from the contemplation of those objects which occupy it, such forgetfulness of God's presence, and vain wandering of the thoughts, is evidently sinful. And here is an arena on which many a severe conflict has been undergone, and where, alas, many overthrows have been experienced by the sincere worshipper of God. How our perfectionists dispose of this matter, and what their professed experience is, I know not. I suppose however, that they are at best no more exempt from wandering thoughts than other Christians; and if so they must practice a double hypocrisy, first in persuading themselves that there is no sin in all this; and secondly in denying or concealing from others their real experience on this subject. But is it not true, that from the very laws of association of ideas, there will often be an involuntary wandering of the thoughts? This is admitted; and it is conceded also, that it may be impossible in all cases to determine with precision, which of our straying thoughts contracts guilt, and how much blame to us, when our thoughts suddenly start aside from the mark like a deceitful bow. There are, however, some plain principles which sound casuistry can establish. If when the thoughts thus start aside, they are not immediately recalled, then there is sin; for the mind has this power over its thoughts, and when it is not exercised it argues negligence, or something worse. Again, if this deviation of our thoughts would have been presented by a solemn sense of the divine presence and omniscience, then it is sinful; for such impressions should accompany us to the throne of grace. And finally, if the true reasons of these erratic trains of thought, at such seasons, is owing to a secret aversion to spiritual things, and a preference at the moment to some carnal or selfish indulgence, then indeed, there is not only sin, but sin of enormous guilt. It is the direct acting of enmity against God. There are many it is to be feared, who take little or no account of their thoughts; and who, if they run through the external round of duties, feel satisfied. Multitudes are willing to be religious, and even punctilious in duty, if no demand is made upon them for fixedness of attention, and fervency and elevation of affection. The carnal mind hates nothing so much as a spiritual approach to God, and the remainder of this enmity in the pious, is the very "law in their members which wars against the law of the mind." This is the very core of their inbred sin, from which all evil thoughts proceed, on account of which they need to be humbled in the dust, every day that they live. There is much reason to fear, however, that many who appear to be serious Christians are not at all in the habit of watching their thoughts, and ascertaining the evil that is in them. I knew a person, nearly half a century ago, who being greatly troubled with wandering thoughts in times of devotion, was solicitous to know whether any other person was troubled in the same way, and to the same degree, with such swarms of vain thoughts. He carefully wrote down what he experienced in this way, then took it to two serious professors, of whose piety he had a good opinion, and without intimating that it was his own experience, inquired whether they were acquainted with any thing like this. They both acknowledged that they were often interrupted with wandering thoughts in prayer; but in the degree described in the paper, they were not, and could not believe that any real Christian was. There may be, and no doubt is, a constitutional difference among men in regard to this matter. In some minds the links of association are so strong, that when a particular idea is suggested, the whole train must come along, and thus the object previously before the mind is lost sight of, and will not be recovered without a resolute effort.

An old writer says, "what busy flies were to the sacrifices on the altar, such are vain thoughts to our holy services; their continued buzzing disturbs the mind and distracts its devotion." St. Bernard complained much of these crowds of vain thoughts, he said—"Incunt et exeunt," they pass and repass, come in and go out, and will not be controlled. "Amovere volo, nec valeo," I would fain remove them, but can not. This is in perfect accordance with Paul's experience, "when I would do good evil is present with me. And Chrysostom says, "that nothing is more dreadful to the godly than sin." "This is death—this is hell." Therefore, though nothing amiss be discerned by man, yet he is afflicted, deeply afflicted on account of his rebellious thoughts, which being in the secret closet of the heart, can only appear unto God.

The old writer, before mentioned, introduces a struggling soul, mourning on this account. "O the perplexing trouble of my distracting thoughts! How do they continually disturb the quiet of my mind, and make my holy duties become a weariness to my soul? They cool the heart, they damp the vigor, they deaden the comfort of my devotions. Even when I pray God to forgive my sins, I then sin whilst I am praying for forgiveness: yea, whether it be in the church or in the closet, so frequently and so violently do these thoughts withdraw my heart from God's service, that I cannot have confidence he hears my suit, because I know by experience. I do not hear myself: surely therefore God must need be far off from my prayer, whilst my heart is so far out of his presence, hurried away with a crowd of vain imagination." To whom he applies the following consolations. 1. "These vain thoughts being thy burden, shall not be thy ruin: and though they do take from the sweetness, they shall not take from the sincerity of thy devotions. 2. It is no little glory which we give to God in the acknowledgement of his omnipresence and omniscience, that we acknowledge him to be privy to, the first risings of our most inward thoughts. 3. It is much the experience of God's children, even the devoutest saints that their thoughts of God and of Christ, of heaven and holiness, are very unsteady and fleeting. Like the sight of a star through an optic glass, held by a palsy-hand, such is our view of divine objects.—4. Know thou hast the gracious meditation of an all-sufficient Savior to supply thy defects, and procure an acceptance of thy sincere, though imperfect devotions. 5. As thou hast the gracious mediation of an all-sufficient Savior to supply thy defects, so hast thou the strengthening power of his Holy Spirit to help their infirmities; which strength is made perfect in weakness. When thou art emptied, it shall fill thee; when thou art stumbled, it shall raise thee. The experience of God's saints will tell thee, that they have long languished under this cross of vain thoughts; yet, after long conflict have obtained a joyful conquest, and from mourning doves have become mounting eagles." PASTORAL LETTER

To the Churches under the care of the Niagara Presbytery.

CHRISTIAN BRETHREN:—The desecration of the Holy Sabbath is a growing and alarming evil, most deeply to be deplored by all true Christian and patriots.

As Christians, we should be filled with a holy jealousy for the maintenance of those divine institutions with which are identified the prosperity and perpetuity of the true religion of Heaven. God said to the Israelites, "Surely my Sabbath ye shall keep, for it is a sign between me and you that ye may know that I am the Lord." In like manner, the Christian Sabbath is a sign occurring every week, that the religion with which it stands connected is revealed from heaven;—that it is identified with the knowledge of the true God and Redeemer. This is evident from the fact, that upon those lands where no Christian Sabbath dawns, no correct knowledge of a Triune God exists. Or, demolish the Sabbath where it does exist, and the true God will soon be forgotten, and society will soon be blasted under the cold, dark and cheerless influence of infidelity. Surrender the Sabbath, and the glory of the Lord will depart from our sanctuaries, our altars will be broken down, our hopes of immortal blessedness will expire, our social and domestic enjoyments will depart, and the flood-gates of iniquity will be thrown open, and a tide of moral death, wide and wasteful, will sweep over the land.

As patriots, we are compelled to believe, that if Christianity does not lend us her conservative influence, we are a ruined nation. Philosophy, learning, political science, have not saved other republics, and will not save us; Christianity exerting her influence through her own institutions, may do it. Here then, is our only hope. Heaven may help us, or we are lost beyond recovery. But we are not to look for any miraculous interposition. This help must come through the Sabbath, with its cognate institutions. So long as we can plant our feet upon the fourth commandment, we have a place to stand, and inculcate all those heaven-born truths that are designed to impart wisdom in the making of laws, and a disposition to obey them; and thus prepare men for the permanent and safe exercise of a voluntary self-government. Hence the constitution of almost every state in the Union has thrown its protection around the Sabbath, and given it every legal security against improper encroachments. Legislators have done this from a high sense of consistency as the rulers of a Christian people, and from a conviction of duty which they owe to the moral and intellectual welfare of the community. Said Washington in his farewell address, "Of all the dispositions and habits which lead to political prosperity, religion and morality are indispensable supports. In vain would that man claim the tribute of patriotism, who should labor to subvert these firmest props of the duties of men and citizens." Said Franklin, in the convention that formed our present constitution, "The longer I live, the more I see convincing proofs, that God governs in the affairs of men; and if a sparrow cannot fall to the ground without his notice, is it probable that an empire can rise without his aid? We have been assured in the sacred writings, that except the Lord build the house, they labor in vain that build it! I firmly believe this; and I also believe, that without his concurring aid, we shall succeed in this political building no better than the builders of Babel:—our projects will be confounded, and we ourselves shall become a reproach and a by-word down to future ages."

Thus the moral influence of God's revealed institutions, and the recognition of his government, was deemed by the fathers of our country, absolutely necessary to her prosperity—absolutely indispensable to a successful issue of the experiment about to be made, whether a free and popular government could be sustained. And it was in anticipation of the aid of the Christian Sabbath, in preparing the people for self-government, that they framed a popular constitution. But for the conservative interest of Christianity, shedding down her light upon the people, through the Sabbath, they never would have made the experiment. If it fails, the guilt attached to its failure, will much of it be upon those who lend their influence to break down the holy Sabbath. And yet the land is full of those who dare to tamper with this divine institution—others who hate its blessed light—and others who are mad against it, and dare to risk all the tremendous consequences, both to church and state, of demolishing it. But blot out the Sabbath, and remove from community the enlightening, restraining, humanizing influence of its instructions, and the laws of both divide and human government will "lie loose upon the neck of the nation." A systematized licentiousness will seize the reins, and ride over all law, all justice, all moral and religious restraint, until wild misrule and anarchy become the order of the day. Now, Presbytery are of the opinion, that the American Church, under God, has power to prevent these untold calamities;—that she is bound by the unspeakable importance of the institution itself—and by the bonds of her covenant, to rescue it from its open and flagrant desecrations. "No other institution, no other service, no other ordinance of religion has, or can have, the majesty blazing around it, which illumines the day of God." On this day it is, that the church is to receive her orders, recruit her ranks, renew her strength, gird herself for the conflict, and march triumphantly into the field. It is on this blessed day that our dear children are to be trained for the holy war. On this day are to be inculcated those good principles of Christian morality, so important to self-government, and a wise regulation of commerce among a free people. In short, it is the bulwark of the nation—the strongest defence of her liberties, for, "if the Son shall make us free, then shall we be free indeed." Hence, as a nation, we cannot afford to let go the Sabbath;—as a church, we cannot live without it.

In view of these truths, Presbytery would bear their united testimony against the sin of Sabbath-breaking in every form. We entreat you, dear brethren, to consider well this subject, and to wash your hands from all participation in the guilt of breaking down this sacred institution. We affectionately urge you to watch with great care against all encroachments upon its appriate duties in your own families—that the day be uniformly devoted to the worship of God in his sanctuary—to the study of God's word—to the cultivation of family religion—and to secret prayer and meditation. Accordingly, we urge you to conscientiously abstain from all those employments and recreations which would be lawful on other days, except such as are necessary works of mercy.

Particularly, would we bear our united and decided testimony against all participation, either directly or indirectly, in the breach of the Sabbath, by the investment of stocks in buildings, steam-boats, canal-boats, stages, rail-roads, &c., that are employed for secular purposes on that day. Furthermore, we hold it to be the sacred duty of the professor of religion, to withhold his patronage in the conveyance of freight from all transportation companies, and individuals, who permit their boats and cars to run on the Sabbath, and bestow it upon those who regard this sacred day. We also remonstrate solemnly against the violations of this day, in unnecessary journeyings, in riding or walking for pleasure; in exchanging social visits and worldly conversations, &c. In these, and many other ways, desecrated by the professed friends of God, to the disparagement of our holy religion, and the disgrace of the Christian profession.

Presbytery would, therefore, earnestly enjoin upon all those who are ordained to rule in God's house, to cleanse the sanctuary from this sin, by a prompt, judicious, and faithful discipline, according to the direction of the great Head of the Church.—Brethren, be faithful and fearless in the performance of your official duties. Remember, they that rule well shall be counted worthy of double honor. The vital interests of the church require, that speedy and efficient measures be adopted to wipe from her this reproach. She cannot rise in her strength, and diffuse her light, and reprove the world of sin, so long as she participates in the heaven-daring, soul-destroying practice of Sabbath-breaking. Again, we urge you by the love you bear to Christ, to souls, to the church, and to your country, to be faithful.

ROMANISM, THE NATURAL PRODUCT OF THE HEART

BY BISHOP M'ILVAINE.

"The spirit of Romanism is substantially the spirit of human nature. Its errors will be found to be the natural and spontaneous growth of the human heart; not so much the effect, as the cause of the Romish system of religion. No one accordingly can point out any precise person at which this 'mystery of iniquity' first began, or specify any person who first introduced it.—The corruptions crept in one by one, and gradually changed her bridal purity for the accumulated defilements of the mother of harlots." They grew out of that universal disposition of mankind which leads them "to go about establishing their own righteousness, not submitting themselves to the righteousness of God." Of that disposition, Romanism is just the direct and multiform consequence; the most systematic, gigantic and avowed developement. What we behold full grown and developed under the hideous proportions, the bold frontlet, and the 'scarlet' drapery of that predicted 'man of sin, who sitteth as God, in the temple of God,' was born into this world thousands of years before Christianity began. Justification by human merits was the device of Satan as soon as enmity was first put between the serpent and the woman, and his seed and her seed. It was the distinguishing feature of the sacrifice of Cain, and in him led to the first persecution and the first martyrdom for the faith. Under the form of the righteousness of the Scribes and Pharisees, it grew into a compacted system and made the commandment of God of none effect, by the traditions of the elders, under the Jewish dispensations, just as under the Christian, it has done the same, by the traditions of the Romanists, "teaching for doctrines, the commandment of men." It was this, among the Christians of Galatia, against which Paul was contending, when he asked: "Are ye so foolish? Having begun in the Spirit, are ye now made perfect by the flesh?" Always has it been a chief ruler of the darkness of this world. It was not left to be confirmed within the folds of Romanism, because the reformed branded it with their solemn protest. It forsook not the hearts of the people when it was cancelled from the standards of their faith. It abode with them as a plague, because they carried with them the corruption of their fallen nature. Under divers shapes has it often since appeared in writings and ministry of Protestant divines. From the doctrine of Scripture, on this subject, which stands as a summit-level and dividing the ridge, like the ancient Church in Piedmont, between the opposite declivities that terminate in the two extremes of Atheism and Popery, the currents of pernicious error, headed in the same vicinity, have ever been flowing, under the guidance of adventitious circumstances, in opposite directions; some towards the German Sea of Universal Scepticism; others towards the Italian Gulph of Universal Superstition; both meeting at last in a common war against the truth, for the shipwreck of the Gospel. Thus it is, that according as circumstances have operated to give the one direction or the other to error, the doctrine of merit, whether by the inherent grace or the external work of righteousness, has appeared under such opposite forms; sometimes the shape of a dead and ice-bound Rationalism; at other times, in the monastic garb and fervent zeal of a solemn mysticism; now proceeding towards the rejection of all Mediation and Atonement, and to a proud dependence on its own foundation for peace with God; now tending to the multiplication of atonements and mediators, in voluntary penances and additional observances and prayers for saints; one while setting at nought all external things in the worship of God, as cardinal ordinances, fit only for the infancy of religion, and caring for nothing but a certain mystic in-dwelling of God, for reconciliation, as well as holiness; at another time rejecting all inward and spiritual grace, as enthusiasm, and resting in outward forms and observances as the fulfilment of all righteousness. Now, as ever, among all classes of Christians, is this essential spirit of Romanism—self-righteousness—the popery of the unconverted heart, the last enemy to be vanquished in bringing a sinner to accept the grace of God in Christ; the last plague to disturb the peace of the true disciples, and hinder his progress in holiness.

Suppose not that there is not very much of the operative spirit of popery among all communities and under all names of Protestants. No confessions of faith, no terms of communion; no tests of discipleship, can fence it out. The old soil of its birth remains. Satan can cast his devices over all our barriers. What if we go not to auricular confession; nor trust in a Priest's absolution; nor bow down to graven images; nor pray to angels and the virgin and all departed saints; nor draw upon a treasury of superfluous merits of the faithful, committed to the keys of the successor of St. Peter, for the supply of the deficiencies of the living and the dead? All these we may hate, as marks of anti-Christ. Purgatory, and transubstantiation, and Papal infallibility, and Romish claims of exclusive Catholicity, may kindle us into strong aversion at the bare naming of their names. But can there be no plague-spot of popery, where these are rejected? no poisonous fountain till it run over in all these streams? no head and heart of anti-Christ, without these its limbs? Yes, the very soul of Popery—that which alone hath "power to give life unto the image of the beast," and which alone does give value to its indulgences, and room to its purgatory, and need to its sacrament of penance, and motive to the employment of its numberless intercessors; that, into which all the rest of popery has struck its roots, and without which it could not possibly have subsisted,—inherent righteousness and human merit as having any—the least part in the justification of a sinner before God,—this may be in us; and this is the soul of Popery; and however alone it should be, at its first appearance among us, would need but a generation or two to do its work, and you should see it displaying its legitimate offspring under all the forms of a manifest Romanism; the names, perhaps, new; the shrines, protestant; the whole externalism, presented in a corrected edition; but from the same cause, the same substantial effects proceeding; genuine popery, though disguised, peradventure, as an angel of light. The grand security, under God, of any Church, against corruptions essentially the same as those of Romanism, is its being thoroughly indoctrinated and animated with the blessed truth that "we are accounted righteous before God, only for the merit of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ, by faith, and not for our own works or deservings." Let this once be substituted for the doctrine of the Church of Rome, and how soon would the whole "maze in which she leads her followers" be disentangled! the whole babel confounded! This it was that did the glorious work in the sixteenth century, forasmuch as it spake to the conscience reached the heart, "liberty to the captive, and the opening of the prison doors to them that were bound."

From the United Secession Magazine.

ON PUBLIC PRAYER.

Of all the ordinances of divine appointment, none is of more importance than that of public prayer. One of the most endearing titles of Jehovah is "the hearer of prayer," and the place where his people meet to worship, is emphatically styled "the house of prayer."

Yet, while the importance of the ordinance will be readily admitted, much misapprehension prevails regarding the proper manner of attending to it. Many seem to suppose that its performance may be left wholly to the minister; and, provided he is rightly employed, it matters little how the people are occupied in the mean time. But surely, a little consideration might show the fallacy of such an idea.

It ought to be remembered, that the very nature of social worship, implies that all present should take a part in it. In the act of assembling together for this purpose, therefore, Christians virtually profess to unite in the devotional services. Public prayer is a means of grace which they are required to employ for their own improvement, and for obtaining blessings for themselves and others.

When we speak of the prayers of a church, we must mean the united prayers of the individual members of it, when met in their church capacity.

It is not more correct to say, that the prayers presented from the pulpit by the minister alone, are the prayers of the church, than it would be to say that a church celebrated the ordinance of the Lord's Supper, if none but the minister partook of the elements. He is the mouth of the people, as it were to the Lord; but it is their duty to appropriate his language to themselves, and use it as if it were their own.

It is true, it would be highly improper, indeed quite impracticable, for a number of people all at once to give audible utterance to their prayers. But, although they may not outwardly express them, they ought to adopt the sentiments, and inwardly to exercise adoration, thanksgiving, confession and desire; while they may not pray with the voice, it is their duty to do it with the heart. It is not the act of the bodily members, but the proper feeling of the mind, that constitutes the chief part of acceptable worship.

Now, if it is the duty of all to engage in this manner in the performance of public prayer, what must we think of the practice of many professed Christians?

I do not see how we can avoid the conclusion, that some congregations, as such, do not pray at all. Let any one who doubts this, cast his eye over one of our worshipping assemblies, during the service and judge for himself. A few here and there he may see, whose attitude and manner betoken that their hearts are in the work; while many more exhibit the most listless indifference, or have their attention attracted by every trifle that meets their observation.

We wonder and lament that amid all our exertions, religion appears so languid among ourselves, and makes so little progress throughout the earth; but may not the language of the apostle furnish us with a solution? "We have not, because we ask not." We talk with complacency of the pecuniary efforts that are made for the extension of the gospel, while we are apt to overlook that which is more efficacious than the wealth of kingdoms. When I speak of the efficacy of human agency, I have not forgotten that the conversion of sinners, and their subsequent sanctification, are the work of Divine power; but I also remember, that in the kingdom of grace, as in that of providence, God usually forwards his designs by the instrumentality of means, the right employment of which he has entrusted to us.

Accordingly, in Scripture, the success of prayer in obtaining desired blessings, is frequently mentioned. In the apostolic times, when the gospel made such rapid progress, we find, among the means employed by the early believers, that this ordinance occupied a prominent place. The disciples "continued with one accord in supplication and prayer." It may be noticed, too, that many of the injunctions to this duty, in the New Testament are addressed to the churches, and seem particularly to refer to it in their associated capacity. If, therefore, we would aim at great success, we must, along with all our efforts, individually and collectively, "continue instant in prayer." Truly, "the children of the world are wiser than the children of light." The mechanician, guided by certain known principles, lays down his plan, prepares his materials, and by persevering exertion, confidently reckons on the attainment of his wishes; and the result realizes his expectations. The husbandman prepares the soil, throws in the seed, and anticipates in due time the reward of his labor; and he is not disappointed. But Christians, although fully assured that the means confided to them are adequate for procuring the most important and valuable of all benefits, proceed with doubting hesitation; they sow sparingly, and reap also sparingly.

"Ask, and ye shall receive; seek, and ye shall find; knock, and it shall be opened unto you." If the effectual, fervent prayer of one righteous man avails much, might we not hope for an incalculable amount of good, from the united, fervent prayers of many such men? When we see professed believers standing forth in their proper position as a separate people, followers of their Divine leader, when in all our worshipping assemblies they join together as members of the same body, in ardent, persevering supplications, passing onward, as it were, with holy resolution towards victory, yet trusting not in their own strength, but in the grace of the Omnipotent; then may we with joyful confidence look up, for the days of millennial glory will be drawing nigh.

THE CHRISTIAN'S SUFFERINGS.

Every man looks fair in a time of prosperity; but the main trial of the Christian is in suffering. Any man may steer in a good gale and clear sea; but the mariner's skill will be seen in a tempest.

Herein the Christian goes beyond all other men. "We rejoice in tribulation," said the blessed apostle. Here is a point transcending all the affectation of heathenism. Perhaps some resolute spirit, whether from natural fortitude, or an ambition of fame or earthly glory, may set a face upon patient enduring of loss or pain; but never any of those heroic Gentiles durst pretend to joy in suffering. Hither can Christian courage reach; knowing "that tribulation worketh patience, and patience experience, and experience hope, and hope maketh not ashamed."

Is he bereaved of his goods and worldly estate?—He comforts himself in the assurance of a better treasure that can never be lost. Is he afflicted with sickness? His comfort is, that the inward man is so much the more renewed daily, as the outward man perisheth. Is he slandered and unjustly disgraced? His comfort is, that there is a blessing which will more than make him amends. Is he banished? He knows that he is on the way homeward. Is he imprisoned? His spirit cannot be locked in.—God and his angels cannot be locked out. Is he dying? To him to live is Christ, and to die is gain. Is he dead? He rests from his labors and is crowned with glory.—Shortly, he is perfect gold, that comes more pure out of the fire than it went in; neither had he been so great a saint in heaven, if he had not passed through the flames of trial here on earth.—Bishop Hall.

FOR THE LADIES.

From the Young Ladies' Guide.

WHAT CAN ONE DO?

The amazing influence of one Christian, who lives out the spirit of Christ, is illustrated in a striking manner, in the life of a lady who died not long since, in one of the principal cities in the United States. I am not permitted to give her name, nor all the particulars of her life. But what I relate may be relied upon, not only as facts, but as far below the whole truth. She had been, for a long time, afflicted with a drunken husband. At length the sheriff came and swept off all their property, not excepting her household furniture, to discharge his grog bills. At this distressing crisis, she retired to an upper room, laid her babe on the bare floor, kneeled down over it, and offered the following petition: "O Lord, if thou wilt in any way remove from me this affliction, I will serve thee upon bread and water all the days of my life." The Lord took her at her word. Her besotted husband immediately disappeared, and was never heard of again till after her death. The church would now have maintained her but she would not consent to become a charge to others. Although in feeble health, and afflicted with the sick head-ache, she opened a small school, from which she obtained a bare subsistence; though it was often no more than what was contained in the condition of her prayer—litterally bread and water. She had also another motive for pursuing some regular employment. She wished to avoid the reproach which would have arisen to the cause of Christ, from her being maintained upon the bounty of the church, while engaged in the system of Christian activity which she adopted. She remembered the duty of being diligent in business, as well as fervent in spirit. She was a lady of pleasing address, and of a mild and gentle disposition. "In her lips was the law of kindness." Yet she possessed an energy of character and a spirit of perseverance, which the power of faith alone can impart. When she undertook any Christian enterprize, she was discouraged by no obstacles, and appalled by no difficulties. She resided in the most wicked and abandoned part of the city, which afforded a great field for labor.—Her benevolent heart was pained at seeing the grog-shops open upon the holy Sabbath. She undertook the difficult and almost hopeless task of closing these sinks of moral pollution upon the Lord's day, and succeeded. This was accomplished by the mild influence of persuasion, flowing from the lips of kindness, and clothed with that power which always accompanies the true spirit of the gospel. But she was not satisfied with seeing the front doors and windows of these moral pest-houses closed. She knew that little confidence could be placed in the promises of men whose consciences would permit them to traffic in human blood. She would, therefore, upon the morning of the Sabbath, pass round, and enter these shops through the dwellings occupied by the families of the keepers, where she often found them engaged secretly in this wickedness. She would then remonstrate with them, until she persuaded them to abandon it, and attend public worship. In this manner she abolished, almost entirely, the sale of liquors upon the Sabbath, in the worst part of the city.

She also looked to the poor, that the gospel might be preached to them. She carried with her the numbers of those pews in the church, which were unoccupied, and, upon Sabbath mornings, she made it her business to go out into the streets and lanes of the city, and persuade the poor to come in and fill up the vacant seats. By her perseverance and energy, she would remove every objection, until she had brought them to the house of God. She was incessant and untiring in every effort for doing good. She would establish a Sabbath school and superintend it until she saw it flourishing, and then deliver it into the hands of some suitable person, and go and establish another. She collected together a Bible class of apprentices which she taught, herself. Her pastor one day visited it, and found half of them in tears, under deep conviction. She was faithful to the church and to impenitent sinners. If she saw any member of the church going astray, she would, in a kind, meek, and gentle spirit, yet in a faithful manner reprove him. She was the first to discover any signs of declension in the church, and to sound the alarm personally to every conscience. It was her habitual practice to reprove sin, and to warn sinners wherever she found them. At the time of her death, she had under her care a number of young men preparing for the ministry. These she had looked after and brought out of obscurity. As soon as their piety had been sufficiently tested, she would bring them to the notice of her Christian friends. She persuaded pious teachers to give them gratuitous instruction and pious book-sellers to supply them with books. In the same way she procured their board in the families of wealthy Christians. And she formed little societies of ladies, to supply them with clothing. There was probably no person in the city whose death would have occasioned the shedding of more tears, or called forth more sincere and heartfelt grief. Her memory is still deeply cherished in the heart of her pastor. He has been heard to say, that he should not have felt as severely the loss of six of the most devoted men in his chruch.

Now, what hinders you to "go and do likewise?" It is amazing to see what has been accomplished by a single individual, by earnest effort and untiring perseverance, accompanied with a simple and hearty dependence upon God. If the individual members of the church would do what they can, what a tremendous shock would be felt in Satan's kingdom! What a glorious triumph would await the church! Therefore, "whatsoever thy hand findeth to do, do it with thy might; for there is no work, nor device, nor knowledge, nor wisdom, in the grave whither thou goest."

In our active efforts, several cautions should be observed: 1. Avoid every appearance of ostentation. Suppress every rising of self-complacency, on account of what you do, and of the success which attends your efforts. Such feelings are abominable in the sight of God; and if indulged, will make you appear contemptible in the eyes of men. The Pharisees were active in many religious duties. They made long prayers, and were so particular in outward things, as to pay tithes of the most common herbs. They also gave to the poor. But all this they might have praise of men. They chose public places to pray; and when they were about to give any thing to the poor, they caused a trumpet to be sounded before them, to give notice of their approach. All this was done to feed the pride of the carnal heart; and, notwithstanding their loud professions, and apparent good deeds, the heaviest curses the Lord Jesus ever pronounced, were directed against them. Be modest, unobtrusive, and courteous in all you do and say. Let the love of Jesus animate your heart, and the glory of God be your object. Make as little noise as possible in every thing you do. Never speak of what you have done, unless you see that some good can be accomplished by it. "When thou doest thine alms, let not thy left hand know what thy right hand doeth." Keep yourself out of view, and give all the glory of your success to God.

2. Great prudence and discretion are necessary in every thing.—Do nothing rashly. When you have any enterprize in view, first sit down and consider the matter seriously. Pray over it. Look at it in all its bearings, and inquire what good will be likely to result from it. When you have satisfied yourself on this point, inquire whether you have reasonable ground to hope for success. Then summon all your wisdom to contrive a judicious plan of operations.—When this is done, proceed with energy and perseverance, till you have either accomplished your object, or become convinced that it is impracticable. Pay especial regard to the feelings and advice of those who act with you. Keep as much in the back ground as you can without embarrassing your efforts; and whenever you can do it, put others forward to execute the plans you have devised. This will save you from becoming the object of jealousy, and also serve to mortify your pride.

3. Be resolute and persevering.—When satisfied you are in the way of duty, do not be moved by the scoffs and sneers of the giddy multitude. If some good people disapprove your conduct, thinking that you attempt too much, let it lead you to a candid and impartial re-examination of your course. If by this you become convinced that you are wrong, in the particular matter in question, confess it, and change your conduct. But, if this review of the affair confirm you in the opinion that your course is right, pursue it with decision and firmness.—There are some well-meaning people with limited views, and excessive carefulness, who disapprove the best of measures, if they happen to be at variance with their long established custom; or, more frequently, if they were not consulted before the particular enterprize was undertaken.

4. BE MUCH IN PRAYER.—Upon this will greatly depend your success in all things. Feel that of yourself you can do nothing; but, that you can do all things through Christ strengthening you. Before undertaking any thing, pray that God would give you wisdom to direct, and strength to perform; and if it is any thing in which the efforts of others will be required, pray that he may incline their hearts to engage in the work. Before you go out on an errand of mercy, first visit your closet, and commit yourself to the direction of the Lord, pray that he would give you wisdom, courage, and discretion; and that he would keep down the pride of your heart, and enable you to do all things for his glory.

The lives of most are misspent for want of a certain end of their actions: wherein they do, as unwise archers, shoot away their arrows they know not at what mark. They live only out of the present, not directing themselves and their proceedings to one universal scope: whence they alter upon every change of occasions and never reach any perfection: neither can they do otherwise but continue in uncertainty and end in discomfort. Others aim at one certain mark, but a wrong one.

Those vices of all others are the most ensnaring which most resemble virtues; I pray you avoid them!

AMERICAN BOARD.

The thirty-first anniversary of this Board was held in Providence on the 11th ult. The Treasurers Report, shows the receipt of $241,619 04, being, $2,378 less than the preceding year. The expenditures are $246,601 37.

During the year six missionaries have died; 21 dismissed from various causes; 27 new ones appointed; 2 sent out to Turkey; 7 to Syria; 2 to the Nestorians; 1 to South Turkey; 1 to the Sandwich Islands; and 6 to the Indians. There are 25 missions under the control of the Board, embracing 80 stations at which there are 134 ordained missionaries, 10 of whom are physicians; 10 other physicians; 14 teachers; 10 printers; 10 other male, and 186 female assistant missionaries; making in all 365 missionaries from this country. Beside these, there are 15 native preachers, 107 other native helpers. There are 15 printing establishments belonging to the board, with 32 presses and 5 type-foundries. There are 24 boarding schools, 415 free schools, affording gratuitous instruction to more than 20,000 children. The number of books and tracts printed during the year, is 685,000 copies, containing 40 millions of pages, making 250 millions of pages since the commencement of missionary operations. The missions are generally in a prosperous condition, some of them extraordinarily so. In the years 1838, and '9, 51,698 were added to the churches on the Sandwich Islands.

A memorial was presented, signed by several members of the Board, relative to the reception of contributions from slaveholders. The following reasons were urged against receiving aid from such a source:

1. Slaves have been declared by the ecclesiastical bodies of S. Carolina and other states, to be virtually heathen. Consistency would therefore forbid the co-operation of those who keep in ignorance and sin, our native heathen.

2. Such a prohibition should be made to shield from temptation to wrong, those who are engaged in collecting funds.

3. Receiving contributions of slave-holding churches, has a tendency to perpetuate slavery.

4. The Board could not expect the smiles of God, while it derives its means from polluted sources. The wrong thus received, is the price of tears, of blood, heaviness of heart, oppression, and is the fruit of a system that presents more points of contrast and opposition to the Gospel, than any other sin. The committee to whom the memorial was referred, reported that so much practical difficulty would be experienced in the attempt to carry out the suggestions of the memorialists, that the Board cannot properly act upon them.

The importance of systematic and steady contribution was presented to the consideration of the Board. It was confidently believed that this would, with more certainty, secure $300,000 annually, and a constant increase, than one half that amount under the present system of collection.

Would not a systematic contribution by all the members of our churches soon relieve our Boards from embarrassment, and secure the services of efficient Missionaries, at home and abroad? Try and see.

UNION.

An effort has been made by the Free-Will and Free-Communion Baptists, to effect a union between the two denominations.—This effort is likely to prove successful. A committee appointed by the Free-Will Baptist General Conference, met with the Free-Communion Baptist General Conference, held at Columbia, Herkimer Co., to consider the matter. After duly considering the reasons for and against the union, the following preamble and resolution were passed with but one dissenting voice:

"Whereas several Yearly Meetings have sent up to this Conference, a request for the union of the connection represented by this Conference, in one denomination with the Free-Will Baptist connection; and whereas, on prayerful and mature deliberation on this subject, we are convinced that the interests of our common Zion would be promoted by such a union; therefore,

Resolved, That this Conference comply, so far as its authority and influence extend, with the request of said Yearly Meetings; recommending to our Yearly Meetings, Quarterly Meetings and churches, an immediate union with the Free-Will Baptist connection in one denomination; and that the churches, through their Quarterly and Yearly Meetings, forward to the next General Conference, their determination for, or against the proposed union."

The sentiments and usages of the two denominations are nearly, or quite the same. A union of the two will doubtless be of service to both. It certainly must have a happy influence for the cause of Christ. Every advancement towards the perfect union of Christians, will be joyfully hailed by all the lovers of truth. It affords pleasing anticipations of the time when all the professed followers of the Lamb shall be perfectly joined together; when there shall be one Lord, one faith, one baptism, and one church. Such a union as this we wish to see. But a union, with its endless lists of non-essentials—its sacrifices of revealed duties and conscientious scruples,—a union of discordant sentiments and feelings, we wish never to see in the church of Christ. A small church, pure in the sight of God, zealously affected for the whole truth, is more precious in the eyes of the Lord, and exerts a happier influence in the world, than a large, impure, and discordant one.

PRAYER.

There can not be a more solemn and sacred exercise than prayer. In this exercise, a mortal converses with an immortal God. He is brought into the presence of the Searcher of hearts, who knows perfectly the emotions of the mind, as well as the motives that influence the conduct. It is impossible to deceive God with well-set words or sanctimonious appearances. If any act should fill the soul with reverence and holy awe, it is this. If a man should be serious and honest any where, it should be at the Throne of Grace. It is no place there to ape humility or seek praise. It is no place to defame one or laud another. It is no place to plead sectarian views or give utterance to selfish feeling. Christians, how many of your prayers have you uttered, simple, honest, and from a devout heart, to God? How many times have you prayed to be heard of men? It is difficult to conceive of a more heinous and inexcusable sin than this. How must God look upon those who treat him with such base contempt, as those do, who, under the appearance of a sacred religious exercise, forget in whose presence they are, and defame some and laud others in their prayers.

It will be seen by our foreign intelligence that European affairs wear a warlike aspect. Should war be the result, it will involve nearly all Europe in the contest. We trust, however, that the result will be pacificatory. But little can be gained by such a war, while much would be lost.

ST. PAUL'S BOOKS AND PARCHMENTS.

Since I wrote about St. Paul's cloke, I have been thinking about his books and parchments.

He says to Timothy, (ii. Tim. iv: 13.) "The cloak which I left at Troas with Carpus, when thou comest, bring with thee, and the books, but especially the parchments."

The books and parchments contained some written notes, memoranda, or records, which the apostle highly valued. Dr. Scott remarks, "What books and parchments were meant, Timothy would know; but it is in vain for us to conjecture." I notice also that this same able commentator suggests, that "these directions favor the opinion, that the apostle had been hurried away by his persecutors, from those eastern regions; without being allowed leisure, either to accomplish his plans, or to take with him those things which he intended."

From Paul's direction about the books and parchments, we may learn:—

1. A lesson of economy.

Paul would not only take care of the little property which he had in clothing, but he would also secure the records which were his. "Gather up the fragments, that nothing be lost."

2. Paul did not make his great acquirements an excuse for relinquishing his studious habits. He was a learned man, but he would study more.

3. Paul was studious in his advanced life. The time of his departure was at hand, but he would not abandon his studies.

4. He was studious not only in old age, but also in very trying circumstances.

He was a prisoner at Rome; he had reason to expect death by the hand of cruel persecutors. But even thus circumstanced, he would study.

5. We see that his being divinely inspired to write and to preach, did not furnish any reason why he should neglect to study.

6. We see that Paul's direction to Timothy, "Give attendance to reading," was most powerfully enforced by his own example.

If Paul, learned, aged, and inspired, was so ardently attached to his books, surely young Timothy must be aroused to give increased attention to reading.

7. We who are now in the ministry may learn, that it is our duty to improve all the facilities which are afforded us for the prosecution of our studies. In the days of Paul and Timothy, the art of printing was not known. That art spreads before us books of great variety, and vast in number, ancient and modern, from which we may make a judicious selection. The laity may feel grieved if I apply all my inferences for the special benefit of the ministry, therefore I infer in conclusion—

8. That laymen should appreciate the results of the laborious studies of ministers; should not make such demands on their time as to leave them no opportunity for study; should so minister to their temporal wants, that they, being 'free from worldly cares and avocations,' may enjoy a state of mind conducive to studious habits, and may secure proper time to devote to study—being able without embarrassing themselves, to procure such books as they need. Then, if they are men of prayer, their profiting will appear unto all.

INTELLIGENCE.

FOREIGN.

From the N. Y. Evening Post.

ARRIVAL OF THE GREAT WESTERN.

Yesterday about two o'clock, P. M., the steamship Great Western came into port, bringing Bristol papers of the 12th inst., and London and Liverpool dates of the day previous. An overland mail from India, had brought a mass of intelligence relating to the condition of affairs in China, from which we make such extracts as will put our readers in possession of the present state of the question between England and China. It will be seen that the British fleet by this time is before Canton and that hostilities have probably commenced.

The eastern question is still the great topic of controversy. A messenger who arrived at Dover, September 9th, had with him despatches from the foreign office, giving an account of the ratification of the treaty of the four Powers by the Ottoman Porte. The French manifesto reached Constantinople on the 19th of Aug., and was delivered the next day to the Divan. It begins by declaring that it considers the Porte has offered an insult to the King and French nation, by entering into any convention with other powers, without the consent and concurrence of France; that if the Porte ratifies the convention, France declares herself its enemy, that she will assist the Pasha by all the means in her power, and oppose those who may be inclined to aid the Porte; that she will encourage the provinces of Asia Minor and Anatolia to rise against the Sultan, and that as soon as she receives the answers from Vienna and Berlin to propositions sent to these powers, she will carry her threats into execution.

At the latest advices from Paris, it was believed that Mehemet Ali would positively resist—that consequently the French government would feel itself bound to support him, and that the ministers were actually deliberating on the means to be resorted to with that view. In consequence, the 3 per. cents fell to 73,60, the 5 per. cents to 106, and Spanish to 23 3-4; Neapolitan to 96 50.

Warlike preparations were making on a large scale at the dock yards in England. Napier's machine in Woolwich dock yard, for making balls by compression, was ordered to be worked by steam. Great progress had been made in casting cannon.

The Augsburg Gazette states that letters from St. Petersburg announce that the Russian Admiralty had sent an order to Cronstadt to despatch eighteen ships of war forthwith to the Mediterranean. When they arrive the combined fleet under the command of Sir Robert Stopford, will be composed of forty-eight ships, of which twenty two will be English, eighteen Russian, four Austrian, and four Turkish. It is moreover understood that four more English three deckers, are ordered to reinforce the British squadron in the Levant.

Letters from Canstantinople of the 19th ult. state that M. Christides, the envoy of King Otho, had, on his reaching that capital, protested against the measures of reprisal enforced by the Ottoman government against Greek subjects. On the 17th he ordered the royal arms to be removed from the front of his hotel, and retired to a private house on the bank of the sea of Marmora, threatening, in case the Divan should not accede to his demand in the course of forty-eight hours, to take his passports and return to Greece.

Several of the French journals continue to urge upon the ministry the necessity of a war with England. Among the more recent of the pamphlets that have made their appearance in Paris is one dedicated to the English nation, and called "the Litany of every true Frenchman." The following is a specimen of its contents:

"By the massacre of Evreux, war with England.

By the battle of Poitiers, war with England.

By the treaty of Bretigny, war with England.

By the battle of Agincourt, war with England.

By the battle of Ramillies, war with England.

By the combat of Oudernarde, war with England.

By the affair of Malplaquet, war with England.

By the death of Louis XVI., war with England.

By the massacre of Quiberon, war with England.

By the fight of Aboukir, war with England.

By the battle of Trafalgar, war with England.

By the assassination of Kleber, war with England.

By the Pontoons of Cadiz, war with England.

By the invasion of 1814, war with England.

By Waterloo, war with England.

By the tortures and death of Napoleon, war with England.

By the outrage of the 15th July, 1840, war with England."

The following letter from our correspondent, dated Paris, Sept. 9th, gives the latest and most interesting intelligence on various public matters.

Paris, 9th Sept. 1840.

The working classes of this city have, during the last week, attracted very general and anxious attention—to such a degree indeed, that their attitude as reported by 'fame and her hundred tongues,' caused almost as much apprehension as political anticipations from abroad. Each successive day announced some new trade in coalition; and it became necessary to display a military force, sufficiently imposing to disperse the groups collected in every part. However, with one fatal exception, nothing serious has occurred. Workmen engaged in the strike went round to all the establishments in their line, calling on their brethren to quit their employ. In some cases, the summons was disregarded; and in a manufactory at the extremity of the Faubourg St. Antoine, a body of nearly 600 men attempted to force away those who were industriously inclined. Three police men endeavoring to defend the entrance, were seriously wounded: one is dead and the others were not expected to recover. A company of municipal guards was summoned from a neighboring post, but before their arrival the unfortunate police men had been stabbed and trodden under foot. Numerous arrests took place immediately, and in the evening and following day great hopes were entertained that the affair was over, but on Monday, 7th, soon after the opening of the Bourse, the drums beat to arms in every quarter—large bodies of troops of the line and cavalry took position in all the leading avenues—the military encamped at Fontainebleau came down the river in steamboats, and national guards were seen hurrying to the head quarters of their respective legions. Many shops were closed in consequence, and the money market already depressed with news from the Levant, was completely panic struck—the Rentes fell three francs. Rumor stated the Faubourg St. Antoine was in arms and barricaded. Those individuals, however, whose curiosity or anxiety led them in that direction, found as they approached the supposed scene of tumult, that the inhabitants were less alarmed than those of distant parts.—An omnibus had, in fact, been overturned in the morning, but it was righted almost immediately; three other attempts were made in the neighboring streets; and the presence of unemployed workmen, loitering about in groups, was magnified into an insurrection.

In the evening there was strong patrols on the Boulevards and in the chief streets, but without necessity as all was quiet.—Yesterday evening again there was a little disturbance in the Rue Mauconseil; but it was of no importance, and under other circumstances would not have been mentioned beyond its immediate vicinity.

It is ascertained that the late effervescence was not a spontaneous movement on the part of the workmen. Papers have been seized on the persons of individuals arrested, which give a clue to the instigators; distributions of money are proved; and a tavern near the Barriere Blanche is indicated as a rendezvous, where workmen of the coalition obtain refreshments on delivering tickets. Among others implicated as fomenters of the disturbance, is M. Audrey de Puyraceau, nephew of the deputy; he is in prison.

With the full expectation that some conspiracy was in activity, a strong excitement naturally attended the important intelligence announced by the Moniteur the same day. A letter from Alexandria stated that the English commodore Napier had summoned the Egyptian authorities to evacuate Syria; and it was added on the faith of private letters, that the message was followed up by the seizure of some Egyptian vessels, laden with provisions and amunition for the Pacha's troops. The state of affairs is becoming daily more and more complicated. M. Thiers finds fresh difficulties gathered around him, and he is now loudly called upon to convoke the Chambers. That of course would be the best method to be adopted, if his acts were in unison with public feeling, or circumstances permitted him to explain his negotiations without reserve; but entangled as he is with secret engagements, the interpellations of the tribune would only add to his embarrassments. It is evident that the ebullition of party feeling, to which the debates might lead, would render it almost impossible to avoid a collission between France and England.

Private letters from Alexandria, dated 26th August, still preserve a hope that Mehemet Ali will yield rather than risk his pachalick; but other accounts of the same date state that he is as obstinate as ever.—The possession of Constantinople by the Russians is commented upon as certain by the opponents of the late treaty, who forgot that the Turkish capital was occupied by Russians in 1833. Politics are now argued by Frenchmen with such acrimony, that they form conclusions without defining the subject in debate; nothing is therefore more common than to find them abound in violent invective about spoliation, &c., altogether laying aside the real object of the treaty, which is to assist an [illegible] in reducing a revolted functionary. The office of Pacha is revocable at the Sultan's pleasure; but as events have crippled his authority he solicits foreign aid. Strong mutual jealousy among the European powers has rendered it necessary that the alliance should be so extensive as to prevent any one from taking advantage of the occasion—hence the treaty of London concluded in July.

France being exhausted in establishing the complete independence of Egypt keeps aloof; still the representations of her ambassador have assured for Mehemet Ali, the office on certain conditions, previous to the adoption of coercive measures; and the terms agreed upon, have so far obtained the acquiescence of the French government, that notwithstanding the blustering which followed the first announcement of the treaty, there is not, neither is there likely to arise a casus belli.

But unfortunately the French nation is not identified with its government, and the public mind is inflamed by repeated allusions to bygone events; even the defeats sustained at Crecy, Poictiers and Agincourt are commented on as grievances and reasons of hostility to England. Affairs are now in such a position, that the dismissal of M. Thiers is impossible at present; but unless the treaty is executed before the meeting of the Chambers, a new phase may arise, the consequences of which cannot be foretold. The Doctrinaires will most probably appear in formidable array against the present cabinet—the radicals will insist on some demonstration to cover the national dignity, and Louis Phillip may be induced to consider war itself, as a preferable alternative to the risk of internal commotion.

The principal weapon on which the French rely for aiding their cause, is the propogande, or dissemination of democratic principles. The situation of Poland and Italy is notorious; and deserters from Russia frequently cross the northern frontier of France. Last week a squadron of Prussian lancers arrived at Thiouville with arms and baggage. This tendency to amalgamation must damp the ardor of the King of Prussia for a conflict; but at the same time the allied sovereigns are aware that Louis Phillip is no less averse than themselves to raise a commotion, which will necessarily change the entire map of Europe.

Our money market is weakened by the recent fluctuations in the funds. One agent de change has failed—others have required assistance. Small sales for money create an immediate depression, and news however absurd has an effect for a time.

The next advices from the Mediterranean are anxiously looked for. Another disturbance has taken place in Madrid—and letters from Algiers announce coming events in that colony.

Exciting Incident.—We saw a letter, within a few days, written by a young lady, who, not many weeks since, was journeying from this place to the West. It narrates a very exciting occurrence which took place on board the steamboat in which she was a passenger,—and of which she was an eye witness. In passing down the Mississippi river, our narrator was summoned from the cabin by alarming shrieks and great commotion upon deck. On going up, she found that a young lady had fallen overboard, and the boat in its progress was fast leaving her behind. A gentleman on board, immediately divested himself of part of his clothing, and sprang into the river. He reached the drowning person, and upheld her in the water until a small boat came to the rescue of both. The young lady, thus snatched from a sudden death, was the daughter of an elderly gentleman on board the boat,—foreigners, neither of whom could speak English. On reaching the deck and recovering from fright, she passionately embraced her deliverer & bestowed kiss after kiss upon him, as the only way she could express her gratitude and thankfulness; while the father, rushing from the cabin, eagerly proffered him a roll of bank bills. These being refused, he ran to his cabin and returned with a bag of gold, which he likewise pressed upon his acceptance; nor could either father or daughter be made to understand or feel satisfied, why the proffered reward would not be accepted.—Salem Observer.

Religion in an Army.—An officer of the British army, Major Armstrong, when not engaged in other duties has been in the habit of holding prayer-meetings and giving exhortations, for the benefit of the regiment he is connected with; he has also been in the habit of preaching publicly, and with great acceptance as opportunity offered, and is regarded as a holy man, and an excellent officer. He has enlisted three hundred men in the cause of temperance; and while commanding the regiment for a year, he had not occasion to flog a single soldier, but maintained a perfect discipline among them. Even the colonel declares he is the best officer in the regiment. And yet his religious zeal is deemed a disgrace to the army, and he is forbidden to preach or to hold religious meetings any where or any time! The intoxication, profanity and licentiousness of the officers of the army can be overlooked—theatres, races, and a hundred other follies may be patronised by them, and no reproof be administered to them; but if an officer endeavor to benefit the morals and souls of men, if he addresses a Sabbath School, holds a prayer-meeting, or discourses to his fellow-men on death, judgment, and eternity—it is disgraceful! it may not be tolerated! such is the religion of the British army.

Destructive Storm.—The Rome (Oneida county,) Sentinel gives a distressing account of damage done in that section of the country, by lightning, on the evening of Monday, the 14th ult.

One barn in Westmoreland, having in it about 30 tons of hay, owned by Mr. Spriggs.

A cow, owned by R. Gypson, in the same town, was killed.

A cow, owned by T. Allison, and three hogs, belonging to Col. Williams, of Rome, were all killed.

One barn, owned by Mr. Goodrich.

Two barns and shed, filled with hay, together with a wagon and harness, the property of William Sexton, of Lee. Loss estimated at nearly $1000; $250 insurance in the Saratoga Company.

Nine calves on the farm of Widow Converse, in Lee, were killed.

One barn in Marcy, well stored. One barn was stuck by lightning and fired, but by great exertion was saved.

One barn, near Constableville, full of hay and grain.

One barn in West Leyden.

One barn, in Williamstown, full and valuable, owned by David Rowell.

We have heard of several other fires, from the same cause on the same evening, but not sufficiently in detail to enable us to speak of them.

The Sentinel adds:—The dwelling house of Sebastian, of Lee, was also burnt on the afternoon of the same day. The origin of the fire we have not heard. Insurance in the Montgomery company between 2 and $300.

The Sleeping Phenomenon.—In consequence of its being reported that this unfortunate object of public curiosity was deceased, a friend of ours recently went to Deighton and made personal inquiries, and visited the house in which he still continues to vegetate. His name is Thomas Bradly, aged 22 years, and he has had two somniferous attacks previous to the present one. The first lasted but a few weeks, the second during a period of forty weeks! and the present sleep has now continued exactly fifty-two weeks yesterday (Friday.) He has had more nourishment administered to him within these last three months than previously, and his personal appearance seems improved. He has within the last mentioned period exhibited some scintillations of returning faculties, but has again relapsed. During his apparent approach to sensation, he is stated to have uttered some words; but so incoherently and indistinctly as to be unintelligible. He continues in the same posture as before, viz: reclining partly on his left side; with one leg straight and the other crossed over it at nearly a right angle from the knee. This uncommon object has baffled the skill of every medical gentleman who has as yet seen him. It is, however, the united opinion of the profession that if he returns to sensation, his existence will soon terminate.—Halifax (Eng.) Guardian.

Melancholy Accident and Loss of Life at Sea.—By the Arabian, Captain Bankier, arrived at Liverpool on the 5th September, from Launceston, New South Wales, we have the particulars of the following distressing accident which occurred at sea. She left Launceston in the latter end of April, and on the 13th of May, having been out a fortnight, she was about three hundred miles to the east of New Zealand, in lat. 48 south, long. 175 west. Just at break of day a sudden squall came on, and a tremendous sea swept over the ship, forcing in her bulwarks and carrying off the wheel, with the man at the helm, and the round-house on deck, in which the passengers and part of the crew slept. In one moment eleven human beings were swept into eternity! No arm could be stretched out to save them—no assistance, by any possibility, could be rendered. In an instant, in the twinkling of an eye, the whole were whelmed in the midst of the rolling billows, and nothing was heard but the hoarse roar of the remorseless waves as they swept past with their victims. Several others of the seamen had narrow escapes.

Of the passengers, Mrs. Younghusband and her three daughters, all young girls about six or seven years of age, and Mrs. Matthews and two children, were lost.—Mrs. Matthews had another child with her on board, an interesting, intelligent little boy about six years of age, who was providentially saved. The little fellow had been taken by one of the sailors into his berth, and thus escaped destruction. Mrs. Matthews was a widow lady, and was on her return to her friends in England. Her husband who was a coach builder in Launceston, died suddenly a short time before. All now left of the family is the poor little boy. Mrs. Younghusband and her three daughters were also on their return to their friends in this country.—friends they were doomed never more to see.

Brutal Murder at Dubuque.—The Galena Gazette of the 9th, gives an account of the brutal butchery of a negro man suspected of stealing. The victim was dragged from his house, tied to a post, and 300 lashes given him on his bare back. The poor creature was made to confess in such a manner as to contradict himself, which gave the fiends an opportunity to continue their merciless cruelties, until his back was literally flayed. After this the mob forced him to conduct them to a place where, in his endeavor to mitigate their cruelties, he had said the goods were concealed; but they not being found, thirty-nine additional lashes were laid on his fleshless back. He was then dragged up the stairs of his house, and another whipping laid upon his raw quivering back. They afterwards dragged him to a bluff, where he had said the goods were, and not finding them they continued their shocking cruelties until life was extinct, and the miserable and ill-fated creature was brought to his house a cold inanimate corpse with his back broken, and his ribs and sides all stove in! The humanity of the mob, after death had relieved their victim, may be inferred from the fact, that they brought him upon two poles to his house!

McLeod Caught.—The incendiary McLeod who was one of the murderous Canadian banditti that destroyed the CAROLINE and murdered part of her crew on the night of the 29th of December, 1837, was caught yesterday on the American side of Niagara falls, and conveyed in irons to the jail at Lockport.

This McLeod was formerly Sheriff of the Niagara District, U. C., and was one of the most violent persecutors of those who presumed to open their mouths against the tyranny that oppressed them. He, among several others who were known to be of the crew that destroyed the Caroline, was indicted at the Spring term of the Court of Niagara Co., in 1838.—Buffalo Republican of Saturday evening.

Officers, &c., of the British Queen.—1 captain, 3 mates, 1 gunner, 1 pilot, 2 quartermasters, 1 boatswain, 2 carpenters, 24 sailors. In engineer's room, 1 principal engineer, 6 second do., 12 coal trimmers, 4 boys, 1 lamp-lighter. Eating department, 1 head cook, 5 under do., 2 scullions, 1 baker and man, 1 confectioner, 1 butcher and man, 1 knife cleaner and man, 1 barber, 1 head steward, 6 saloon do., 4 bedroom do., (aft.) 8 pantry men, 1 cellar man, 2 storekeepers, 2 stewardesses, (aft,) 5 fore saloon stewards, 1 stewardess, 2 waiters, 4 mates and gunner boys, 1 surgeon—125 in all.

SUMMARY.

The proceeds of the Ladies' Bunker Hill Monument Fair, is twenty five thousand dollars. The Monument will now be completed.

Pittsburg.—The population of Pittsburg is estimated at 60,000. There are 20 places of worship, 100 schools, and 20 papers. The annual arrival and departure of steam boats, is 2,500. Amount of manufactures $12,000,000. Amount of freight on merchandise of non-resident owners $3,000,000.

A Swiss paper says that three men overcome by fatigue and cold, were frozen to death in August, in a place where the snow never melts.

Capt Wood of the ship L. C. Richmond, has discovered an inhabited Island in 15 deg. 39 min. S. Lat. 157 deg. 25 min. W. Long. He named it "Brinsmade's Island."

It is said trees on the coast of the Pacific, grow to the height of 300 feet, being 50 feet in circumference.

The amount received on the N. Y. State Canals, for the third week in September is, $74,367,53.

The small pox has desolated the city of Panama, S. America, the population having been reduced from 20,000 to less than one half.

A Cincinnati paper states, that four hundred miles of hogs were killed in that city the last year.

The body of Mrs. James Bates, one of the sufferers on board the Lexington, has been found at Smithtown L. I.

The steam boat Albany made the passage from New York to Albany, in 8 hours 33 minutes

Brooklyn contains 36,221 persons.

The owners of the steam ships British Queen and President have resolved not to include liquors hereafter in the price of passage.

Mr. Jaudon has brought 100,000 sovereigns in gold for the U. S. Bank. Several Banks have agreed to assist the Bank to the amount of upwards of $3,000,000 to enable it to resume specie payment.

The Boston Journal says, the brig Temperance, at this port, from Rotterdam, has on board 140 pipes of gin, and two chests of opium.

Eight children perished at Butrouth, in Bavaria, by setting fire to two contiguous buildings in which they were left by their parents.

Just Punishment.—At Brooklyn a day or two ago, a reprobate named Alfred Clark, was sentenced to hard work in the county jail for sixty days, for striking his mother, an offence for which he pleaded no better excuse than drunkenness.

Romantic Incident.—Major H. O. Watts, the husband of the Lady captured by the Camanches, at Limville, was not killed in the skirmish at the place. The person reported as killed and supposed to be him, was his brother Captain Watts. The Major was severely wounded, and in consequence was unable to protect his lady, who with a servant and little negro girl, was taken as far as the battle ground on Plumb Creek; where, after an ineffectual attempt made by the savages to take her life, she was recaptured, and probably ere this has been restored to the arms of her husband! It is pleasing to notice incidents like this beaming out through the clouds of misfortune.—Houston (Texas) Telegraph.

Melancholy.—A boat containing six boys was upset on Sunday, on the Schuykill, near Coates street wharf, and four of the six unfortunately drowned. The latest British papers tell of a similar accident, by which eleven youths perished.—Philad. Nat. Gazette.

Noble Act of Liberality.—We have seldom witnessed a sight which gave us more unfeigned pleasure than the one which came under our eyes yesterday, in Jefferson Avenue. We allude to the parting scene between an aged and pious couple, Mr. Mordecai Myers and lady, from distant Alabama, and several slaves whom they had journeyed with from a far southern home, and left among our Canadian neighbors,

"Free as the wind that blows."

The parting words of kind advice, and the sobs of the freedmen, at thus sundering the links which had so long bound them together, sunk deep into the hearts of every by-stander, and should elicit the warmest sympathies of the lovers of freedom, throughout the land.—Detroit Daily Adv.

NOTICES.

WANTED IMMEDIATELY, at this office, as an apprentice to the printing business, an active industrious lad, from 14 to 18 years of age, who can come well recommended.

A CARD.

The members of the Quæsitor Scientiæ Society of the De Ruyter Institute, take pleasure in acknowledging their indebtedness to Mr. F. W. Stillman, of New York, for a fine collection of marine productions. Among these are the Polypi Subiferi, a large and beautiful star-fish, and a shell of that wonderful tenant of the great deep, the Nautilus. All are adapted to fill the mind with wonder and astonishment, in contemplating how variously and how extensively the proofs of design are distributed throughout the works of God.

The De Ruyter Institute Quæsitor Scientiæ Society, will meet Fourth-day evening, 7th inst., at 6 o'clock.

A Lecture will be given by J. B. Wells on the subject of Daugereotype. Citizens are respectfully invited to attend.

TAKE NOTICE.

THE subscriber offers his Farm, on which he now resides, for sale, consisting of one hundred and fifty acres, one hundred of which is under improvement, and is considered by good judges as an excellent stock or dairy farm. A just proportion of the farm is suitable for ploughing, and has not been reduced by bad husbandry. The timber land is the best in the vicinity, having never been used for any purpose. There is on the premises the best of fencing materials, both wood and stone. The buildings consist of a two story dwelling house, nearly new, two barns, and two small hay barns, corn house, &c. There is a well of water in the shed a few feet from the kitchen door. There is about two hundred bearing apple trees, besides pears and plums.—Eighty of the apple trees are ingrafted, and are of the best quality of fruit for summer, fall or winter. The farm is well watered with a small brook and several never failing springs. It is situated in a good and peaceable neighborhood of wealthy farmers, one mile west of the local center of the town of Preston, Chenango county, N. Y. It lies on the west side of the road leading from Pharsalia to the village of Oxford, which is about 4 1-2 miles distant to the south east. The road leading from [illegible] village to Norwich, the county town, runs from west to east through the center of the farm. It is about six miles to Norwich. The farm is situated about eighty rods north of the Seventh-day Baptist meeting-house, and two miles west of the Congregational meeting-house, two and a half [illegible] of the Free-will Baptist & Universalist meeting-houses, and two and a half south west of the new Baptist meeting-house. The District School house adjoins the premises. For pleasantness of situation, religious, social and political privileges, we presume it cannot hardly be surpassed in the western country. One quarter or even one third of the purchase money may remain on bond and mortgage for years.

POETRY.

From the Christian Intelligencer.

TO MY SOUL.

Tell me my soul!—if thou dost know—
Where the pure springs of bliss do flow;
Or, Where Time's weary wanderer may
His thirst for rest, at least allay.

Is there no lone sequester'd spot
On earth, which yields some wild-wood cot—
Where woodbine's twine, and roses bloom,
And fragrant flow'rs shed their perfume?

Where rippling streams in bubbles play,
And mountain breezes flit the way;
Where songster-birds their voices raise
In notes of melody and praise?

Where pilgrim wanderers may dwell,
And nought but love their bosoms swell—
Where ev'ry pulse throbs high with joy,
And Time glides on without alloy?

Some quiet nook, some balmy glade,
Pencill'd by sunshine and by shade,
Where Man may rest in sweet repose,
Triumphant o'er Life's myriad woes?

Tell me my soul!—but hark—I hear
Thy warbling voice, wake soft and clear—
"Yes! 'tis thy soul now answers thee,
Pause ye, reflect, and list to me!

"The wild-wood cot is oft the throne
Where pride and envy reign alone—
Decay destroys the rose's bloom,
And wild winds sweep the flow'rs perfume.

"The mountain breezes moan and sigh,
The rippling streams sleep hush'd and dry—
The songster-birds withhold their strains,
And wing their way o'er distant plains.

"There is no rest for mortals here—
Earth is, at best, but lone and drear;
No nectar from its fountains flow—
Nor glittering rays in splendor glow.

"Man's shatter'd way-worn bark must glide
Along Life's stream, adown its tide;
Gazing with anxious glance on high,
For light and succor from the sky.

"'Tis there the springs of bliss do flow—
And there the gems of glory glow—
'Tis there the weary wand'rer will Find founts of joy for every ill.

"'Tis there that all his pangs will cease,
His spirit knows of nought but peace,
'Tis there Omnipotence will wield
O'er the redeem'd his sov'reign shield!"

EFGEES.

MISCELLANEOUS.

GEN. WASHINGTON'S ESCAPE.

When the American army was stationed at West Point, during the revolutionary war, the British head quarters were not many miles distant, on the Hudson; and each were waiting, like the figures on a chess board, for some favorable movement, to disconcert and thwart the operations of the other. Scouting parties would engage in frequent skirmishes; and wagons of provisions, ammunition and clothing, would fall into the power of those superior in number and address. On one of these occasions, a quantity of English uniform was seized by an American detachment; and several notable advantages obtained by the latter, inspired by the enemy with a desire to retaliate. About this time, while at West Point, General Washington had an intimate acquaintance, not far resident from the army, in whose family he enjoyed the kindest hospitality, as well as relief from many of those sterner engagements which harrassed his weary mind. As every circumstance was food to either army a visit like this not many miles from their camp, could not long escape the cognizance of the English; and to possess a prisoner like General Washington, would tend, in their opinion to shorten the period of the war. But the undertaking was difficult: there were always advanced guards to cover the American Commander, and there was no mode of discovering his visits, except by winning over some one of the family. The friend whom the General visited was once thought to have espoused the interests of the British; but he had taken a decided stand in favor of America, and though a brave man, he professed the strictest neutrality, alleging as his reason—his years, and dependent family.

During the intimacy of the General, it was rumored in the American army, that his friend had been seen often returning from the British camp. Washington seemed to disregard the account; for he never ceased to visit the family, and apparently, mingled as cordially with the host, as if no suspicion had crossed his mind. At length, one day, as the General was taking his leave, his friend earnestly requested him to dine with him the following afternoon, emphatically named the hour of two, as the moment of expecting him. He reminded him of the uncommon delight which his intimacy conferred—begged him to lay aside every formality, and regard his house as his home; and hinted that he feared the General did not consider it in that light; as the guard that always accompanied him seemed to indicate he was not visiting a friend. "By no means, dear sir!" exlaimed the worthy patriot; "there is no man I esteem more than yourself; and as a proof of the confidence which I repose in you, I will visit you alone tomorrow, and I pledge my sacred word of honor, that not a soldier shall accompany me" "Pardon me, General," cried the host, "but why so serious on so trifling a subject? I merely jested." "I am aware of it," said the hero, smiling, "but what of that? I have long considered the planting of these outposts unnecessary, inasmuch as they may excite the suspicion of the enemy; and although it be a trifle, that trifle shall not sport with the friendship you indulge for me." "But then—the hour, General?" "Oh, yes, two o'clock you said." "Precisely!" returned the other.

At one o'clock on the following day, the General mounted his favorite horse, and proceeded alone, upon a bye-road which conducted him to the hospitable mansion. It was about half an hour before the time, and the bustling host received him with open arms, in addition to the greetings of the delighted family. "How punctual kind sir!" exclaimed the warm hearted friend. "Punctuality," replied Washington, "is an angel virtue, embracing minor as well as important concern. He that is unpunctual with a friend, may doubt his integrity." The host started: but recovering himself, he added,—"then yours is a proof that we enjoy your fullest confidence." Whashington proposed a promenade upon the piazza, previous to the dinner. It overlooked a rough country several miles in extent; fields of grain, here and there sweeping beneath the sides of bleak hills producing nothing but rocks and grass—shallow runnels of water flowing along the hollows of the uneven waste—then hidden by woodlands intercepting a prospect of the country beyond—spotted now and then with silver glimpses of the Hudson, stealing through the sloping grounds below, and chequered on both sides by the dim, purple Highlands, frowning sometimes into hoary battlements, and tapering again into gentle valleys, hardly illuminated by the sun. "This is fine, bold sceney?" exclaimed the General, apparently absorbed in the beauty of the prospect. "Yes, sir," replied his friend looking wishfully around, as if expecting some one's approach; but catching the piercing glance of Washington, his eyes were fastened confusedly on the General; "do you perceive yonder point, that boldly rises from the water, and suddenly is lost behind that hill which obstinately checks the view?" "I do," replied the absent listener, engaged apparently in something else than the subject of inquiry. "There," continued the hero, "my enemy lies encamped; and were it not for slight mist, I could almost fancy that I perceive his cavalry moving; but hark, that cannon! Do you not think it proceeds from the head-quarters of the enemy?"

While pointing out to his friend the profile of the country, the face of the latter was often turned the opposite way, seemingly engrossed in another object immediately behind the house. He was not mistaken; it was a troop seemingly, of British horse, that were descending a distant hill, winding through a labyrinth of numerous projections and trees, until they were seen galloping through the valley below—and then again they were hidden by a field of forest that swelled along the bosom of the landscape. "Would it not be strange," observed the General, apparently unconscious of the movements behind him, "that after all my toil, America should forfeit her liberty?"

"Heaven forbid!" said his friend becoming less reserved, and entering more warmly into the feelings of the other "But," resumed Washington, "I have heard of treachery in the heart of one's own camp; and, doubtless you konw that it is possible 'to be wounded even in the house of one's friend.'" "Sir;" demanded the downcast host, unable to meet the searching glance of his companion, "who can possibly intend so daring a crime?" "I only meant," replied the other, "that treachery was the most hideous of crimes: for, Judas like, it will even sell its Lord for money!" "Very true, dear sir," responded the anxious host, as he gazed upon a troop of British horse, winding round the hill, and riding with post haste towards the hospitable mansion. "Is it two o'clock yet?" demanded Washington; "for I have an engagement this afternoon at the army, and I regret that my visit must therefore, be shorter than intended." 'It lacks a full quarter yet!" said his friend, seeming doubtful of his watch, from the arrival of the horsemen. "But, bless me, sir, what cavalry are those that are so rapidly approaching the house?" "Oh, they may possibly be a party of light horse," returned his companion, coolly, "which mean no harm; and, if I mistake not, they have been sent for the purpose of protecting me." As he said this, the Captain of the troop was seen dismounting from his horse; and his example was followed by the rest of the party. "General!" returned the other, walking to him very familiarly, and tapping him on the shoulder, "General, you are my prisoner!" "I believe not," said Washington, looking calmly at the men who were approaching the steps; "but, friend," exclaimed he slapping him in return on the arm, "I know that you are mine! Here, officer, carry this treacherous hypocrite to the camp, and I will make him an example to the enemies of America."

The British general had secretly offered an immense sum to this man, to make an appointment with the hero, at two o'clock, at which time he was to send a troop of horse, to secure him in their possession. Suspecting his intentions, Washington had directed his own troop to habit themselves as English cavalry and arrive half an hour precisely before the time he was expected. They pursued their way to the camp triumphing at the sagacity of their Commander who had so astonishingly defeated the machinations of the British General. But the humanity of Washington prevailed over his sense of justice. Overcome by the tears and prayers of the family, he pardoned his treacherous friend on condition of his leaving the country forever; which he accordingly did; and his name was ever after sunk in oblivion.

PRIVATE HISTORY OF MR. OWEN.

Robert Owen is a native of Wales, and of very humble extraction. Early in life he made his way to Manchester, where he obtained employment in one of the cotton factories. Possessed of more than ordinary endowments of mind, he was not long in making himself master of the "craft and mystery" of cotton spining, and being of a very enthusiastic turn, and noted for some speculative ingenuity, he succeeded ere long in ingratiating himself in the good opinion of his employers, whose processes he was enabled, in some instances, to simplify in a mechanical point of view, and otherwise diminished their expensiveness. At last, he succeeded so well in the contest of life as to obtain charge of the factory.

About the commencement of the present century, the universally respected and beloved David Dale, one of the best men that Scotland ever produced; and the founder of that New Lanark of which so much has been heard, having lost his only son, the solace of his age, and being blessed with an abundance of the gifts of Providence, disposed of his establishment of New Lanark to a company of English merchants, who gladly availed themselves of Mr. Owen's services, and sent him down to New Lanark to superintend their establishment. Owen was here distinguished by the punctuality of his attendance at the Independent chapel of which Mr. Dale was pastor, and in his entire demeanor, he was religious, nay, even to all appearance, devout.

David Dale had a daughter, distinguished, like her father, for religious zeal, charity, and in short, every moral quality that can adorn either sex. It is quite plain, that no man, whose abstract opinions or conduct were at all at variance with religious convictions, could have the slightest chance of obtaining this lady's hand. Robert Owen was successful in his suit, and Miss Dale became his wife.

At the period to which we refer, the inhabitants of New Lanark were noted, even amongst the Scottish population, for their zeal in the cause of religion and morality. During the entire period of Mr. Dale's proprietorship, they had been taught to regard themselves as one great family; and mutual kindness and brotherly love was the lesson which he was never done inculcating. His instructions were not thrown away. The example which Mr. Dale individually set, he endeavored to multiply by the care which he employed in the selection of men of tried moral worth and religious principles, for his overseers and managers. An excellent school was established under the superintendence of the late Mr. Lyon, "who never forgot to impress upon his pupils the principles and practices of religion, or to invoke the blessings of the Almighty upon the commencement of his daily labors." The children, under their respective teachers, were regularly taken to church every Sabbath. Family worship was performed in almost every house once, and on Sabbath twice a-day; and the most beautiful morality, order, peace and harmony, prevailed for many years at New Lanark.

At the death of Mr. Dale, Mr. Owen came into the possession of his wife's fortune, amounting to nearly thirty thousand pounds; and then it was, that he avowed amongst his friends his direct hostility to the institutions, both social and religious, of this every day world. At first, he prudently shrouded his hatred of revealed religion, and applied himself solely, in appearance, to the melioration of the social condition of mankind. He speedily, however, manifested a desire to work out his real principles, by endeavoring to coerce the schoolmaster appointed by his deceased benefactor to discontinue the teaching of the scriptures; and because he would not consent, this poor man felt obliged to resign his situation.

The eyes of his doating wife were at length opened, and she remonstrated, but without the slightest effect, except in throwing over her husband's projects, for a time, a thin veil of hypocrisy. Prudential considerations rendered this desirable. Had he broached, at that period, the infamies of his "New Moral World," the bubble would have burst at the outset; and the co-operative, self-sustaining system, with its accompanying infidelity, kept in the back ground, imposed for a time, upon Mr. Wilberforce and other philanthropists. Upon a closer examination of Owen's doctrines, however, Mr. Wilberforce detected and repudiated their irreligious and scandalously immoral tendencies, as appears by a passage in the fifth volume of his interesting diary.

For a very long period, Mr. Owen kept the pseudophilanthropic portion of his scheme merely before the public, and it was not until he was fortified by the deep root which his system struck in the soil of the United States of America, and publicly professed, by the St. Simonians in France, that he laid aside the last shred of the mask which he had hitherto worn. Ever since that period his system has been undergoing modification after modification, until at last it came forth as "The Universal Community Association of Rational Religionists." Hundreds of thousands of pamphlets and other writings have been disseminated under Mr. Owen's immediate inspection, in which the notion of a Deity and the inspired word of God are alike scoffed at and reviled; the marriage tie has been described as a Satanic invention; lectures have been appointed to make plausible statements in all the principal cities and towns throughout England; brazen-fronted females have had the audacity to assail the gospels of God and the divine institution of marriage, in the metropolis, as well as in the provinces; professed lecturers upon physiology have been the covert and well paid advocates of Socialism; and, to facilitate the proposed "melioration of the condition of society," numerous works have been disseminated, some of unblushing obscenity, and all of the most demoralizing tendency.

If David Dale could but see to what uses his wealth has been applied, he would curse the day upon which his misled bounty conceded the means of setting the world in a flame, to minister to Mr. Owen's depraved appetite for distinction.

PRESERVING WINTER APPLES.

MESSRS. GAYLORD & TUCKER.—Last April year, I visited a friend, when he made me a present of a large dish of fine flavored apples, and it being out of season to have apples in such a good state of preservation, I inquired his mode of keeping them. He informed me that in the fall he made a box six feet long and two feet deep, which he sunk into the ground to a level with the surface, then he filled the box with sound apples, and covered it with boards in the form of a roof, but leaving an opening at both ends. The roof he also covers with straw and earth to the usual thickness of an apple or potatoe hole. In this condition he leaves it till the apples are frozen, but as soon as a thaw comes, he makes it perfectly air tight, and in a few days the frost is altogether removed, and the apples are as fresh and perfect as when they were taken from the trees.

I am aware that this is an excellent plan, because I know that most of the apples and potatoes in holes, rot and decay, in consequence of the warm and foul air accumulating, having no opportunity to escape. I thought, however, to improve it. I consequently last fall buried my apples in the usual way; then I took four strips of one inch boards and nailed them together in the form of a chimney, leaving a vacancy in the middle, of one inch square; this I placed in the centre of the apple hole, the end resting on the apples inside, and the other end projecting two feet above the ground. This succeeded far beyond my expectations.—The vacancy in the chimney was barely sufficient to permit the warm and foul air to escape, and not so large as to let the frost in to affect the apples. My family, during the winter, whenever they wished to have apples for consumption, had only to remove the chimney and reach in with the hand to get a supply, and then to replace it again: and I can assure you that, of eight bushels which were thus buried, only three rotten and five or six slightly affected apples were discovered, whereas my neighbors, who buried their apples in the old fashioned way, lost a large quantity.

WHAT WILL YOU DO WITH YOUR APPLES? In support of the position taken in our last that sweet apples are worth more than potatoes for feeding swine and cattle, we give an extract from Mr. Coleman's report of 1839. In our next we will endeavor to give experiments still more decisive. The feeding of apples is still a matter of experiment, both as to kind, manner and animals to which they are best adapted. Mr. Coleman and Mr. Phinney, of Lexington, recommended for swine, and so they do in England. Mr. Johnson, of Farmingham, for milch cows. His experiments are very decisive of their value. Mr. Hunt recommends for horses and beeves, and so does Mr. Baldwin, and for mutton, also. Mr. Hunt says, the "fattest beef I ever saw was made so by sweet apples—that nothing will fatten mutton quicker, and hogs care nothing for corn, if they can get apples." When experiment shall have had its perfect work, we believe sweet apples will be found of more value than potatoes.—Temperance Jour.

OF
THE CASKET,
AND PHILADELPHIA MONTHLY MAGAZINE.

THE great increase of the subscription list of the Casket, which has been nearly doubled since the commencement of the last volume, warrants the most extensive improvements on the first of July 1840, at which time a new volume will be commenced with increased vigour. Nothing need be said of the firm basis on which the Casket stands, it being already the oldest magazine in the country, and has maintained its popularity, in the face of all opposition. It is to be found upon the centre tables of families making literary pretentions from Maine to Georgia.

TYPE—EMBELLISHMENTS.

The Casket is printed with a clear and beautiful type, upon the finest white paper. The illustrations are not surpassed by those of any periodical, at home or abroad; and beside the monthly steel engravings, a quarterly plate of colored Fashions has lately been added. The style of these embellishments is unequaled, and they are always accompanied by an appropriate sketch. No wood cuts disgrace the work. Whatever appears in the Casket, is of the first order of art.

The volume will be with the first of a series of splendid mezzotint engravings, prepared expressly for the work, by the burin of Sartain, who deservedly stands as the best engraver of the kind in the United States.

LITERARY CHARACTER.

The literary character of the Casket is well known. It is wholly original, of the highest order, and sustained by writers of the first rank. Essays, Tales Sketches and Travels, compose its prominent prose articles; while the poetry is equalled by that of no other magazine of like character. The variety for which the Casket is celebrated, shall suffer no diminution; but on the contrary every exertion shall be made to increase its interest.

Several Romances of the Revolution have already appeared, and others shall follow in the course of the volume, presenting when finished, a complete picture of the manners, and a historical account of the great battles of that time. Thus, the Casket, instead of being filled with sickly sentimentalities, aims at a true delineation of human nature in every variety of passion.

The series of thrilling nautical sketches, entitled Cruizing in the Last War, and which are rated by the contemporary press, equal to the celebrated sketches from 'Tom Cringle's Log,' will be continued and the 'Leaves from a Lawyer's Port Folio,' which have attained a deserved celebrity, will still furnish attraction to the Magazine.

We shall furnish the readers of the Casket with some valuable papers from entirely new contributors. The author of 'Old Irons down a Lee Shore,' will give the first of a number of Sketches in the July number. We count upon his prolific and graceful pen to do much in maintaining the great popularity of the Magazine. In addition to the variety already embraced in the pages of the Magazine, our Syrian Letters,' the first of which appears in the June number as introductory, will interest and add worth to its pages. They are from no unpractised pen.

FASHIONS.

The Fashions are published in the Casket quarterly, or as often as any really new style arrives from Paris. The engravings are colored and executed from original designs. No old worn out plates are retouched and then published as the latest fashions.—The truth of our designs may be tested by comparing them with the latest description of dresses from London and Paris. They are universally admitted to be the finest specimen of engraving and coloring afforded by any Magazine in the country.

The expense of getting [illegible] shall in no wise [illegible] Readers [illegible]—The readers of the Casket [illegible] with these fashion plates as an extra [illegible] the regular and [illegible] engravings which always accompany the work.

TIME OF PUBLICATION.

The Casket is published [illegible] in every quarter of the Union. The most distant subscriber [illegible] as well as those who reside in Philadelphia. [illegible] principal cities agents have been established, by which means subscribers [illegible] copies free of postage.

TERMS.—Three Dollars per annum. Or Two Copies yearly for Five Dollars [illegible] post paid. No new subscriber received without the money, or the name of a responsible agent.

Editors who may copy this prospectus and will send a copy, marked with ink, addressed to the Saturday Evening Post (which will save postage on newspapers) shall be promptly furnished with the work. To be particular in this matter, we should like a copy of the paper marked, to be sent more than once, that no mistake or [illegible] may occur.—Editors are served with the Magazine from the time the advertisement is inserted. We cannot [illegible] as many inserted the advertisement at the close of the last volume, and expected all the back numbers.—This of course we could not be expected to grant.

THE PILGRIM FATHERS.

Perhaps there is no event in the history of our country, fraught with more interest, than the landing of the Pilgrim Fathers upon the shores of this Continent. Consequences of the greatest magnitude have arisen from it.—Nothing less than a powerful Republic, based upon the principles of virtue, and whose influence is felt throughout the world, and whose flag waves on the breeze of different climes. When our minds revert back a few centuries ago, and contemplate this fair and lovely land inhabited by savage tribes, and behold it now with its cultivated fields, and cities, and villages innumerable, rising in surpassing beauty and greatness, we are lost in admiration, and feel for a moment that the change has been wrought by enchantment! But a little reflection convinces us that it caused many struggles and much blood to be shed, to procure the blessings which we enjoy. It was the first principles of liberty implanted in the bosoms of the pilgrim sires, that induced them to seek a home in the "Western World," where they might enjoy that freedom in matters of religion which was denied them in their native land. Who does not admire their firm adherence to the cause of truth, and their fortitude which enabled them to brave the perils of the stormy deep, and the ills they would have to encounter in a country vast in extent, and where it would be difficult to procure the necessaries of life? But they desired to plant a colony where they might form churches that would be more holy, and uncontaminated with the pollutions of the world.

Such were the men that led the way for others to establish a government under which civil and religious liberty might be enjoyed. Although they have long since gone to receive their reward; yet their lives may teach lessons of virtue to future generations.

While perusing their histories, our minds are filled with feelings of sadness. Landed by treachery upon a most bleak and barren coast, at that season of the year when the face of nature wears its most gloomy aspect! No sound of revelry or martial music greeted their ears; no human footsteps drew near to welcome them as they approached our desolate shores. All was still, save the roaring of the tumultuous waves and the howling of beasts of prey as they roamed over their wide-spread domain! The novelty of the scene was past, and stern realities broke upon them. The chill winds of November, as they sighed mournfully through the sere leaves, would remind them that their heads were shelterless, and fill their minds with bitter thoughts respecting the future. No comfortable habitations were made ready to receive them, where they might rest their weary bodies after their long and perilous voyage and be better fitted for future toil.—And the low thatched roof cottages which they would be able to construct, would illy protect them from the inclemencies of the season. And when sickness, with all its attendant train of evils, came upon them, at the first glance we are led to think that Providence frowned upon their designs.—But the issue of the event proved otherwise, and shows that all great undertakings are attended with dangers and difficulties, which, to human perceptions, appear insurmountable.

When Spring returned and revived the decayed face of nature, and these pilgrim adventurers looked upon the green hillocks under which rested the remains of their kindred, how it must have dampened the ardor of their feelings, and almost caused them to look back to that lovely land, from whence they came, with regret, and where many other kindred spirits still remained! And when the long-wished-for period arrived, and they came safely into port, borne on the swelling bosom of the mighty ocean, how joyous, yet sad, was their meeting!—Perhaps there were parents who had parted with their children with the hope of soon meeting them again; but they would no more gladden their hearts, for they had passed away like all of the treasures of earth. There were brothers and sisters forever separated by the icy hand of death. And the light-hearted maiden, too, was there,—she was betrothed to one whom she tenderly loved ere they parted, and the hope of meeting him again buoyed up her spirits during the fatigues of her dangerous voyage, and she now anxiously waited to receive his fond welcome; but she waited in vain! They pointed out to her a new-made grave, under the wide-spreading branches of an aged oak, which designated the spot where his manly form was reposing!—After they had recounted their toils and sufferings, their minds were moved to more firmness to perform the duties which devolved upon them.

The consideration that the pilgrims sought an asylum in the newly-discovered World, clearly evinces that they were enterprising, and well calculated to endure severe trials with calmness; and that their minds were not confined to one narrow spot of earth; but wherever the sun shed his mild, effulgent beams to cheer this otherwise dark world, and the healthful influence of the balmy breeze was felt, to invigorate their bodies; and the changing seasons rolled round in their wonted order, there they were at home. And there they could with confidence thank their Heavenly Father, for mercies past, and crave blessings for the future.

Exposed as they were to dangers on every side, perhaps there were none to be feared more formidable than those which they might expect from the native Indian tribes who inhabited the country. They had held undisputed sway over this vast territory from time immemorial. They inhabited it by a natural right, bequeathed to them by the "Great Spirit," and it had never been infringed upon by the pale white man. They were happy in wandering over their native wilds, and fancied that their bliss in their future world would consist in wide-extended hunting-grounds, abounding in game; and tradition says, their bows and arrows were buried by their side.

For a time the fears of the Pilgrims of Plymouth were not aroused by the appearance of the Indians. And when the tall, straight son of the forest entered their dwellings, it was with words of "peace." How unexceptionable was their conduct towards the natives! It exhibits much wisdom and prudence. They used mild persuasive means in order to gain their friendship. Well might their example be imitated; and then, perhaps, we should not hear of such horrible massacres, the bare recital of which almost chills the blood in our veins while seated around the peaceful fire-side. Then would not the peace of whole communities be destroyed, and flourishing fields laid waste, and once happy families become houseless wanderers. But at this distant period of time, their deeds are almost forgotten; yet, there still lingers around their names a halo of glory.

What nation can boast of such noble ancestors? And whose bosom does not swell with emotions of pride and love of country, when he remembers their virtues?

RELIGIOUS.

From the Episcopal Recorder.

"HE THAT WINNETH SOULS IS WISE."

The great object of our life, as Christians, being the conversion of our fellow men, we should seek earnestly for the most successful means of accomplishing this great purpose. No little wisdom is required on the part of the believer, in order that he may meet the opposition and overcome the prejudice against the gospel, excited in the hearts of his fellow men. It is not every moment that you can obtain access to them, and that time is to be chosen when pride is the most silent, and of course, conscience the most active. There is much, also, in the manner; so far from producing a good impression in favor of Christianity, upon the irreligious, some professors, by their stern, unfeeling manner of address, and uninviting appearance, rather add to the contempt with which religion is regarded.

The best subject for the Christian to introduce at such times, is his own personal experience. If you attack the prejudices or opinions of a man openly, he may worst you in argument, and strengthen his own infidelity; but if you speak of that, which relates to your own consciousness; of the practical results of the gospel upon yourself; of your present enjoyment, and positive assurance of future bliss, he cannot call your statements into question, but must allow, in your case at least, the efficacy of religion. We have seen the infidel weep at the simple relation of a Christian's triumphant death, who would have scorned religion in the abstract.

Much may be learned from the following incident in the life of that exemplary missionary, Henry Martyn. It would be well for all Christians to imitate his manner of overcoming prejudice; their influence upon their unconverted friends would be the more increased.

By taking an interest in the worldly affairs of the irreligious, we may, oftentimes, win their attention to their eternal destinies; by always rebuking sin, yet doing it in private, and with so much meekness that it cannot be resented, we obtain an advantage over them, that they can but acknowledge, and by affability and Christian deportment, we shall eventually overcome the most bitter prejudices, and obtain the confidence of those, who before despised the gospel and its supporters.

"Not long since, Mr. G., riding in a coach in England, fell in with a British officer, who had spent many years in the East Indies, where, in the course of conversation, the name of Martyn was introduced. The officer said he had heard much of him while in the East, and was particularly interested in his conduct toward the commander of the regiment to which he was to act as chaplain. Mr. Martyn's name had gone before him to Calcutta, and as soon as the commander heard whom he was to have for a chaplain, he declared with an oath that as for himself he would never give his attentions to a Methodist. The chaplain, immediately after his arrival, was informed of the prejudices of the officer under whom he was to act, and determined at once to remove, if possible, what would necessarily be a great hindrance in the way of his doing good to the soldiers. Finding that the commander would not call on him, nor show him any respect, he resolved at once to make the first advance. He was received formally, and kept at a distance.—But without noticing the incivility, he began in a most respectful manner to speak of the fine state of discipline in which he found the troops under the officer's command. The officer replied that it had been his endeavor to put his soldiers in the best condition. Mr. M. remarked it was very gratifying to himself to see the efficiency of the command, and that he hoped the fine state of the army would tend to preserve the peace of the country, by proving to the natives the superiority of British power. The officer said he took pride in the discipline and appearance of his men, and was happy to find that his effort struck the eye of a stranger. Mr. M. then remarked that he had called to make his acquaintance, because in the course of his duties as chaplain, it might often be necessary to refer to the commanding officer for advice and assistance, and he hoped to have the privilege of consulting him when it should be necessary. After the interview the officer was met by another, to whom he said, 'I have had a visit from our chaplain.' 'Well, did he annoy you with his religion?' 'I was disappointed in the man; he is well educated and polite, and he pleased me much by the notice he took of my troops. I had not intended to notice him, but now I think I shall call on him.' He did so, and having his agreeable impressions strengthened by farther conversation, which was continued on the subject of the army and the political state of India, &c., determined to invite him to dinner in company with the officers of the army. Mr. M. did not say much at the dinner, but treated all with politeness. The commander was very profane, and whenever he swore Mr. M. looked grieved, but was silent. After dinner, while the commander stood alone near a window, he went to him and entered into conversation, and after a time, remarked with the utmost meekness that he trusted he might be allowed to say that profane swearing was a bad habit. The officer was a little confused, but at once replied that the habit was one which military men were apt to fall into, but that it was certainly very improper to indulge it, especially in the presence of a clergyman. Mr. Martyn pointed upward and replied, 'The sin is not against me. The account is to be rendered to one higher.' 'Certainly,' said the officer, the thing is not to be defended.' After this he acknowledged to a friend his interest in Mr. M., 'for,' said he, 'he altogether disappointed me. I thought him a harsh, rough man, but he is gentle and polite, and very interesting in conversation. He reproved me for swearing, but he did it with such kindness and meekness that I could not resent it.' He admitted Mr. M. into his confidence, and enjoyed the benefit of his instructions and example, and after a time gave proof of being a converted man, and made a profession of Christ before the world. When he heard of the death of Mr. Martyn he wept like a father mourning over his son."

Six trials of sincerity, such as no hypocrite can have:—1. To hate sin as sin; to hate it in its whole nature, in its first motions, not because it troubles the conscience or brings me to hell, but because it is sin. 2. No hypocrite can delight to be made nothing in his own eyes, and the eyes of others. He cannot endure to be outshone. A saint loves to be laid low before God. 3. No hypocrite can bless God, and love him from his heart, when God smites him in his dearest enjoyments. In such a case, a saint clings to Christ, and cannot but love him. 4. No hypocrite can love the person of Christ, nor a saint as a saint. He only loves to be pardoned by him, and to have some comfort from him. 5. No hypocrite can go on in any spiritual work or service for Christ with any contentment, without sensible comforts or outward respects: the wind of human applause fills his sails. 6. No hypocrite in the world can long to be like Christ, as to be respected by Christ: he cannot love the holiness of Christ, as the good things he gets by Christ. But a sincere heart, if he have never so much comfort, yet if he be not like Christ, is not pleased.—Flavel.

Think not that if you were in such a family, under such a ministry, or out of such a particular temptation, the devil would not assault you as he doth; for while Satan's old friend (corruption) is alive within, he will be knocking at the door without.

FAMILY WORSHIP.

The worship of God in our families ought to be instructive. And it should tend to enlighten and direct the minds of all under our care, to the things of God and religion. And, therefore, it should comprehend the reading of the sacred Scriptures. Thus God appointed of old. (See Deut. vi. 6—9.) In conformity to this rule of reason and religion, Timothy received his instructions in the family circle, and thus, from a child, knew the Holy Scriptures, which were able to make him wise unto salvation, through faith which is in Christ Jesus. 2 Tim. iii. 15.

The worship should be humble and penitent. The recollection of former sins, even when we are conscious of present pardon and acceptance with God, is sufficient to sink us into the deepest dust of self-abasement. But in addition to this consideration, every family will find, within the circle of its own experience, without the toil of a laborious investigation, ample reason to say, 'It is of the Lord's mercy that we are not consumed.' If, indeed, parents have no special cause arising from a consciousness of their own aberrations from the path of duty, yet the irregularities of their children—their omissions of duty or actual commission of crime, are sufficient reason why they should present unto God the sacrifice of a broken and a contrite heart; and sho'd say unto him, 'Lord, enter not into judgment with thy servant; for in thy sight shall no flesh be justified. But there is forgiveness with thee, that thou mayest be feared.' Such was the pious practice of the primitive saints of God, of which the history of Job affords a striking instance. (Job i. 4, 5.) How worthy the imitation of Christian parents was the practice of this ancient saint of God.

This worship ought to be grateful. Hymns of praise to God are strictly appropriate as a part of family worship. The recollection of past mercies, whether received in the form of an exemption from general calamities, or in the bestowment of positive good, call for a devout and grateful acknowledgment. The blessings of health, of food to eat, and raiment to put on, of home and all its endearments; the general operations of God's righteous providence, and the still more wonderful dispensation of his grace, all present reasons why the voice of rejoicing and salvation should be heard in the tabernacle of the righteous.

Family worship ought to be regular, and not merely occasional. It should not be the result of particular associations or circumstances, as a tribute of respect to some minister of Christ, or pious friend, who may visit your family. Neither let it be confined to times of general calamity, as when the divine judgments are abroad in the earth, or seasons of personal or family afflictions. Nor yet should it be peculiar to times of unusual excitement in the church of Christ. If the worship of God as performed in your family, depends on the existence of such causes, it will not only pass away like the morning cloud, and like the early dew, but will also exert a most pernicious influence on the minds and moral habits of your children. It will naturally tend to destroy their confidence in the genuineness of your piety, and strongly to alienate their hearts and minds from the fear and service of God. Let them see that your family worship is the result of conviction—that it springs from principles deeply implanted in your mind—that it is performed from a sense of duty to God, and a pious solicitude for the salvation of your own soul, as well as the souls of your family. Thus understood, it will be mighty to restrain them from evil—and to mature in their hearts the seeds of every virtue. And it will be on all your family arrangements like ointment poured forth; like the precious ointment upon the head, that ran upon the beard, even Aaron's beard; that went down to the skirts of his garments.

In order to be regular, The worship of God must be a part of the family government. It must be wrought into the domestic constitution, as one of the essential elements in its construction, and thus it will have its peculiar place, and its appropriate time; and, like every other rule of paramount importance to the family prosperity, it will be scrupulously observed.

Again, let it not be forgotten that it is family worship of which we speak, and therefore it is not merely to be attended to by a part, but by all the members of the household. "As for me and my house," said Joshua, "we will serve the Lord." Let this be your motto. A rule to which all shall submit under your control. Let your children always be present at the offering of the morning and evening sacrifice of praise and prayer; and if there be servants or domestics, let them also participate in this delightful privilege. For, certainly, we ought to regard it as a privilege of immense value to pray with and for our families.

Surely, if there is an interesting exhibition of human nature under Heaven—one on which the angels of God delight to gaze, and over which they exercise more than ordinary vigilance, it is such a scene as this. It is where a truly pious family are assembled to offer unto God the tribute of their heartfelt and grateful thanksgiving. Where the good man of the house gathers his family around him—wife, children and domestics—and reading to them out of the word of the Lord, directs their minds to the truths of salvation. O! how interesting, edifying and instructive, is the scene where a pious family elevate their voices in hymns of praise to God, and prostrating themselves at his feet, pour out their souls in humble prayer and supplication into his parental bosom. Who can behold, without profit, the man of God as he leads the feebler minds of his family to the throne of heavenly grace, and by the energy of his more ardent spirit, and the sympathy of his more active faith, carries them into the holiest of all by the blood of Jesus. Here, at his family altar, he humbles himself under the mighty hand of God. His family worship sanctifies and sweetens his family discipline. It blends the enjoyment of heaven with the afflictions of earth, and gives fortitude and stability under the burdens and tribulations of this life by the anticipated enjoyments of that which is to come.

FOR THE YOUNG.

LETTERS TO YOUTH.

"Moral corruption of human nature."

DEAR YOUNG FRIENDS,—There are still other passages which clearly assert the corruption of human nature. St. Paul says, "By one man sin entered into the world, and death by sin, and so death passed upon all men, for that all have sinned; for by the offence of one, judgment came upon all to condemnation." Rom. v. 12. Before the flood the effects of the fall had become so terrible, that God declared "that the wickedness of man had become great in the earth, and, that every imagination of the thoughts of his heart, unregenerated by grace, "was only evil," without any good, "and that continually," without any cessation; insomuch, "that it repented the Lord, that he had made man, and it grieved him at his heart." Gen. vi. 5. The quotation from the 14th Ps., by St. Paul, Rom. iii. 10, &c., also, shows the moral corruption of man. "The Lord looked down from heaven upon the children of men, to see if there were any that did understand and seek after God. They are all gone aside, they are altogether become filthy; there is none that doeth good, no, not one." How 'filthy' and corrupt they must have become, thus to abandon every thing that was good!

The moral disease of man's nature is thus described: "How much more abominable and filthy is man, who drinketh iniquity like water?" Job xv. 16. "Madness is in the hearts of the sons of men while they live." Eccl. ix. 3. "But they, like men, have transgressed the covenant." Hos. vi. 7. "If ye, being evil, know how to give good gifts unto your children." Matt. vii. 11. 'Thou savorest not the things that be of God, but the things that be of men.' Matt. xvi. 23. 'Are ye not carnal, and walk as men?' 1 Cor. iii. 3. 'That he no longer should live the rest of his time in the lusts of men, but to the will of God.' 1 Pet. iv. 2. 'We are of God, and the whole world lieth in wickedness.' 1 John v. 19. St. Paul, in speaking of an unrenewed man, says, 'I know, that in me, that is, in my flesh, in my unrenewed nature, dwelleth no good thing. I am carnal, sold under sin. O, wretched man that I am! who shall deliver me from the body of this death?' Rom. vii. 18, 24. Our Lord describes the wickedness of the human heart, when he says that 'out of the heart proceed evil thoughts, murders, adulteries, fornications, thefts, false witness and blasphemies.' How corrupt must the heart be, from which proceed such abominations!

Again: St. Paul declares that the carnal mind, 'the disposition of every unregenerate man, is enmity against God,' the fountain of all excellence and goodness. The natural taste and disposition is irreconcilable and implacable hatred. 'The heart is deceitful above all things, and desperately wicked.' Jer. xvii. 9. What a description of corrupt, fallen nature! Our Lord declares, 'that men love darkness rather than light.' John iii. 19; and St. Paul says to Titus, that 'we ourselves, were sometimes foolish, disobedient, deceived, serving divers lusts and pleasures, living in malice and envy, hateful, and hating one another.' Well may we abhor ourselves with Job, 'and repent in dust and ashes,' Job xlii. 6; and exclaim with Isaiah, 'Wo is me, for I am a man of unclean lips!' Isa. vi. 5.

Man's original corruption is variously designated in the holy Scriptures. The apostle of the Gentiles, calls it sin; 'the body of sin,' because it is a collection of all possible sins, a mass of corruption; 'the law of sin,' and 'the law in our members,' because it has a constraining influence over the whole man; 'the old man,' because we have received it from Adam; 'the flesh,' because opposed to the spirit. Other terms are also used, in which man's inherent depravity is clearly set forth.

The natural condition of man is represented in the following manner:—He is said to be in 'darkness;' 'asleep;' 'dead;' 'sick;' 'without strength;' 'deaf;' 'blind;' 'lame;' 'bound;' and 'helpless.' Why is a man thus represented, unless he possesses a sinful nature? And, is not this nature the cause of that state in which he is here represented! 'An evil man, out of the evil treasure of his heart, bringeth forth that which is evil!' 'Who can bring a clean thing out of an unclean one." Job xiv. 1, 4. Man has 'an evil heart of unbelief,' which causes him to 'depart from the living God.' Heb. iii. 12.

The gospel of peace is a great blessing, but the peace of the gospel is a greater blessing.

FOR THE MINISTER.

WHAT IS IT TO PREACH CHRIST!

What is it so to preach, that it may justly be said, in the sense of the apostle, that "preach Christ crucified?"

There are many ways of approaching this excellence without reaching it, and thus of failing in the fruits of an evangelical ministry without perceiving the cause. Some of these approximations I will endeavor to describe.

It is possible to preach a great deal of important truth having an essential relation to the gospel—truth unmingled with an erroneous statement or principle. One's discourses may be very solemn and impressive, kindling strong emotions and exciting deep apprehensions in intelligent congregations; and because the people are affected, it may be supposed that the preacher is faithful. Because the former perceive nothing positively wrong, and hear and feel much that is decidedly good, they not unfrequently regard it as unquestionable evidence of the gospel character of the instruction to which they listen. And yet, without any strained supposition, it may be destitute of some or all of the great distinguishing features of the gospel; or if it contain them, may almost entirely conceal them under the cumbersome frame-work in which they are set; and though it speak often of Christ, and pathetically describe his agony and death, may be so meagre and confused, so general and feeble as to all those vital doctrines which lead to him and spring from and depend on him, which lay the foundation of and bind together the whole structure of the Christian faith, as to be wholly unworthy the name of the preaching of Christ. Suppose that the minister select such subjects as the uncertainty of life, the trial of death, the terrors of judgment, the everlasting retribution of the ungodly. Let him depict the vanity of the world, the excellence of religion, the bliss of heaven. Give him the persecution of Christ, and the various scenes in the tragedy of the crucifixion. Here are subjects on which a lively and intelligent imagination, without any spirituality of mind or acquaintance with the operations of grace on the heart, may be strong and impressive; and yet how many imagine that to preach these forcibly is to preach the gospel!—How often is preaching about Christ confounded with preaching Christ—preaching from the imagination, with preaching from the heart! The minister may thus deceive himself, and the great majority of his people may thus be deceived; while some obscure, unlettered disciple, whose draughts of truth have been taken undiluted from the wells of salvation, will be sensible of some painful deficiency, and the anxious inquirer thirsting for the gospel, will listen and wait in vain to be taught what he must do to be saved. Let us remember the wide difference between being able to preach forcibly the importance of religion on the one hand; and, on the other to show clearly in what all spiritual, saving religion consists. It is one thing to prove that there is no salvation but in Christ; and quite another to direct a soul panting for mercy how he is to "win Christ and be found in him." On such a text as "one thing is needful," almost any intelligent and serious mind might preach without mistake or manifest deficiency. It requires much more preparation than mere intelligence and seriousness to preach well, with truth, and clearness, and fulness, upon such a text as, "If any man be in Christ, he is a new creature," &c.—Bishop McIlvaine's Charge to the Clergy of Ohio.

FOR THE CHRISTIAN.

From the New York Observer.

PREACHING BY EXAMPLE.

Yes! by your example you may preach the gospel, and preach it with mighty power. Conduct is a language that all can understand, that all will feel; and the conduct, the example of every one speaks, for God or against him. True as it is that "actions speak louder than words," so true it is that you may speak efficiently for Christ, however humble your sphere; that you may preach the Gospel in the distinct, and earnest and eloquent language of a holy life. You may plead for religion with living arguments. You may proclaim its excellence by conduct which is without reproach and above suspicion. And this is a kind of preaching that all will hear, and respect, and feel. Said an infidel, of an eminently pious man, "I never see that man without feeling my own unworthiness, he is a constant reproof to me." And Cotton Mather tells us of a poor weaver, of whom it was often said, "that it seemed as if Christ Jesus again lived and walked the earth in him." You can imagine what must have been the life of Christ, how powerful the language of his daily conduct, and how impressive it appeals to the conscience and the heart of every beholder. In that life, in that conduct you have a model for your own. And by ever keeping that model before you, in business, in the family, in social life, in every duty, and position, and event, thus you may preach the gospel. As a city set upon a hill which cannot be hid—as salt which diffuses its preserving and seasoning influence without noise—as the light which in silence spreads its cheering lustre—as the heavens which declare God's glory, while no speech or language, or voice is heard, so is the example of living godliness—the holy example of the devoted Christian. Though silent, it is of mighty power, whether to rebuke, or instruct, or persuade. A look may reprove or encourage. A single action may honor or dishonor the cause of Christ. The whole life may speak, yes, must speak for God or against him. The ordained minister, you admit and feel, ought to live for the extension of religion, for the salvation of men; and if he neglects these high duties, and lives inconsistently with the solemn views of his profession, you feel that he is a shame to himself, a disgrace to his office, and a traitor to his God! But not only the minister, but any Christian in his sphere, is also to be a preacher—one who proclaims and exemplifies divine truth. And if you, as such are chargeable with neglect, with inconsistency, upon you rests the same guilt, the same shame, as on the inconsistent minister of the cross! T. E.

Cheerfulness in duty.—God requires a cheerfulness in his service, especially under the gospel, where he sits upon a throne of grace; discovers himself in his amiableness and acts the covenant of grace, and the sweet relation of a father. The priests of old were not to sully themselves with any sorrow when they were in the exercise of their functions. God put a bar to the natural affections of Aaron and his sons, when Nadab and Abihu had been cut off by a severe hand of God. Lev. x. 6.—Every true Christian, in a higher order of priesthood, is a person dedicated to joy and peace, offering himself a lively sacrifice of praise and thanksgiving; and there is no Christian duty but is to be set off and seasoned with cheerfulness. He that loves a cheerful giver in acts of charity, requires no less a cheerful spirit in acts of worship. —Charnocke.

Overwhelming Argument.—Dr. Lathrop, in one of his sermons says, "If it were true that there is no God, what evidence can the Atheist have that he shall not exist at all? Whatever was the cause of his existence here, may be the cause of his existence hereafter. Or, if there is no cause, he may exist without a cause in another state, as well as in this. And if his corrupt heart and abominable works make him so unhappy here, that he had rather be annihilated, than to run the hazard of a future existence; what hinders but he may be unhappy forever? The man, then, is a fool that wishes there were no God, hoping thus to be secure from future misery; for admitting there were no God, still he may exist hereafter as well as here; and if he does exist, his corruptions and vices may render him miserable eternally, as well as for the present."

God seen through Christ.—"When you look through a red glass, the whole heavens seem bloody; but through pure uncolored glass you receive the clear light that is so refreshing and comfortable to behold. When sin unpardoned is betwixt, and we look on God through that, we can perceive nothing but anger and enmity in his countenance; but make Christ once the medium, our pure Redeemer, and through him, as clear transparent glass, the pure beams of God's favorable countenance shine in upon the soul. The Father cannot look upon his well-beloved Son but graciously and pleasingly. God looks on us out of Christ, sees us rebels, and fit to be condemned, and we look on God as being just and powerful to punish us: but when Christ is betwixt, God looks on us in him as justified, and we look on God in him as pacified, and see the smiles of his favorable countenance. Take Christ out, all is terrible; interpose him, all full of peace; therefore, set him always betwixt, and by him we shall believe in God."—Leighton.

The Christian's Hope.—Let us often remember what that hope of glory is, to which we are called, let us often think that we are the children of light, the heirs of God, and joint heirs with Christ; and let us act as becomes such. What have we to fear, to whom to die is the greatest advantage? What have we to desire on earth, who have a kingdom wherein dwells righteousness and peace, and love and glory? The expectation of an eternal kingdom should arm us with patience and spiritual warfare: "The night is far spent, and the day is eternal." Let us wait, let us watch, let us stand fast awhile, a little while, and the day will break in upon us, a day that will chase away all sorrow, and fill us with joy and glory; a day wherein we shall complain no more, either of the infirmities of the body, or defects of the mind; wherein we shall grapple and fight no more either with temptations or evil, but shall be equal to the angels of God, as in the perfection of holiness, so in the perfection of pleasure too: being made like them impeccable and incorruptible, and therefore entirely and consummately blessed.—Rev. Richard Lucas.

THE CONTRAST OF DEATH.

Such is the contrast of death! Such are the ends of the righteousness and the wicked! Forever the text hangs between them, like the pillar of cloud and fire between the Israelites and the Egyptians—its dark side toward the one, and its brightness and glory toward the other. "The wicked is driven away in his wickedness, but the righteous hath hope in his death." So God's word assures us, and the death-bed scenes of earth confirm it. Go and visit those scenes, and you may see and feel for yourself that it is true. Here is Judas, rushing by suicide into eternity, and there an Elijah, wafted to glory in a chariot of fire; here a Julian, dashing his own blood on malignant hatred against the heavens, and crying out with gnashing teeth, "Thou hast conquered, O! Galiaen;" and there a Stephen, praying with his last breath for his murderers, and sweetly falling asleep in Jesus; here an Antiochus, dying like Herod, by horrible and putrefying disease, while impiously attempting to falsify the predictions of the Bible, and there an Ignatius, calm as a child while the lions are upon him, or a Polycarp, rejoicing in the flames that consume him; here a Hobbes by his own admission, "taking a fearful leap in the dark," and there an Augustine; saying, "I am fast going to a crown of glory;" here a Hume, passing from time to eternity in such dreadful horrors as to terrify his attendant, and there an Addison, calling, with a Christian a heavenly smile, his friends, to "come and see how a Christian can die;" here a Paine, dying in mingled agony and despair—now uttering fearful execrations, and now calling in anguish on the name of the Redeemer, and there a Baxter, speaking of his "wondrous peace," and saying when the very agonies of death are upon him, "I am almost well;" here a Spira, in the immensity of his anguish wishing himself in hell, that he may know the worst that is before him, and there a Scott, saying in his departing moments, "This is a heaven begun within me," or a Jenks, exclaiming, "Blessed dying! glorious dying! I have felt more happiness in two hours of dying than in a whole lifetime beside," or a Payson, crying out with transport, "The battle's fought—the victory 's won for ever! I am going to bathe in an ocean of purity, and peace, and blessedness—victory! victory! peace! peace!" Thus pass the righteous and the wicked from the world—the one with calmness, with joy, with triumph; the other with fear, and trembling, and doubt, or with the much more fearful certainty that they are passing only the world of despair: "the wicked driven away in his wickedness—the righteous with hope in his death!" Well might Balaam shrink in horror from the thought of dying along with the former! Well might he exclaim, "Let me die the death of the righteous, and let my last end be like his.—Rev. Tyron Edwards.

THE COMFORTER.

"God sends his Holy Spirit to be the Comforter of his church. He is the only comforter of the whole universal church. We shall never want nor wish for another. For he is of himself all-sufficient, possessing all knowledge and wisdom, all power and dominion, and is as full of love and mercy as the Godhead can contain. As the Father has committed the whole church to his Son for redemption, so the Son has committed the same to his Holy Spirit to sanctify, teach, and comfort them, to prepare them for the eternal rest, and to conduct them safely home.

"Verily we have the greatest need of this Comforter. Only look at the character and condition of the world through which we travel towards the heavenly home. It is an apostate world. The whole human race are fallen from their state of holiness and righteousness, into a state of guilt and pollution, of sin and death. The whole world has departed from the living and true God, and turned to idols. All by nature are gross idolaters, who love the creature more than the Creator. They are all gone out of the way; none followed after God, no not one; and very few have yet returned to the Lord. Though the Gospel of the kingdom has been proclaiming salvation for more than eighteen hundred years, yet few have embraced that salvation, and returned to God. Most of the kingdoms and nations upon earth continue idolaters to this very day, worshiping stocks and stones. The children of men have found out numberless ways of sinning against the Lord Jehovah. What countless myriads of all sorts of sins are committed against the Most High God every day and hour! This must fill all heaven with anger and vengeance, and fill the earth with guilt and danger. This world through which we go, is a world in rebellion against the God that made it. The men of this world will hear this with cool indifference and concern.—But not so the men of grace, who have eyes to see and hearts to feel. It is computed that there are in the world six hundred millions of gross idolaters, who worship dead gods, and have no knowledge of the living and true God. These have never heard of the Savior and salvation by grace. Christians, look at these myriads of human beings, passing through time in o eternity in the dark, and going in all their guilt to appear before the bar of God, to receive their tremendous sentence of banishment and endless misery! Such an awful sight penetrates believing souls with the deepest concern and sorrow, till their hearts are often overwhelmed with intolerable pain and anguish. This is one instance wherein the comforts of the Holy Ghost are wanted, to revive the spirits of those who bitterly weep and mourn over a lost world."

The Sun and Earth.—"He (the Lord) created the sun, which might be in the natural word as father, and the earth as mother; for the sun is like a common father, and the earth like a common mother, from whose marriage exist all the globe. From the influx of that celestial sphere into the natural world exist those wonderful progressions of vegetation, from seed to the fruit, and to new seeds. Thence, also, it is that there are so many kinds of shrubs, which, in the day time, turn, as it were, their faces to the sun, and turn them away, when the sun sets; then also it is that there are flowers, which, at the rising of the sun open themselves, and close themselves, at his setting: and thence also it is that the nightingales sing sweetly at the first dawn of the morning, and in like manner after they have been fed by their mother earth. Thus these honor their father and their mother. All these things are testimonies that the Lord, by means of the sun and the earth, in the natural world, provides all things necessary for animate and inanimate things. But ask now the beasts, and they shall teach thee, and fowls of the air, and they shall tell thee; or speak to the earth, and it shall teach thee; and the fishes of the sea shall declare unto thee. Who knoweth not in all these that the hand of the Lord hath wrought this? Job xii. 7. 8. 9."

TEMPERANCE.

It gives us unfeigned pleasure to be able to say, that accounts from various parts of the world furnish conclusive evidence that the cause of Temperance is advancing steadily and firmly, though not as rapidly as we could desire. It is now quite clear that the most glowing descriptions of its utility by its early advocates, have not exceeded the reality. The numerous instances in which its influence has been witnessed for good in the social circle—in the church of God—in drying up or lessening the rivers of wretchedness by which society has been devastated—the powerful check it has interposed to the commission of crime—and the array of motives to virtuous and useful living—together with the profusion of the varied blessings it has commanded upon society at large, have not only encouraged the hearts and strengthened the hands of its friends, but have extorted unwilling honors from its enemies. But mighty and astonishing as its former achievements are, the signs of the times are full of promise that all its mightiest works shall yet be outdone; not indeed in kind, but in grandeur and extent. It will give tone to the public feeling and taste; and stability and polish to national as well as social and individual character. It will contribute eminently to bridle and tame the passions of our species, and to promote "peace on earth and good will toward men." It will continue to extend its influence till war among nations shall become unpopular, and cease.—Till the military science shall be neglected and forgotten, and the funds expended in perpetuating a knowledge of the arts of war, shall be applied to the diffusion of Gospel light, and the establishment of the Kingdom of Emanuel.

It will be the companion of the statesman, to give clearness to his perception, truth, justness and solidity to his arguments, dignity to his deportment, and weight to his character—will attend him to the door of that secret retreat, where the bad are made good, and the good better—where the ignorant are made wise, and the wise wiser—where "senators are taught wisdom," and none upbraided or turned empty away.

It will gird up the legal profession, render lucid instead of intricate the statutes of our country, and speak loudly for clients when questions of emolument are to be settled.

It will perform wonders of mercy as an auxiliary in the practice of the healing art. Having the ascendancy in the empire of mind, it will hurl even titled quacks from the high seats they now occupy—banish the innumerable herd of misnamed "sovereign remedies," in the shape of nostrums, receipts, panaceas, &c. &c.,—restore the science of Medicine to its true and elevated position in society—will procure for nature "fair play," and by its very simplicity prevent or remove disease, and thus promote health, contentment and longevity.

It will extend its wand over the great thoroughfares of our country. The traveller who seeks repose instead of being annoyed by the stench of the bar-room, the fumes of tobacco, bacchanalian songs, and profane and obscene discourse, will be allowed the enjoyment of those accommodations for which he pays an equivalent, in quiet, and the journals of our country will cease to groan with records of the depredations of pick-pockets, and the punishments dispensed by our numerous police courts.

A most healthful influence will be exerted by temperance on commerce. Intoxication will not then influence the demands of the vender either to transcend the limits of righteousness, or, by beclouding his intellect to squander his property to his own or family's embarrassment. The buyer will not be led astray by unprofitable or untimely purchases. The whole family of mechanics, will, under the influence of Temperance, be blessed with a good degree of health, contentment and competence. When they shall no longer exhaust their means for that which can neither benefit themselves or others, they will fill an exalted and honorable rank in society. Dependence will then be mutual, and all comparatively happy. The farmer then, instead of wasting one part of the fruits of the earth to secure another, by feeding those unnatural fires which prostrate the human constitution, form and confirm vicious habits, and open the flood-gates of immorality upon community, and carry desolation and ruin in their train—will consult the simple and reasonable demands of nature—will conform his policy to her law, and pursuing that first and noblest of callings upon true principles, will fill an enviable sphere of usefulness and respectability.

Finally, when the wishes of the friends of temperance shall have been consummated, the Church will be relieved of many and perplexing difficulties. Many of the chains which bind her down to sensuality and darkness will be broken—her liberty will be asserted in one long, long and glorious jubilee—her ministers instead of employing much of their time and energies to check the ravages of intemperance, or sow the seeds of consolation in its burning track, or bind up as far as possible, the widowed and orphan hearts it has riven with anguish, will be able to address themselves immediately and without annoyance from this source to the great and good work of gathering souls into the fold of Christ, and to render sweeter, longer and louder the tones of the Gospel trumpet to allure aliens and strangers to a home in the House of God, and to the enjoyment of bliss in a consciousness of the divine favor. Temperance will then as now hold rank in the family of moral and benevolent institutions. It will also be conspicuous among the graces of individual christians, and a diadem of beauty to the church at large.

Blessed shall those be who see those days when truth and wisdom, peace, glory and beauty shall fill our land and triumph in every clime. But great as these results are, they are to be accomplished by individual and concentrated effort. And when all our readers shall leave the theatre of life and go to meet the retributions of eternity, may they be able to say with truth, in addition to whatever else they may have done of a praise-worthy character, "We have done what we could to accelerate the triumphs of temperance.

THE PROPOSED UNION.

Our readers will recollect that we adverted to the subject of the proposed union between the Free Communion and the Free Will Baptist denominations, in our last. We think the union will be consummated. It has frequently occurred to us, previous to our hearing of the above proposition, that such an arrangement might be effected without any sacrifice of feeling or interest to either, and to the mutual benefit and usefulness of both denominations. It is our impression that the chief obstacle which has prevented the union previously was the practice, in some of the Free Will Baptist churches formerly, of admitting Unitarians to their communion. The practice, we believe, has been discontinued some years.

It is but just to say that the Free Will Baptist connection has, in our opinion, been rapidly improving in doctrine, in piety, and in its activity as a tribe in our spiritual Israel for the last twenty years. Perhaps their apparent improvement is principally owing to their increased facilities for expressing their sentiments more fully than formerly. They have made very respectable progress in Literature within a few years; and the Morning Star, published under their patronage, sustains a fair reputation as s religious journal. The Spirit of Missions is cherished among them. They have several worthy laborers in the foreign field. The Free Communion Baptists have enjoyed fewer advantages, but are a respectable people and will doubtless be benefitted by the proposed connection. Indeed it would not be surprising if other members of the Baptist family should soon come into closer union than at present.

Fire in Homer.—On the evening of the 9th inst. a Fire occurred in Homer village, which destroyed the Oil Mill belonging to Mr. Wm. Sherman, containing about one thousand bushels of Flax-seed, and about one thousand gallons of Oil.—Also the Clothing Works of Pierce & Bradford, and also the Grist Mill of Mr. Noah R. Smith. Loss estimated at $10,000. Property insured to nearly its value.

REVIVAL RECORD.

Revival.—We are gratified to learn that an interesting revival is in progress in Pinckney, Lewis co., N. Y., within the bounds of the Seventh-day Baptist Church at Adams. The work is the result of the efficient labors of our beloved brother Eli S. Bailey, whose zealous efforts for the diffusion of truth, and the up-building of the cause of Christ, are much appreciated in that quarter. A number have made a profession of religion, and others are inquiring the way to Zion, with their faces thitherward.

We do sincerely hope the good work thus begun, may increase and spread extensively in that part of the country. There can be no reasonable doubt that it will continue, if Christians are diligent in the use of means. Let each of our christian friends there inquire, "Lord, what wilt thou have me to do?" and enter into the work with spirit; relying on the power of truth, and the succors of the Holy Spirit, and they have nothing to fear. The Lord will answer the prayers of his people which have been induced and prompted by his own Spirit. He will convert sinners.—He will enlarge Zion, while in each of his faithful children He will "fulfil all the good pleasure of his goodness, and the work of faith with power."

From the Christian Reflector.

On last Lord's day, we are happy to learn, eight persons were baptized in Worcester, four by Rev. Mr. Swaim (Baptist) and four by Rev. Mr. Scudder (Methodist,) at the same spot:—five in Grafton by Rev. Mr. Jennings, and four in Sterling by Rev. Mr. Waters. We had the pleasure of being present at the latter place, and of beholding the happy increase of that young church under the labors of Br. Waters. A state of much seriousness continues among the members of that society, and a number are inquiring how they may attain eternal life. Perhaps, few cases have occurred of more signal blessing on the labors of a little band of self-denying believers than has been experienced in Sterling. The church is three years old and has increased from twenty nine to nearly one hundred members.

A brother writes us under date, Paterson, N. J., Sept. 25, and says:—"Our church is enjoying a little season of revival.—Three have been baptized and several are expected to be baptized to-morrow by Rev. H. C. Coombs of Troy, Pa. who has supplied the church for several weeks past.—Five or six of our Sabbath School Scholars are hopefully converted—the youngest is about ten years of age."

INTELLIGENCE.

FOREIGN.

From the New York Express

SEVEN DAYS LATER FROM EUROPE.

The third ship of the British Royal Mail Line of Steamers for Boston, the Caledonia, Capt. Richard Cleland, arrived yesterday morning, (Oct. 3,) at Boston, a little before 7 o'clock, bringing London dates to the evening of the 18th, and Liverpool to the 19th—the day of sailing.

The Caledonia has been 13 days and 14 hours from dock to dock. She lost 8 hours at Halifax, and 12 hours below, on account of the fog.

The Steamer President arrived at Liverpool, from New York, on the 17th, having made the passage in 16 days. The Acadia arrived on the 15th. The President encountered tempestuous weather during the passage. She arrived just in season to enable Capt. Fayrer, by some exertion, to enter the flour at the custom house. She had 2500 barrels, on which the duty would have advanced next day at the rate of 4s per quarter.

The transactions in the Cotton market at Liverpool had been upon a small scale, but for the last few days there had been a more extensive demand, and prices of American descriptions had been well supported.

The harvest had been generally productive, and the grain had been gathered in most parts of the country in good order.

By the recent accounts from the South of Europe, we learn that the demand for Wheat for export had entirely subsided at the principal ports in the Mediterranean, and that but little had been done in the article for local consumption, whilst fair supplies having in the interim been received, prices had declined. At Trieste, on the 29th ult. the best Banato Wheat was procurable at f. 5 1-2 per staro, or 42s per qr free on board.

From the North of Europe we have also advices of falling prices, the certainty of the duty rising in this country having caused the export demand for Wheat to cease suddenly.

With the exception of the Northern Counties the harvest may now be considered as nearly brought to a conclusion in England; and even in Yorkshire, a large proportion of the crops is already saved.

Two British ships-of-the-line were then stationed at the entrance of the Dardanelles, waiting to escort a small Turkish squadron, carrying 4000 soldiers and proceeding to Cyprus. That squadron left Constantinople on the 26th.

The blockade of Alexandria commenced on the 1st inst. by Admiral Stopford. Several of the Pasha's vessels had been sequestered by the British naval authorities. The Pacha had refrained from acts of retaliation.

It was said that Admiral Stopford, on being informed of the expected arrival of a French vessel loaded with artillery and ammunition for the Pacha, had issued orders for its capture.

The Viceroy's fleet (Egyptian and Turkish) was drawn up in order of battle in the road of Alexandria.

The prospects of a general war had pretty much blown over. London Morning Herald of the 17th, gives, by an extraordinary express from Paris, the following statement which may be designated "important if true:"

We have received the following important communication from our Paris correspondent—"Letters from Malta of the 7th September contain the following important intelligence:—

Count Calewski has proposed to Mehemet Ali a project of arrangement, which the Viceroy has decided on accepting.—The count has set off in haste to Constantinople, in order to have the project presented to the divan through the French ambassador, M De Pontois. Among other clauses contained in this project, there is one, it is asserted, which is likely to facilitate the almost desperate arrangement of the eastern question, viz: Mehemet Ali consents to accede to the proposal of possessing Syria for his life only."

Notwithstanding the tardy and partial acquiescence of Mehemet Ali in the demands of the four powers, the Paris papers of the last dates talk quite as warlike as at any time since the commencement of the panic on the Eastern question; though, if Mehemet has yielded, we know not what they will make a war out of.

There had been a great rise in the funds in Paris, and every thing, except the tone of the press, indicated peace.

Galignani's Messenger says, that the French and English commissioners have brought to a close their negociations for a treaty of commerce between Great Britain and France, and that it contains several clauses highly favorable to British Manufacturers. The very few points which may be considered open are mere technicalities, of no importance whatever, and which cannot by possibility be made the subject of any discussion affecting either the principle or the details of the treaty. But for the unpleasant differences which have arisen on the Eastern question, the treaty would have already received the signature of M. Thiers. His motives for not signing it under such circumstances will be understood: but Mr. Porter remains in Paris, and there appears to be an understanding that the treaty will be signed the moment the political horizon shall have brightened up.—The announcement of the signature will then be regarded as a strong indication of the resumption of harmonious intercourse between the two nations.

The Messenger announces that the Court of Peers on Tuesday had declared itself competent to try Louis Bonaparte and his fellow prisoners.

The Courier de l'Herault states that the weavers at Lodove had combined and abandoned their looms en masse; they had not proceeded to any acts of violence, but perambulated the country in small bodies, and regaled themselves with grapes and other fruits.

The Chamber of Peers met on Tuesday at Paris and constituted itself into a court for the trial of Louis Napoleon and his followers. The sitting was private, but we understand that the report of M. Persil (the Procureur General) was read and received, as well as the evidence taken at Bologne, and Paris.

On the 15th of July between England, Turkey, Austria, Prussia and Russia, were exchanged at the Foreign Office.

No fewer than five of the Dublin Aldermen had announced themselves as repealers.

The Princess Augusta, was still alive, although there were no hopes of her recovery.

Joseph Bonaparte (Count Surveilliers) arrived at Rotterdam on the 15th, and was to depart the next day for London.

There had been a furious gale of wind on the North-east coast of Scotland, and many fishing vessels had been lost with all their crews.

An axle-tree of one of the cars of the North Midland Railway, on the 14th ult., broke, and threw seven cars off the rails, killing several persons, and wounding others, some mortally.

The British Lords of the Admiralty had a narrow escape from shipwreck on the 11th, in the Firebrand, man of war Steamer, on her way from Milford to Bristol.

A heavy gale occurred at Liverpool on the 16th, and many packets which had gone out were obliged to put back.

Lord Brougham, has been seriously ill, but was recovering, although he was still obliged to abstain from going into company.

Admiral Edwards, one of the oldest admirals in the English navy, his commission bearing date June 4, 1814, died on the 14th September, in the 95th year of his age. He was actively engaged throughout the American revolutionary war, and commanded the Atlante, when she was captured by the American frigate Alliance in 1781.

The warlike accounts from China, says the London Mercantile Journal, have caused an extensive demand for teas, both speculators and dealers have been on the alert, and prices have advanced for Free Trade and Company's Congou.

There had been no later advices from China, or the East Indies. The Liverpool Mail, mentions a rumor, stated to have been mentioned in a letter from Bombay, of the reception there by a steamer from China, of news of the destruction of Canton. The news, if true, would not be likely to come in so vague a shape.

The French fleet under Admiral Hugon was off Cerigo on the 30th August.

There was a rumor that a collision had taken place between the British and French squadrons, but no particulars are given, and it is, in all probability, utterly without foundation.

Seventeen of the political prisoners of Doullens had made their escape by a subterraneous passage communicating from the interior of the prison to the chemin de ronde. Eight of them were almost immediately recaptured in the environs of Amiens, and the police are in active persuit of the others.

SUMMARY.

The Amistad.—This famous schooner and her cargo, are to be sold at New London on the 15th inst., by order of the U. S. Circuit Court for the district of Connecticut. The cargo consists of dry goods, hardware, crockery, vermicelli, &c. selected for a Spanish market. Also a mill for grinding sugar cane. This last ought to be purchased for the colony of Liberia. The negroes of the Amistad are still at (Westville) New Haven, in Charge of Mr. Willcox the U. S. Marshal, and are very comfortably situated. Their case is now in the hands of the Supreme Court of the United States, who meet at Washington in January next. If this Court confirms the decision of the Court below, the Africans will be immediately set at liberty.

Gale.—A heavy and destructive gale has been raging here since midnight. It commenced blowing from the south, then veered to the southwest with increased fury, and swelling the waters to within six inches of the highest mark of 1835. The flats adjacent to the ship yards are inundated and considerable damage has been done to the shipping. We gather the following:—The steamboats Michigan and Vermillion drifted from their moorings and went ashore near the ship yard. The schr. Bancroft, with a full cargo of flour and wheat, was run afoul of in the creek, and every spar cut off even with the deck—cargo saved. Schooner Martha Freme came in during the gale this morning and on rounding the pier, ran against it and sprang aleak—she however reached the dock and is now still afloat—both pumps are kept going.

The brig North Carolina, schooners Chesapeake, Buffalo, Cambria, Lexington, and several others were overtaken on the Lake and experienced much difficulty in reaching port. The Cambria lost every inch of canvass and entered the harbor in dreadful plight. The schooners Lexington and James King, are stranded below the Lighthouse, but will sustain but little injury.

The brig Indiana drifted up the harbor during the night, carrying with her several scows which are now high and dry on the flats. The Erie is also away from her birth. The new schooner Emily has all her starboard railing carried away, and the following vessels are materially injured in spars and rigging: steamboat Fulton, brig North Carolina, schooners Commodore, Florida, Bucknor, Tippecanoe, Ruggles, Alps, Mitchell and others.

A lumber scow from Irving is sunk near Parsons and Co's warehouse, and three bridges are much damaged on Main street, Lloyd street, and Ohio street. A large warehouse owned by Mr. Dart, on the flats opposite the store house of Messrs. Gelston and Evans, fell in and is minus the roof. The canal boat Free Trader, was caught under Main street bridge, but not entirely sunk. There is also a fleet of scows driven up in various ports, but not otherwise injured. The schooner Navigator lost some spars and all her bulwarks on the larboard side.

We hear reports of two lives lost, but cannot trace them to any foundation in fact. There were, however, some serious accidents which occurred. A man belonging to the brig Indiana, by the name of Brown, got his foot entangled with the chain cable and suffered dreadfully. It was lacerated to such a degree, that amputation was necessary. Another man named Davidson, of the schr. Buffalo, had his leg broken, by being caught between the rolling casks. This we believe to be the most important personal injury done. As may be supposed, there was much loss of lumber, wood, swine, &c., by the inundation.—Buffalo Journal.

Naval Architecture.—The fact that the dimensions of Noah's Ark are the best which can be devised for capacity of burden, often has been noticed; but that they also should have been the most suitable for the purpose of swift sailing and safety, has not been suspected and ascertained, until very recently, even by Mechanics. The following statement from the Hampshire Telegraph, of England, is another as satisfactory and triumphant an overthrow of Infidelity as Christianity can desire, or that Science has lately furnished. 'The proportions of the British Queen steam ship, the last great effort of marine architecture that has interested the world, are exactly those of Noah's Ark, the first that was set afloat, proving that four thousand years of practical science has done nothing to improve the dimensions of floating boats, first given by the great builder of the universe: and if the critical character of these proportions be duly considered, it affords an evidence of the truth of the scripture narrative. The breadth of the ark was one-sixth of the length; the depth thereof one-tenth of the length. The British Queen is 40ft. 6in. wide; stem to stern-post 243 ft. aloft, while depth 29, making the square depth 24ft. 6in. The ark was twice as long as the British Queen."—Christian Intelligencer.

A Destructive Fire, caused by sparks from the steamer Lady Almer, occurred on the south side of Napoleon wharf, Lower Town Quebec, on Thursday last, passing over the same track as did the fire on the 10th of September, 1836, originating in the same spot, and from a similar cause, and destroying nearly the same number of buildings. It commenced in the store of Messrs. Joseph & Co., and destroyed three stores, 3 hotels, 3 taverns, 5 dwelling houses, and 1 office. The total loss is estimated at £30,000. Mr. M'Grott, who arrived from New Brunswick in the last trip of the Unicorn, fell from a roof on which he was engaged in throwing water, and no hopes were entertained of his recovery.

The brig Margaret and Sarah, of Newcastle, caught fire and lost her masts, rigging, &c. Five small craft were burned; the cargo of one of which was valued at £300. The Church was in great danger: the ornaments, furniture, &c., was removed to a place of safety.

Mysterious Affair.—Extract of a letter dated, Nassau (N. P.) 27th August, 1840, received in New Orleans via Havanna.

"A singular circumstance occurred a few days ago. A large French ship from Hamburg, bound to Havanna, was picked up by one of our little wreckers about a fortnight ago, quite deserted. She was afloat with no sail but a jib—not the least injured—having a very valuable cargo of wines, silks, fruits, &c., and all in good order, and her papers and every thing on board in their proper places. When sounded, three feet of water was found in her hold, which was immediately pumped out; and it was discovered that she had no leak. A few poultry and a cat only were found alive. There were a number of cages, with Canary birds, apparently starved to death. I have seen one of the persons who first went on board, and he says that the cabin and state rooms were elegantly furnished and had all the appearances of passengers having just stepped out of them—one in particular had a ladies toilet, combs, brushes, &c., on a settee lay a bonnet, shawl, work box, needles, thimbles, &c., as if that minute laid down. There are many cases on board addressed to different merchants in Havana, and the vessel by which I am now writing is despatched to gain some information on the subject. She is a large new ship, built this year, and is named the Rosalie."

Democracy in America.—The Langleys, in Chatham street, have just published "part second of Democracy in America, by M. De Tocqueville." The great popularity of the first part might well stimulate the author to put forth a second. This, like the other volume, is introduced by a preface from the Hon. John C. Spencer. The first volume was a book of great interest, and exhibited the author as a man of great fitness to contemplate his subject, and yet it proved that the true idea of liberty had not yet entered his mind. He looks on all government as a machinery; a contrivance by which communities are wielded and controlled, and he thinks of no such thing as personal government. Democracy he looks at merely as the government of the majority, and compares the majority in this country, with the King of the French. In reading his book, it seemed to us passing strange that a man who had so much political science, and so many bright thoughts, should make so many mistakes; that one who was constantly throwing his hatchet within a hair's breadth of the inherent principle of liberty, should, after all, never hit it.

The Royal Nursery.—Upwards of a hundred workmen are actively employed in the left wing of Buckingham Palace, preparing a suit of rooms for the royal nursery. The splendid drawing room, breakfast room, luncheon room, wardrobe of Prince Albert, are appropriated to this all important purpose. The suit of apartments of which the above form a part, were fitted up but a short time ago in a most costly and beautiful style for the reception of the prince; but the ruthless implements of the artizan, "who weighs not matters such as these," are crashing away through ornamented ceiling, gilded festoons, and papers of the most varied beauty and richness, for the accommodation of the expected little stranger. His royal highness personally inspected the alterations on Thursday last, and expressed himself to be highly gratified with the rapid progress already made in the furtherance of this desirable object.—Similar alterations are being carried on at Claremont.—London paper.

Harper's District School Library.—The Trustees of the Common Schools, and others on whom may devolve the duties of procuring School District Libraries, will do well, where Libraries may be required the coming winter, to have their orders left with the booksellers or agents of the publishers, immediately, so that there may be no disappointments from not obtaining them before the close of navigation. Last year the negligence of the proper officers induced not a little dissatisfaction in districts where Libraries were not received. Country journalists will do their readers essential service by calling attention to the subject. Two series, comprising one hundred volumes, have been already published, and a third, of fifty volumes will be ready in a few weeks. The selection of works for the Library is made under the direction of the Superintendent of Common Schools; they have uniformly received the strongest testimonials of approval from persons best qualified to judge of their excellence; and they are sold at a price below that of any similar publications ever printed.—New Yorker.

The Ten Tribes of Israel.—We have no doubt that the descendants of them who formed the kingdom which was founded by Jeroboam, and who were carried away captive by Shalmaneser the King of Assyria, ere long will be identified. According to prophecy, they are not to be the Pioneers in the return to Palestine, to occupy the land allotted by Joshua to their ancestors; but they must go back, every one of them, Amos ix. 9; for "not the least grain shall fall upon the earth." In preparation for that wondrous development of Divine compassion and faithfulness. Mr. Samuel, of Bombay, has recently published a narrative of his residence "during several months, among an hitherto undiscovered race, whom he pronounces to be a part of the ten tribes. They dwell on the southwest shore of the Caspian Sea, entirely circumscribed and secluded by mountains; adjacent to the region where they were originally settled. 2 Kings xvii. 6; and xviii. 11. He expressly maintains two most extraordinary facts—that they strictly conform to the observances of the ancient Israelites; while they are altogether ignorant of the traditions and ceremonies of the Jews, who are 'scattered among all people."

St. Augustine, Sept. 17.—Indian Fight. On Sunday last, Lieut. Hanson, 6th infantry, discovering numerous signs aromd the post at Wachoota, proceeded with 30 men in search of the trail. He had not advanced far before he received a heavy fire from the enemy who appeared in a large force. One of his men were killed and four wounded, whom he succeeded in taking back to the garrison. There were over a hundred Indians.

The Newark Daily Advertiser, the leading Whig paper of New Jersey, says:—

"We are desired to say that the Convention of Abolitionists, recently held in this State to consider the subject, decided not to make a political organization at this time, or form a ticket."

Venezuela.—A geographical survey of the entire territory of Venezuela has just been completed by Col. Codassi, who has been ten years engaged in the task. It is found that this Republic comprises no less than 35,000 square miles: the greater portion of which has been hitherto unknown. The results of this important survey are recorded in a map on a very extensive scale, and an atlas which are now being printed in Paris by an order of the Government of Venezuela, and which will complete the geographical knowledge of this portion of the continent of South America, remarkably alike by the value and variety of its natural productions, by its virgin forest, and its magnificent water courses, amounting to 2,000 in number, and almost all of them being absorbed by the immense Oronoko, which is navigable for a distance of more than 1,000 miles from its mouth.

Important Railway Invention.—Mr. Henry M. Naglee, a young but ingenious and accomplished engineer of this city, has just invented a mode of constructing the rail for curves in rail-roads, which we think, is of a very important character. It attains the great desideratum in civil engineering of enabling cars to turn upon the shortest necessary curves without difficulty or danger,—the usual inconveniences are escaped—friction is diminished, and the axles are exempt from injury, while the wheels of the car regulate themselves to the turn, avoiding the danger of running off. The invention is simple and upon the combination of two established mechanical principles. The committee of the Franklin Institute have, as we understand, awarded Mr. Naglee the Scott's Legacy premium for his important and useful improvement.

Missionaries' Daughters.—Great interest has been awakened on the subject of the children of missionaries, who must be sent from heathen countries to be educated. We perceive by a notice in the "Spirit of Missions," that an institution has been opened at Walthamstow, near London, for the daughters of missionaries, and that 18 have already been received under its care, and 10 more are soon to be added. It is supported by the Independents and Baptists. Rev. Mr. Meigs, at Ceylon, at the meeting of the American Board, expressed himself decidedly opposed to the education of the children in a seminary established for the purpose, but preferred that they should be taken into the families of pious and benevolent private individuals.—New York Observer.

Ravages of the Small Pox.—Mr. Grout, a missionary of the American Board, writes from Cape Town, South Africa, under the date of May 27th, that the small pox was raging dreadfully there. It was believed that ten thousand persons had already had it, of whom about two thousand had died.—N. Y. Obs.

Novel and Delicate Operation.—We are gratified to learn, from the Boston Medical and Surgical Journal, of the present week, that Dr. Dix has succeeded in an operation for the relief of squinting. It consists in a division of the muscles by which the eye is turned inward, and, we presume, is the same as those which have of late been mentioned in foreign journals. The operation was performed with but little pain to the patient—a young lady—yet with manifest utility, as her vison is much increased.

Unbounded Liberality.—On Friday, a young lad, son of Mr. Leonard, stabler in Leverett street, found a package of bills, amounting to about $20,000, near the Lowell Railroad Depot, and carried it to his father. Mr. L. immediately took it to the ticket office, on the supposition that the money had been dropped by some passenger in the cars. It turned out to be so, and the owner upon recovering it, promptly paid the boy one dollar!—Boston Post.

The Concord sloop of war sailed from this harbor yesterday, commanded by Wm. Boerum. It is understood that she will proceed to join the East India squadron at New York.—Boston Journal.

The Proclamation of the Union of the two Canadas is to be issued on the 1st of January, 1841, and the elections under the new Constitution will take place on the following month.

The Remains of Napoleon.—The brig Gilpin, which arrived at this port yesterday sailed from St. Helena on the 21st of Aug., just as the French frigate La belle Poulle made her appearance with the Prince de Joinville and his suite on board. Every preparation had been previously made by the English to have the bones of Napoleon disinterred and removed with little trouble.—Eve. Post.

The Methodists of Mississippi have resolved on establishing the Centenary College of the Mississippi Conference, at Clinton, in that state. It is expected that the institution will commence during the ensuing winter. Seven-tenths of the Mississippi Centenary fund is appropriated towards its accomplishment.

Genesee Valley Canal.—The first division of this canal, (36 miles in length,) was opened the first day of Sept., and the amount of tolls received up to the 1st of October, is $1,371 20.

The business of the canal is rapidly increasing, and the tolls for the present month will probably double those received during the month of September.

The number of lockages at the first lock out of Rochester, for the month of Sept., is 210.—Roch. Democrat.

Crops in Maine.—The Augusta Journal of Saturday, states that there had been no frost in any part of Maine until Thursday night last. The crop of Indian corn has been unusually large, and superior in quality; other grains, about an average.

Wool.—It is estimated that the growth of Wool in the United States the present year will be from 42 to 46,000,000 lbs. This calculation is confined to 14 States of the Union, the remaining 12 not being adapted to the product, or no attempts beyond an immediate family demand being made to introduce it.

A slave vessel under Arab colors was captured by H. B. M. ship Curlew on the South African coast, 21st May. She was called the Yaruga. She had 19 slaves on board. About the same time a slaver brigantine was captured by H. B. M. brig Wizard, near Cape Frio. The crew escaped.

Quick Passage to Albany.—The steamboat Albany, on Wednesday, made the passage from this city to Albany in 8 hours and 33 minutes, which is said to be the quickest passage on record.

Villainy.—Some scoundrel placed a large stone on the track of the Stonington Railroad, Saturday night. The cow-catcher attached to the engine struck the stone and was stove to pieces. The engine was somewhat damaged, but no person in the cars was injured.

Revival in Richmond.—The good work of the Lord is still in progress in the Third Baptist Church, under the charge of Br. Taylor their pastor, and other brethren.—Last Lord's day the 20th inst., twenty-two persons were baptized. Preaching is kept up at 11 o'clock A. M. and 8 in the evenig. On Monday evening the 21st inst., over thirty persons offered themselves for prayer.

From the accounts we have received, it is evident that the Lord is pouring out his spirit in rich effusions, upon his churches in Virginia.—Bapt. Record.

An Eagle.—The New London Gazette states that during the afternoon service of the Baptist church of that city, on Sunday of last week, a large American Eagle—a rare bird in that quarter—alighted on the cupola of the church, and remained some time, notwithstanding he was assailed with missiles by the spectators.

Steamer Swiftsure.—A dreadful explosion of one of the boilers of this steamboat occurred on Monday last, about seven miles from the city of Albany, on her way down, which severely scalded the chief engineer, Mr. Havens, and six other hands, and has proved mortal since to all but two. The condition of the steam was examined but a few moments before the accident, and appeared perfectly safe.—N. Y. Baptist Register.

Steamboat Accident.—I beg leave to submit a hasty account of the calamity on board the steamboat, Swiftsure yesterday, off Castleton, at 2 o'clock, P. M.

Near Van Wie's Point the gasket on one of the hand-hole plates burst out, to stop which occupied the engineer several minutes. During this time, the water was often tried by the engineer and fireman in my presence, and invariably showed a full cock. Soon after the engineer stopped the leak, I went into the fireroom, and inquired about the water. It was again tried, and as before produced a full low cock. I then said to the fireman. "You will soon have a fail head on, as Mr. Havens has stopped the leak."

I then went forward to look out for a sloop that was likely to crowd us in a narrow channel, and as soon as she altered her course I passed to the upper deck, and as soon as she altered her course I passed to the upper deck, and stood over the boiler when it burst. I think that not more than eight or ten minutes elapsed after the leak was stopped before the explosion took place. No steam escaped from the saftety valve, and the engine was making some 14 or 15 revolutions, indicating a low head of steam.

The engineer, his son, and five men, were severely scalded. Mr. Havens (the engineer) and Robert Graces, Daniel Hageman, and George White, firemen, are dead. Henry Yates, fireman, and John Cooney, deck hand, are dangerously scalded. Mr. Havens's son is not dangerously scalded.—Albany Eve. Journal.

During a camp meeting held at Red Stone, Mt. Pleasant, Ohio, a tree was blown down and fell among a group of men, several of whom had limbs broken. One man named M'Clain is dead, and others are not expected to survive.

NOTICES.

WANTED IMMEDIATELY, at this office, as an apprentice to the printing business, an active industrious lad, from 14 to 18 years of age, who can come well recommended.

Mr. A. Parker, P. M., at East Homer, is respectfully requested to act as agent for this paper.

The next Quarterly Meeting of the churches composing the S. D. B. Central Association will be held at Scott, and commence on the evening of the fifth day of the week before the last Sabbath in the present month. A general attendance is desired.

CORRECTION.—Brother Eli S. Bailey will visit the second church in Verona on the fourth Sabbath in this month, instead of the third, which will better suit his other arrangements.

The following question will be discussed before the De Ruyter Institute Quæsitor Scientiæ Society, Fourth-day evening, the 14th inst., at 6 o'clock. "Has Oratory been more beneficial to mankind than Poetry?" Let those who feel interested in the question manifest it by their attendance.

By order of the Society.

DIED,

In Persia, Cattaraugus Co., on the 31st of August, 1840, Mrs. ELIZABETH, wife of Silas Burdick, aged 52 years.

Sister Burdick had been for some time afflicted with a cancer, which, for the last six months of her life was very distressing. In her affliction, she evinced the patience and fortitude of a Christian. She conversed freely with her minister and others, relative to her departure, and gave full evidence of her meetness for the inheritance of the saints in light.

POETRY.

From the New Yorker.

INVOCATION.

Bear me from the earth away,
  Spirits of the joyous skies!
Heavenly airs around me play;
Seraph voices seem to say,
"Sister spirit come away!
  Sleeper, from the dust arise!"

Come! with all your shining train,
  And dissolve this frail abode—
Charm away all earthly pain;
Break my spirit's weary chain,
For it long in bonds hath lain,
  Fainting 'neath a heavy load.

Bear me where all pain is done,
  Blessed messenger of God!
Bear me to a cloudless sun—
Bear me where bright waters run,
With glad music in their tone,
  And no shadows on their flood.

I would flee to some calm spot
  Smiling under peaceful skies,
There to share a glorious lot
Where the bright world changes not,
Where all wrongs shall be forgot,
  And affection never dies.

Bear me where no pain can come—
  No dark dreams from troubled lee;
Where undying flow'rets bloom—
Where no willow decks a tomb,
Where deep hearts may find a home—
  Love at last forget to weep.

I am one whose flesh is weak,—
  Bowed beneath affliction's rod—
Born to suffer—yet be meek:
Here is not the rest I seek;
Oh! the winds of earth are bleak—
  Take me, take me up to God!

From the Baptist Advocate.

THE WEARY DOVE RETURNING TO THE ARK.

But the dove found no rest for the sole of her foot, and she returned unto him, into the ark.—Gen. viii. 9.

I.

O weak and weary dove, with drooping wing,
  And tired of wandering o'er this watery waste;
Jesus, my ark! to thee, a worthless thing
  Once more I fly, thy pardoning love to taste.

II.

For since I left thy sweet, secure retreat,
  In search of pleasures fair, though false and vain,
My peace,—my joy hath flown;—no rest my feet
  Have found; and now I turn to thee again!

III.

I've sought for rest in friendship's hallowed shrine;
  But lov'd ones change, and earth's endearments end:
No love is true and lasting, Lord, but THINE,
  Henceforth, incarnate love, be Thou my friend.

IV.

I've sought to find a place to rest my feet
  In fame's alluring temple, bright and gay;
In health, and competence, and pleasures sweet,
  But short and transient as the passing day.

V.

Yet all in vain—o'er all this dreary waste
  Of sin and sorrow, toil, and care, and pain,
No spot I've found my weary feet to rest;
  And now, sweet ark, I fly to thee again.

OLD HUMPHREY ON THE MONUMENT.

Yesterday I was roaming the field in the neighborhood of Hornsey woods, and Muswell Hill, poking in the ditches, pulling down the honey-suckles in the hedges, peering into the long-legged lady-bird, and long-legged grasshopper, and every now and then sitting on the stiles to rest myself, and wipe my spectacles; and where am I now? Why, on the top of the Monument, looking around on London's proud city lying below.

You will say that a man, at my time of life, might be well satisfied to keep his feet on level ground, and not give way to the pitiful ambition of getting above the head of his neighbors. Well, well, say what you will, the truth is the truth, and I will not disguise it: whether it be wise or foolish, right or wrong in me to have mounted so high, here I am. Yes, here is old Humphrey on the top of the Monument; the breeze blowing so freshly that he can hardly keep his hat upon his head.

The book in the blue cover, that I bought down below informs me that the great London fire in the year 1666, which this monument is meant to commemorate, consumed the buildings on four hundred and thirty six acres of ground, four hundred streets and lanes, thirteen thousand two hundred houses, the cathedral church of St. Paul, eighty-nine parish churches, six chapels, Guildhall Royal Exchange, Custom House, Blackwell Hall, divers hospitals and libraries, fifty-two of the Companies' halls, and a vast number of other stately edifices; together with three of the city gates, four bridges, the prisons of Newgate, the Fleet Poultry, the Wood street compters; the loss of which, together with that of the merchandize and household furniture, by the best calculation, amounted to ten millions, seven hundred and thirty thousand five hundred pounds.

I am now trying to imagine myself surrounded by this most terrible conflagration. Oh, the distress, the misery, the despair, that must have wrung the hearts of the houseless and homeless multitude! Yet, see how mercy was mingled with judgment, only eight lives were lost by this fearful visitation, and the plague which had long raged in the city was stayed by the devouring flames!

Surely no one should ascend this towering column without putting up a prayer to the Father of Mercies that London may be, forever spared the repetition of such a dire calamity. But now let me look around.

My fellow-men are the same restless beings when seen from this point of view as from any other; the same busy, bustling, selfish attention to their individual interests is visible. The loaded porters are hurrying down the hill to the steam packets; the cab-drivers and coachmen are lashing their jaded horses up the hill with their fares; the merchants are hastening on 'Change; the policemen are slowly pacing their rounds; the letter-carriers are performing their active duties; gentlemen are promenading the streets; ladies are shopping, either in their carriages or on foot; and idlers and pleasure-takers are abroad, going to and fro, according to their several inclinations.

Hark! the big bell of St. Paul's cathedral is striking the hour. The resounding strokes are like those of a giant smiting his brazen buckler with his spear! What says the clamorous monitor to the busy world below? What warnings has he to give old Humphrey? "Mortal! prepare for immortality!" A dozen church clocks are now repeating aloud the solemn injunction

It is a serious thought to entertain, while so may are striving, with all their souls to get through this bad world, that so few are striving to get to a better. The bread which perishes is sought after more than the bread of life, and the gewgaws of time more ardently pursued than the glories of eternity!

What a Lilliputian world it is below me. Diminished in size as they are by my position, the very carts and wagons are playthings; the huge dray horse is but a Shetland pony; and the men and women are merely respectable puppets. It would do a proud man good, could he see himself in the street from the top of the Monument.

Now, I should like to be able to scatter down blessings on the heads of my brother emmets below, from Greenwich Hospital in the east, to Buckingham Palace in the west; from Stanford Hill in the north, to Clapham Common in the south. Well, if I cannot do this myself, I can humbly and reverently ask Him to do it who can. He only who knows the grief and joy, the fears and desires of every heart, can suit his blessings to their respective wants.

The Tower has just caught my eye; the centre building, with the four square turrets, has a fort-like apperance. Its dark walls, windows, and battlements, edged with stones of a lighter color, render it unlike the buildings around it. No doubt, if it were necessary, the place could pour out of the iron and brazen-throated cannons it contains, such a horrible tempest of destruction, as would bring to the ground many of the proud edifices that raise their heads above it; but for all that, I like not the Tower. Dark deeds have been done there! cruel, merciless deeds branding the brows, and blackening the memory of those who perpetrated them.

How pleasant it is, in comparison, to reflect on the pious, though unnoticed, poor, whom, to do deeds of fame and glory—

> "Their lot forbade, nor circumscribed alone
>   Their growing virtues, but their crimes confin'd,
> Forbade to wade through slaughter to a throne,
>   And shut the gates of mercy on mankind."

The name of king will not cover a crime from an All-seeing eye, nor blot out a deed of blood from the record of human transgression; but I will turn from the Tower, lest in my too ardent condemnation of regal infirmities, I lose sight of, or make manifest, my own.

I will now make the best of my way down the spiral staircase. It was not, I hope, high-mindedness that brought me up, and I trust that high-mindedness will not accompany me down; for sure I am a proud man, seeing that he had so little cause for humility, is not more vain than he is foolish. As John Bunyan's shepherd boy sings:

> "He that is down needs fear no fall;
>   He that is low, no pride;
> He that is humble, ever shall
>   Have God to be his guide."

Never are we so safe as when we are lowly in heart, seeking in all things that holy and Divine influence which can alone defend us from temptation, and deliver us from evil; "casting down imaginations, and every high thing that exalteth itself against the kowledge of God, and bringing into captivity every thought to the obedience of Christ."

THE FIRST AND LAST VISIT TO THE DRAM SHOP.

Timothy Truesdall is the name we shall assign to a very worthy, thriving, and industrious mechanic of New York, who was a burthen to himself, a curse to his family, and a nuisance to society at large; in short, one of the most shameless and abandoned drunkards that ever took the measure of an unmade grave in a Gotham gutter. He was not weaned from his degrading propensity by the Temperance, or the Tract, or any other society. Their logic was labor lost on Tim, who would have uncorked the bottle amongst the quakings and thunders of Mount Sinai, and drained it by the crater of exploding Vesuvius. It was woman's love that cured him, and all women may get a just idea of their own importance in society from his story.

Though he had a wife and five beautiful children, Tim seemed to be unconscious of the fact. He neglected his work, squandered his earnings, which daily grew smaller, and spent his time at the pot house, till the nigh prostration of all his faculties, or the distasteful words "No more trust!" warned him to seek the shelter of his wife's care and protection. His children could not go to school, because learning was dear and rum was cheap; the landlord dunned for his rent, and Mrs. Truesdall was obliged to keep the house, because she had no dress fit to appear abroad in, having pawned the last to pay the last fine imposed on her spouse by the Police Court. Misery, utter destitution and famine, stared the unhappy family in the face. It is impossible to exaggerate the picture, even had we room and inclination.

Mrs. T. was a heroine, though not of romance. She loved her worthless husband, and had borne his neglect, the tears of her children, the gripe of famine, and the railing of the drunkard, without repining. Never had her exertions slackened; never had a harsh word passed her lips. At night when she put her children to sleep, she wept and watched for his coming, and when he did come, drunk, as usual, she undressed and assisted him to bed without a murmur of reproach. At last, her courage well nigh exhausted, she resolved upon one last desperate effort.

At night, having disposed of her three oldest children, she took her two youngest by the hand and bent her steps to the groggery her husband was accustomed to frequent. She looked into the window, and there he sat, in the midst of his boon companions, with his pipe in his mouth and his glass in his hand. He was evidently excited, though not yet drunk. Great was the astonishment of that bad company, and enormous Mr. Truesdall's dismay and confusion, when his wife, pale as marble, and leading two tattered and bare-footed babes, stepped up to the bar, called for thee glasses of brandy toddy, and then sat down by his side.

"What brings you here, Mary?" said he morosely.

"It is very lonesome at home, and your business seldom allows you to be there," replied the meek wife. "There is no company like yours, and as you cannot come to me I must come to you. I have a right to share your pleasures as well as your sorrows."

"But to come to such a place as this!" expostulated Tim.

"No place can be improper where my husband is," said poor Mary. "Whom God hath joined together let no man put asunder!,' She took up the glass of alcohol.

"Surely you are not going to drink that?" asked Tim in huge astonishment.

"Why not? You say that you drink to forget sorrow, and if brandy has that effect, I am sure no living creature has so good an excuse for drinking as I. Besides I have not eaten a mouthful to-day, and I really need something to support my strength."

"Woman! woman! you are not going to give the children such stuff as that!" cried Tim, as she handed each of the children a glass of liquor.

"Why not? Can children have a better example than their father's? Is not what is good for him good for them also? It will put them to sleep, and they will forget that they are cold and hungry. Drink, my children; this fire, and food, and clothing. Drink—you can see how much good it does your father."

With seeming reluctance, Mary suffered her husband to conduct her home, and that night he prayed long and fervently, which he had not done before for years.

The next evening as, O miracle! he returned with a steady step, he saw his oldest boy run into the house, and heard him exclaim, "Oh, mother! here comes father, and he is not drunk!" Tears coursed down the penitent's cheek, and, from that hour, he has not tasted strong drink. He had never been vicious or unfeeling, and, as soon as his emancipation from the thraldom of a debasing appetite become known, friends, employment and prosperity returned to him. As for Mrs. Truesdall, she is the happiest of women, and never thinks without pride, of the first and last visit to the dram shop.—N. Y. Sun.

FOR THE CHILDREN.

From the Amherst Cabinet.

WHAT GOOD DOES LIGHTNING DO!

John B. had pious parents who labored assiduously to instil into the minds of their children, correct, moral, and religious principles. They were in moderate circumstances, and could not expect to give their children much property; and indeed they did not feel anxious to leave a large estate to their children, as it too often leads to idleness and dissipation. They knew that a good education and sound principles were a far better portion for children, than thousands of gold accompanied with ignorance and vicious habits.

One lesson that these parents early taught their children, was, that God is good, and that all his works are designed for some wise and good end. Hence these children never complained of the dealings of God when their own wills were crossed. If they were prevented by the weather from taking a proposed ride or walk, they bore the disappointment patiently and quietly, knowing that God always orders all things for the best.

John was much terrified by thunder and lightning. I have known him to lie down during a thunder shower, trembling from head to foot with terror; and he sometimes wondered what good could result from thunder and lightning, which so often destroys building and lives. One day a very black cloud rose in the west, and as it passed over, the lightning struck a house near Mr. B.'s, doing considerable injury to the house and one of its inmates. After the shower, Mr. B. took his children over to see the effects of the lightning. It had torn off the boards and shattered to splinters some of the largest timbers in the house, and had left fearful marks of its power on one of the family, having blackened one side of his face, and melted his vest buttons, and torn one of his shoes to pieces. As Mr. B. and his children walked homewards, the following dialogue ensued:

John. Pa, I don't see what good lightning does; and surely it does much injury.

Father. Well, may it not answer some wise and good end, though you may not be able to see what?

J. Why, yes sir, it may—but if it does any good I should think we might see it.

F. We have no right to infer that a thing does no good because we cannot see any good accomplished by it. If we ever go to heaven we shall probably understand many things which now seem dark and mysterious. But I think we can see important good resulting from thunder and lightning. Do you not perceive there has been a change in the air, and in the appearance of plants and trees since the shower?

J. Yes, sir; before, the air was hot and sultry; animals stood still in the shade panting with heat! plants seemed to be withering and dying. But now the air is cool and refreshing; the cattle have quietly returned to feeding; the grass looks greener, and the flowers smell sweeter than they have for a long time.

F. And what, my son, is the cause of all this change?

J. I don't know; is it the shower?

F. Yes, the change is to be attributed partly to the rain, and partly to the lightning. Lightning purifies the air by scattering or consuming the noxious vapors which, in warm weather, gradually accumulates in it, and render it unhealthy. In warm countries, the air, if not purified from time to time by lightning, would soon become poisonous and destroy the lives of men and animals, and prevent the growth of plants.—Hence we see it is a wise arrangement of God, by which in warm climates, there are frequently showers of thunder and lightning to purify the atmosphere; while there is less lightning in colder countries where there is less need of it. Were it not for these wise provisions, our summers would be extremely unhealthy; we should drag out a short and sickly life and then die.—True, lightning does sometimes do injury; it destroys property and life; but these cases are comparatively rare. Very few are injured by it, whereas immense multitudes are benefited by it. Fire sometimes does injury; it destroys vastly more property and lives than lightning. Still fire was designed for our good; without it, we could not cook our food or keep comfortable in cold weather. So lightning, though sometimes injurious, is yet essential to our health and comfort.

By this time they had reached home, and the conversation ended.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

TAKE NOTICE.

THE subscriber offers his Farm, on which he now resides, for sale, consisting of one hundred and fifty acres, one hundred of which is under improvement, and is considered by good judges as an excellent stock or dairy farm. A just proportion of the farm is suitable for ploughing, and has not been reduced by bad husbandry. The timber land is the best in this vicinity, having never been used for any purpose. There is on the premises the best of fencing materials, both wood and stone. The buildings consist of a two story dwelling house, nearly new, two barns, and two small hay barns, corn house, &c. There is a well of water in the shed a few feet from the kitchen door. There is about two hundred bearing apple trees, besides pears and plums.—Eighty of the apple trees are ingrafted, and are of the best quality of fruit for summer, fall or winter. The farm is well watered with a small brook and several never failing springs, and is situated in a good and peaceable neighborhood of wealthy farmers, one mile west of the local center of the town of Preston, Chenango county, N. Y. It lies on the west side of the road leading from Pharsalia to the village of Oxford, which is about 4 1-2 miles distance to the south east. The road leading from Macdonough village to Norwich, the county town, runs from west to east through the center of the farm. It is about six miles to Norwich. The farm is situated about eighty rods north of the Seventh-day Baptist meeting-house, and two miles west of the Congregational meeting-house two and a half miles east of the Free-will Baptist & Universalist meeting-house, and two and a half south west of the new Baptist meeting-house. The District School house adjoins the premises. For pleasantness of situation, religious, social and political privileges, we presume it cannot hardly be surpassed in the western country. One quarter, or even one third of the purchase money may remain on bond and mortgage for years.

From the Episcopal Recorder.

THE SAVIOR AT THE WELL.

How instinctively does the Christian cling to every trait of humanity recorded in the history of his divine Master. They create an identity of feeling that gives us boldness in our petitions, when like him, we are suffering with the trials and temptations of earth.

The soothing billow sinking into silence; life moving slowly through the torpid veins, and softening the rigid muscles of the departed; the whitened leper dropping his scaly covering at the command of the great Physician, and the furious demoniac, "who wallowed foaming," yielding himself again to the tender influences of humanity;—these are the Christian's bulwarks, which tell him that his salvation was wrought out by no less a hand than that of the Eternal One. But Jesus sleeping, Jesus wearied, Jesus in tears, these are gentler forms in which he condescended to our infirmities, and here we recognize the "High Priest who can be touched with a feeling of our infirmities." "Being wearied with his journey he sat on the well." Those toil-worn limbs trembled from pure fatigue; that sacred head was bowed in weariness, and that tongue, from which flowed those rills of comfort which now refresh our noon-day path, thirsted for the cooling waters of the well of Sychar.

But, fellow-traveller, wearied with thy journey, art thou not "sitting by a well?" Hast thou not dipped thy vessel into some fountain by the way, or said to another, "Give me to drink?" In this desert would the gayest seek some sparkling fountain at which to satisfy the craving want which cries "Give, give!" the saddest, some lonely spring at which they may cool their burning eye-lids.

And thou who drinkest of the shining waters of imagination, who losest the remembrance of the noon-day travel and the midnight darkness in the sparkling cup of fiction, drink deeply—dream on; but behold the night cometh when the fountain may be no longer bright; dream on, but the graceful shadows must lose themselves in a dark reality!

And thou, who being wearied with thy journey, hast chosen that fountain, which has its source and dwelling-place in the sympathies of the human bosom, and whose waters, like those of the wilderness, need but a branch from that tree "whose leaves are for the nations," to make them sweet as "the river that makes glad the city of our God." I, a lonely pilgrim, wonder not at thy choice, for thy shelter is verdant, and thy cup inviting: and yet "the silver chord must be loosed; the pitcher must be broken; the wheel must be broken at the cistern.—The dust must return to the earth, as it was, but the spirit to God who gave it."

But lonely mourner, clad in thy weeds of sorrow, where art thou sitting? Victim of disappointed hopes, towards what fountain art thou bending thy footsteps? Hew not out for yourselves again these "broken cisterns which can hold no water," but with humble confidence approach that fountain "opened in Israel," and "whosoever will, let him take of the waters of life freely!"

And thou, humble disciple, like thy master, wearied with thy journey, come with me, and we will seat ourselves beside the living waters which swell up from the depths of a Saviour's love. The way is weary; the noon-day sun has beaten upon us; the cold dews of midnight might have hung heavily upon our garments, but let us rest awhile by a well more refreshing than the waters of Sychar. And fear not that there will be sufficient for thee and me, "for the well is deep," deep as eternity! unlimited as infinity! New life will pour itself thro' our languid frames, and we will go from "strength to strength, till each of us appeareth in Zion."

THE KNOWLEDGE OF JESUS CHRIST.

I do not deny but that the knowledge of other things is in many cases very useful; some to private persons, some to public societies, some to whole nations, some to mankind in general, some to the right understanding the Scriptures, and so to the knowledge of Christ himself; yea, there is scarce any kind of knowledge but some way or other helps towards the raising, the refining, and the enlarging our understandings, and so to the making us more capable of knowing him. But whatsoever it be at present, unless it tends to that end at last, it will stand us in no stead: for what if I was skilled in all the arts and sciences that ever were invented, and could manage them to the best advantage? what if I had the whole system of logic in my head, and could argue with all the art and cunning that ever man had? What if I could dive into the depth of natural philosophy, and see the several springs and movements of all secondary causes? What if I had turned over all the records of the Church, and the history of all ages and places since the world began, and could reduce every thing to its proper time? What if I could "count the number of the stars, call them all by name," and describe their motion to an hair's breadth? What if I understood all languages, and could discourse with people of all nations upon the earth in their own mother tongue? What then? Notwithstanding all this, without the "knowledge of Jesus Christ," I should be lost and undone for ever. For "there is no name under heaven whereby we can be saved, but in the name of Christ;" neither is there any way possibly to be saved, by him, unless we know him. For unless we know him, we can do nothing that is required in order to our being saved by him.—Bishop Beveridge.

CHRIST THE SOUL OF MUSIC.

All the music on earth which is not made by Christ and for him, is discordant in his ear, and as the raven's croak. As it was He who gave to David's harp so sweet a sound, vibrated its strings upon the hills of Bethlehem, inspired the royal bard with his own voice, and directed it in those lovely psalms to personate Himself, so it is no other than He, who still to the present day, opens the lips of them that sing with the spirit and the understanding also. He opens their lips to show forth His praise; he gives harmony to their voices, and cheerful melody to their hearts. He lodges the psaltery in their bosoms, and plays upon the hidden chords of their inmost soul, with the breath of his mouth. He lives in their sighs of sorrow, and in their shouts of joy: in their longing plaints of love, and in their hymnings of praise: in their cries at the cross, and in their exultation upon that delectable hill, where, upon their foreheads, they find themselves sealed with the Spirit unto the day of redemption. In every breathing of the renewed nature, whether it be of a groan or of a hozanna: in every act of homage, and in every hailing of holy joy: in the great temple choir of the waiting church militant, who all harmonize in that one ejaculation, "Amen, even so, come, Lord Jesus, come quickly!" there, even there is He, the Lord and his Spirit, present, as the life and inspiration of all, however poorly fitted such persons and things may seem for presence and habitation like his.—Krummacher.

THE CHRISTIAN LIFE.—The life of a Christian, is a life of faith in the Son of God. He, undoubtedly, is the greatest Christian who most exemplifies, in his own practice, what is recorded in the Gospel, of the temper, converse, and actions of the holy, the harmless and undefiled Jesus, and depends the most absolutely upon him for wisdom, righteousness, sanctification and redemption. The means by which we advance in this life, are self-denial, watchfulness, prayer, and a patient waiting upon the Lord in all Divine appointments. Pride, unbelief and self-will, are the great avenues (if I may so speak,) by which the devil plays the temptations of the world upon us:—he is more cunning and active than we can conceive, and attacks different persons, and the same person at different times, in very different ways—sometimes by sap, sometimes by storm. We have need of the whole armor of God, and a continual eye to the Captain of our salvation. To him I recommend you; who is able to keep you from falling, and to present you blameless before his glorious presence with exceeding joy. Amen.—Rev. John Newton's twenty-five Letters.

ON THE LOVE OF GOD.

The love of God, shed abroad in the heart, is the only solid ground on which we can build the hope that we are justified in his sight. And this I argue on principles independent of the general and just admission, that a sense of pardon freely granted cannot fail to call forth gratitude, and thus to raise the affections to God. This truth I fully grant; but I deny that it is the whole truth. There are, in my opinion, still deeper grounds on which it can be proved that reconciliation with, and the love of God, are indissolubly connected.

When peace is made between two contending parties, the effects which follow must always bear a strict relation to the terms on which the parties stood before hostilities commenced. When strangers, or persons previous indifferent, fall out, and when, in any such instance, the grounds of quarrel are removed, no further benefit can be expected than that mutual annoyance and provocations should cease. The parties either separate and meet no more; or they return on both sides to that state of indifference in which they had been used to live. But if, unhappily, offences come, or jealousies arise where harmony and love previously existed, here the work of reconciliation becomes twice blessed, and the "peace-makers," with double emphasis, are "called the children of God." Who that ever has suspected, yet strongly loved—who, that ever felt the pang of being at enmity where he once "had garnered up his heart," can need be told with what glad associations peace revisits the soul? It is, in such a case, impossible that a cessation of hostilities can take place without the return of the heart to all, nay, to more than its former tenderness.

And thus it may be at the reconciliation of a soul to God. Between these parties an amity and friendship, as old as the creation of man, originally subsisted. The apostacy of the soul from God, though in one sense it may be termed its natural state, is, nevertheless, a disorder superinduced upon its primitive constitution. Man was, in his first estate, designed and formed for God. The only happiness of which he is capable, is a happiness which flows from, and which constitutes him a partaker of the Divine nature. Severed as he is from God by the intrinsic force of sin, and held down in chains to the service of a usurper, all his native aspirations remind him of his true allegiance, and all his miseries evince that he is out of his right place, and that all the foundations of his being are out of course.

The fall of man is, in its very essence, the loss of God;—the loss of that food which alone can fill the soul; the loss of that rest, out of which it can find no repose. The great purpose, then, for which a Saviour came down from on high, was to heal the breach, and slay the enmity which separates man from God. The same great sacrifice which satisfies the justice of heaven, holds out a signal to repentant sinners, that they may now draw nigh. If we obey that signal, we are justified by faith, and have peace with God. The barriers are then removed, the intervening clouds are dissipated, and God and man return to their ancient amity. The sun shines forth, as in times of old to gladden the soul and warm it with its beams. The restless dreams of man's apostacy are over, and the days of his mourning are ended. The spiritual nature, rectified and restored, is again obedient to its fundamental law; and man fulfils the first and great commandment, "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and mind, and soul, and strength."

Such are the grounds on which I argue that a state of justification must imply a state of filial love. No physical necessity can bind cause and effect more indissolubly together. And as water, when freed from accidental hindrances, returns with unfailing tendency to its own level, and as the liberated stream unerringly obeys that law which points it to the ocean; so does the human soul when the barriers of its condemnation are broken down, rush, as it were, to the passage which it now finds open, and fill, with the whole tide of its affections, those channels which lead to God.

The love of self, and the love of God, are principles deeply and inseparably associated together in the human soul. For, in spite of the general prejudice which runs against the former, there is, beyond doubt, a true and genuine self-love which lies at the root and forms the spring of all our aspirations after good. It is distinguishable from selfishness by the broadest lines of separation.

Selfishness is in its essence, disease: it is the substitution of another object for that very self from which it derives its name. All its anxieties are about the body, or about the circumstances which affect the body. To be rich or great, to steep in sensuality, or shine in the eyes of men—these are the prizes which the selfish man keeps in view. This is the competition in which he takes every mean advantage, and would appropriate if he were able, every thing to himself, or rather to what, in his delirium, he takes to be himself: for, wonderful to say about true self—about that which is really and essentially one's self—about his soul; about that in which his true identity and higher nature consist; about that of which the body is but the changeable and perishable habitation; about his soul and its concerns, he is utterly regardless; nay, he makes a free-will offering of them all to the idol of his insanity.

But self-love is, on the contrary, the recovery of the soul from this aberration. It is the state in which the prodigal is described, 'when he came to himself.' It is the right understanding of those awful inquiries, 'What shall a man give in exchange for his soul?' 'What is a man advantaged, if he gain the whole world, and lose himself, or be cast away?' The truth is, that if a man love not himself, he must be reckless of his own salvation; for what signifies to him the weal or woe of a being for whom he does not care? It would indeed be mere waste of time to argue against a madness still more outrageous than that already noticed, were it not that in the abandonment of self-love there is a superficial show of generosity and devotedness which leads men to admire it, without well knowing what they mean. They have a notion that the love of God with all the heart, implies that every other affection should be lost in that one absorbing passion. But this is altogether misconception. The love of God is not so much the complacential view of any outward exhibition of moral excellence, as the centering of the soul in the bosom of an object competent to satisfy its deepest thirst for happiness. To love God, is to dwell in God, to receive of his fulness, and to be a partaker of the divine nature. Between the love of God, thus understood, and the love of self, there is consequently, no rivalship nor opposition; for, in their very essence, the latter is the desire of happiness, and the former is finding that happiness in God. So far from being opposed, they are inseparably connected; insomuch that if a man love not himself, he cannot love God.—Rev. H. Woodward.

MEDITATIONS.

"Deny thyself, take up thy cross and follow me, for whosoever will save his life shall lose it."—"I am crucified with Christ, nevertheless I live; yet not I, Christ liveth in me."

At the point where we lose ourselves or crucify self, we find our life, we find Jesus. In self-crucifixion carried out to a full extent of our Savior's meaning, we find the blessedness of being nothing ourselves, because Christ is all in all in the soul. It is then we glory in the cross, for by the cross, we have gained the life of Jesus.—The life of Jesus in the soul.—What tongue can express the blessedness of such a state!—Weary pilgrim, tossed and driven upon the sea of thine own stormy passions and carnal reasonings, submit to the cross—study the cross, and learn what it is to be crucified with Christ, that the life also of Jesus may be made manifest in thy soul.—Grow in grace, and in the knowledge of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ.

There is a spiritual training of the understanding and heart, which is gained only in the school of Christ. Sitting down at the feet of Jesus, with a desire to know his will in order to do it, the mind is enlightened, and the heart is cultivated in the knowledge of spiritual things. It is then we see light in his light. An ancient proverb says, 'shut the windows that the house may be light.' When we shut up our souls to God's teachings, renouncing our own wisdom as folly, it is then we see, and hear, and feel God. Thus discerning God, coming in contact with him, the soul increases in wisdom and spiritual understanding; light and more light, and still increasing light as the soul is expanded to receive it, shines in, and God is studied and God is known. This increase in the knowledge of God, is the only bliss of the soul here, and it is the everlasting bliss of heaven. To know God, still knowing, and yet never known, is the lesson of eternity.

'Thy will, O God, not mine, be done."

Why, O Christian, is thy soul disquieted? when the storm threatens and the sea swells, why art thou so fearful? Hast thou committed all, submitted all to God? Then is he not thy Father, and does not his own hand govern all for thy best good? O wert thou his! unreservedly his will thy will, the storm would soon become a calm, and the shaft rebound. It is thy unsubdued will, that causes so many thorns to spring up in thy pathway. When thou canst say, not of necessity, but heartily, loving his will best, Thy will be done, then thou wilt indeed have submitted all to Christ, and wilt find rest to thy soul. O sacrifice thy will, a perpetual offering to thy God, then in prosperity or adversity, in light or in darkness, all will be well with thee. In the depths of extreme anguish, of which no human heart can conceive, when the heavy load of a world of sinners was laid upon the Son of God, he prayed, submissively, Thy will, not mine be done.

"The kingdom of God is within you."

As the sun rising, scatters the shades of night, and makes the objects of nature visible, so when Jesus shines into the soul, the darkness of the mind is dispelled, and the soul clearly discerns spiritual things. Hasten, O hasten the meridian light, the noonday splendor of the reign of righteousness on earth! Art thou looking within, O Christian, to find the dawning of this glorious day? One soul and one only, has thou the entire dominion over. Is the kingdom of God come there?—In you, by you, is his will done, even as by the angels in heaven? Look not here, look not there, saying, is the Gentile and Jew brought in, but turn thy eye inward, and ask, is the kingdom of God come in thy own soul? It is not meat and drink, external rights and observances, but it "is righteousness and peace, and joy, in the Holy Ghost." This is the reign of Christ on earth, his reign in thy heart. His kingdom cometh not with observation, it is meekly set up in the heart; all is bowed to his will. His will—what is his will?—Ah, wherefore, for what did he die? Not alone to rescue thy soul from sin's desert, but from sin's dominion; to break down Satan's kingdom here, and establish his own.

WORSHIP IN HEAVEN.

Why can we not pierce through this veil of flesh and blood, and by faith behold the humble worship of heaven? What countless multitudes have gone before us in the path that leads to that kingdom? They were in their time followers of an unseen Savior as we are now; but now they see him face to face in all his glory, and in all his love; with them are joined the innumerable hosts of angels. Angels and saints, however distinguished, are joined in one happiness and in one employment. Even now, they are praising the Lamb that was slain, and casting their crowns at his feet. And perhaps this scene is not so distant as we imagine—Where is heaven? It is some millions of leagues from us, far beyond the sun and fixed stars? What have immortal spirits to do with space and place? Who knows but a heaven-born soul, who is freed from the clog of the body, and filled with all the fulness of God, may pass as easily and quickly from one verge of creation to the other, as our thoughts can change and fly from east to west, from the past to the future! Perhaps even now we live in the midst of this glorious assembly. Heaven is where our God and Saviour displays himself, and do you not feel him nearer to you than of his visible works? Perhaps there is nothing but this thin partition of flesh and blood between us and those blessed spirits that are before the throne; if our eyes were open, we should see the mountains round us covered with chariots and horses of fire; if our ears were unstopped we should hear the praises of our great Immanuel resounding in the air as once the shepherds heard them.—Newton.

THE TONGUE.

There are but ten precepts of the law of God, said Leighton, and two of them, so far as concerns the outward organs and vent of the sins there forbidden, are bestowed on the tongue, (one in the first table, and the other in the second)—as though it were ready to fly out both against God and man if not thus bridled.

Pythagoras used to say that a wound from the tongue is worse than a wound from the sword, for the latter affects only the body, the former the spirit—the soul.

It was a remark of Anacharsis, that the tongue was at the same time the best part of man and his worst—that with good government none is more useful, and without it none more mischievous.

Boerhaave, says Dr. Johnson, was never soured by calumny and detraction, nor ever thought it necessary to confute them. 'For,' said he, 'they are sparks, which, if you do not blow them, will go out of themselves.'

We cannot, says Cato, control the evil tongues of others, but a good life enables us to despise them.

'Slander,' says Lacon, 'cannot make the subjects of it either better or worse. It may represent us in a false light, or place a likeness of us in a bad one. But we are the same. Not so the slanderer—the slander that he utters makes him worse, the slandered never.'

'No one,' says Jerome, 'loves to tell a tale of scandal except to him who loves to hear it. Learn then to rebuke and check the detracting tongue, by showing that you do not listen to it with pleasure.'

No one sees the wallet on his own back, says the old proverb, alluding to the fable of the traveler with two packs, the one before stuffed with the faults of his neighbors—the one behind with his own.

It was a maxim of Euripides either to keep silence, or to speak something better than silence.

THE CHRISTIAN TO GLORIFY GOD IN SUFFERING.

I am cut off from all my former employments, and reduced very nearly to [illegible] ty of mind and body; I occasion [illegible] trouble to those who kindly nurse me; I am able to do nothing for my fellow-creatures; and I am almost continually in pain; why should I live? [illegible] God. I may still glorify him; if he sees it to be best that I should suffer for some time longer. Those who are on the brink of eternity, often have more [illegible] authority in what they say than those in health. A dying person [illegible] purposes to serve and [illegible] with [illegible]. His words [illegible] weight. I will not neglect this opportunity of doing good. I will exhort my relations, my friends, my servants and all who come near me, to leave the ways of sin, and to seek the grace of God. I can find motives enough in my past ungodliness, and in my present peace. God grant, that since I have lost many an opportunity of serving him when I was in health, my dying counsels and exhortations may be eminently useful. Christians, too, may be edified by my last hour. My active life is probably over; but if I cannot do the will of God by active service, I may by patient resignation. To bear trial well, as much manifests the power of grace, as to discharge duty well. May my friends see in me how patient, how cheerful, how contented grace can make a dying sufferer. Let them see how God can fill the heart of a pardoned sinner with hope and joy, with all the pains of disease [illegible]. I have [illegible] to the Lord, but may other Christians learn by my example what it is to die to him! If, through all the suffering and languor which are yet reserved for me, I can bless him for all that is past, and trust him for all that is to come,—if my will is lost in his, so that I can say, as my Redeemer did at Gethsemane, "Not my will but thine be done"—if my friends can see that God is enough to make me happy, though all the outward sources of enjoyment are changed into weariness [illegible] pain,—then will he be glorified in me. Whatever then, he appoints for me, I still may be useful and happy. I am ready for death, when he sees [illegible] me far better to depart [illegible] but while he appoints me to live, I may, by his grace, glorify him no less than by the most active exertions. Should my example teach my dear friends how to die, that will repay them for their kind attention to me. And though I am reduced to the feebleness of a child in mind and body, God can bestow upon my spirit a giant's strength to bear his will and love him for all he does. May he grant it to me, for the sake of his dear Son!—Baptist W. Noel.

"LIFE, LIFE, ONLY LIFE—ON ANY CONDITION WHATEVER."

This was the almost dying exclamation of the voluptuous novelist, HOFFMAN. Such was his love of life—of what he called the "the sweet habitude of being." He died at Berlin by piecemeal—dictating his wild stories to the last. Strange stories they were indeed for a dying man to write. The closing scene was striking and instructive. His feet and hands, his legs and arms, had for months become perfectly paralized and motionless. At length he lost all sensation—though his fancy retained its creative power. Feeling no more pain, he said to his physician, (thinking he was about to recover,) 'I feel no more pain, it will soon be over.' 'Yes,' said the medical man giving another and more impressively solemn meaning to his words, 'it will soon be over.' When made fully aware that he was dying he called his wife to his bed side and begging her to fold his motionless hands together, said, lifting his dying eyes to heaven, 'we must then think of God also.' Shortly after the expiring flame of life glared up again within him,—and fancying he might still postpone intrusive thoughts of God and eternity—he said, 'I shall be well enough in the evening to go on with the tale I have been inditing.'—He asked for the reading of the last sentence—and just as it was finished, expired. Thus passed to its solemn account a human soul, richly, gloriously gifted, but utterly faithless to the high trusts of the stewardship of genius. 'It is worth a student's while,' says a popular writer, 'to observe how tobacco, wine and midnight, did their work upon the delicate frame of Hoffman.' It is worth one's while also to observe how a profound indifference to the concerns of the soul is strengthened by habits of sinful indulgence, and the postponement of all serious thoughts of the claims of religion, till even the death-bed fails to be 'a detector of the heart,' and the infatuated spirit departs to its high audit, amidst the appalling gloom of an impenitent and reprobate state.—Gambier Obs.

THE USE OF SPECTACLES.—I look upon a pair of spectacles not as objects, but as helps; not meaning that my sight should rest in them, but pass through them, and by their aid discern some other things which I desire to see.

Many such glasses my soul hath and useth. I look through the glass of the creatures at the power and wisdom of their Maker. I look through the glass of the Scripture at the great mystery of redemption, and the glory of a heavenly inheritance. I look through God's favors, at his goodness; through his judgments, at his severity and justice. But as spectacles presuppose a faculty in the eye, and cannot give me sight when I want it, but only clear that sight which I have,—no more can these glasses of the creatures, of Scripture, [illegible] and judgments, enable me to [illegible] those [illegible] objects, [illegible] eye of faith, which [illegible]. These helps to an [illegible] but as spectacles to [illegible] the natural eyes, so the spiritual have their degrees of dimness—but I [illegible] my eye, if, as my natural eye is dim, my spiritual eye be not cleared [illegible] at my best, I shall always need spectacles, till I come to [illegible]

[illegible]—It is important [illegible] and the reasons why [illegible] the breaking of the day, and why our petitions are generally not granted until the last moment. In prayer the means is more valuable than the end. The spirit of prayer, and the frequent exercise of it, is a greater blessing than the attainment of any other object short of heaven itself. It is the key to the treasury of heaven [illegible] promise and pledge of every other attainment. There is but one higher exercise than that of prayer—the returning of thanks for the granting of our requests; but each have their fitting seasons—prayer is the service of time; praise the employment of eternity.—Douglass.

FOR THE CHILDREN.

From the Youth's Cabinet.

HOW MAY THE FEAR OF DEATH BE OVERCOME?

No doubt many of my young friends have thought within themselves, 'How I wish that my fear of death was overcome!' How is this victory to be gained? O that somebody would tell me!' This I will endeavor to do.

1. You cannot get rid of it by determining to forget all about it. You may succeed in keeping it out of your mind for a season, but it will be returning. Friends and neighbors are dying all around you, your own [illegible] are speaking of it, and the Bible [illegible] to it on almost every page. You must [illegible] yourself, and then will [illegible] to think about it. Besides, forgetting [illegible] does not remove it.

2. The best of men cannot help you in this matter. They have no power to remove your fears.

3. Nor have angels.

4. Nor have devils; but
